The special limitations of actions upon pledge, and the pleas competent to the possessor, are subject to the same laws as determine the competency of the rei vindicatio. This is specially true of the plea of retention on account of other claims competent to the creditor.⁸⁵

§ 245. Rights, as well as corporeal things, may be made the subjects of pledge. To pledge a right is simply to assign it conditionally, in the event, that is to say, of the debtor failing to pay, or to pay timeously. Such pledges are ruled by the law to which the right so impignorated is otherwise subject; e.g. when personal claims are pledged, the law which is applicable to the assignation must be respected; and when rights carrying with them a disposition in security are pledged, the lex rei sitæ as well, since the right of pledge, and consequently the conveyance of such a right, are subject to the lex rei sitæ.

REAL RIGHTS OF GERMANIC ORIGIN. RIGHTS OF LORDSHIP (Bannrecht).
FEUDAL RIGHTS IN PARTICULAR.

§ 246. Real rights of purely Germanic origin, such as the right of sporting, of fishing, and the like, or peasant proprietary rights, rights of entail or feu-rights, must be determined by the lex rei sitæ, and no doubt as to that has ever arisen except⁸⁶ on some points of detail. In the same way the so-called rights of compulsion [thirlage] or exclusive dealing;⁸⁷ and also questions as to liability for erection of churches, are determined by the lex rei sitæ.⁸⁸ But if a right of that character is bound up with some particular estate, then in that case the law of the praedium serviens must decide. That must in particular hold good for any compulsory abolition of such rights, for that, e.g. abolition of a thirlage, is done in the interest of the servient tenement, or at least in the interest of the inhabitants of the district which is under the restriction.⁸⁹ Lastly, it is possible that, in the case of a feu-right, the feudal court should have a different law from that which prevails at the place where the fundus serviens is situated. Is the lex rei sitæ or the law of the court to decide? This question is much debated, especially among French jurists.⁹⁰ The solution of the question must be to the effect that the law of the feudal court shall be held to regulate all questions that can competently be the subject of agreement, but that all questions which belong to the jus cogens shall be ruled by the lex rei sitæ. The law of the feudal court must therefore rule in questions as to the formalities to be observed in the feudal court, the duties payable to the overlord, and the right of escheat: for all these questions are among the conditions (no doubt fixed once for all) under which the overlord allowed the feu-right to be constituted.⁹¹ On the other hand, the lex rei sitæ must determine the right to convert the holding into an allodial holding, without the overlord's consent, and must settle how far the vassal can dispose of an estate of that character, and whether third parties can avail themselves of these powers, e.g. powers of burdening or alienation. ⁸⁸ Judgment of Supreme Court of Bavaria, 27th March 1877 (Seuffert, xxxiv. § 82).

principle of these distinctions is that the days are gone when the feus belonging to a particular court constituted a separate territory.^{92 93}

Real burdens, too, are subject to the lex rei sitæ.⁹⁴

⁹² Seuffert, Comm. i. p. 258, note 17.

⁹⁴ Stobbe in particular, § 32, note 9a, although in his view real burdens are in their legal character obligations. Stobbe in this connection draws attention to the anomalous provision of the Baden Landr. § 710c. According to this, tithes may be redeemed "where a foreigner, whose own country has declared tithes to be redeemable, has right to tithes in this country."

LAW OF OBLIGATIONS.

I. OBLIGATIONS ARISING FROM CONTRACTS.

A. GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

WEIGHT TO BE GIVEN TO THE INTENTION OF PARTIES.

§ 247. Although the systematic arrangement, which we adopt in other departments of law in Germany, treats the general principles of the law of obligations as one whole, whether they refer to those obligations which arise directly ex lege, or to those which have their origin in contract, it is desirable in private international law to separate contract obligations and those which arise directly ex lege, either contrary to the intention of the obligant, or at least without his having expressed any intention in the matter. It may be that the source of the obligation will have very important effects upon the treatment of it as a part of international law. Of course, however, this does not prevent the existence of common principles, applicable to both kinds of obligations, dealing with the transference and extinction of them. When obligations are once constituted beyond all doubt, the fashion in which they were constituted is no longer a matter of any importance.

The first remark we make is that obligations resting on contract are to a very large extent dependent on the intention of the parties to them. If we have once ascertained the intention of the parties upon some point which is open to dispute, that will, as a rule, supply us with the means of determining the dispute, as is indicated by the Code Civil, § 1134: "Les conventions légalement formées tiennent lieu de loi à ceux qui les ont faites."

Accordingly, the most recent theory of the Franco-Italian jurisprudence¹ takes up quite firmly as its starting-point the intention or autonomy of the parties, and a primary guiding principle which pervades all Savigny's expositions is the "voluntary subjection of parties" to some particular local law. (Cf. e.g. § 369; Guthrie, p. 196; and, in the same way, the decision of the Imperial Court of Germany.)²

² Cf. Court of the Empire, i. 8th July 1882 (Entsch. ix. § 60, p. 227), iii. 13th Nov. 1885 (Entsch. xiv. § 58, Seuffert, xli. § 166); Sup. Ct. of Comm. 10th Dec. 1873 (Entsch. xvii. p. 55).

The judgment of 8th July 1882 lays down, that the contracting parties may agree that any

But yet that is not a sound starting-point. True it is that in the law of obligations the sphere of free action accorded to the parties is very wide: true it is that in many cases the question which practically settles the matter is: What is it reasonable to suppose the intention of the parties to have been? But for the lawyer the first question is: What does the law allow the parties to intend, to the effect of recognising that intention, and investing it with legal binding authority? Accordingly the Code Civil says, most properly, although most people pay no attention to it, "Les conventions légalement formées," instead of "Les conventions formées." We must, therefore, before allowing effect to the intention of the parties, know from what territorial law the limits of this intention are to be extracted. If the intention of the parties could prescribe the territorial law to be applied in the law of obligations, they might simply declare that any foreign law you please should govern a contract concluded in this country, to be implemented in this country, and belonging altogether to this country, and in this way withdraw at their pleasure such contracts from all the rules of law recognised in this country.³ No one will venture to say that that is a sound conclusion. The true meaning of the alleged autonomy of parties is this, that parties may make their arrangements so that a particular local law will regulate their contract, but not that this can be entirely dependent upon any capricious declaration of intention which they may elect to make. In other words, when a contract is made under certain circumstances and with certain aims, we say, in accordance with all considerations of reason: The law of this or that State will regulate this contract, and in so far as it allows the intention of the parties to have scope, we must respect that intention which has in fact been declared, not expressly it may be, but by implication only. Of course, the parties might have just as well made other arrangements. For instance, in place of executing their contract in A, and appointing A also as the place where it was to be carried out, they might have chosen B for both of these purposes, and then perhaps we should have had to look on B's law as regulative of the contract. The circumstances under which a contract is concluded depend on the parties and their intentions; and so, indirectly, the law that is to govern the contract, which again is dependent on these circumstances. But the governing law is never directly dependent on the will of the parties. They can choose their circumstances; they cannot choose as they please the territorial law, which does not depend on their good pleasure. The illusory idea, that they can fix this law as they please, arises from the fact that the territorial law will as a general rule again leave a good deal other system of law they please and not necessarily that of the place of fulfilment, shall regulate the acquisition and enforcement of rights arising from a contract. On the contrary, the judgment (i.) of 1st March 1882 (Entsch. vi. § 33, p. 133) speaks very properly of the ascertainment of the local law of the contract from an equitable point of view, but has nothing to say to any such unlimited autonomy of the parties.

to their free choice, and the parties, desiring, as they well may, to compass some special legal results, which this or that particular law allows them to do, can roughly and roundly achieve these legal results by placing their contract under some particular territorial law. If the concrete intention of the parties were held to be really the leading consideration for the determination of the question as to which territorial law should govern, innumerable cases would either not be decided at all, or would be decided to an effect at variance with the true nature of the subject by a refusal of the pursuer's demands, based upon a "non liquet." For in innumerable cases the parties have not made it clear by what law their agreement is to be ruled; and when authors and judicial tribunals speak, as they so often do, of the wish and the intentions of parties with regard to the local law that is to rule, they mean, as a general rule, not the real concrete intention of parties, but that intention as it must be conceived according to objective considerations that admit of application in every case, i.e. they allow the nature of the subject under consideration to give the rule. The round-about road, on which the method of reasoning from the intention of parties enters, is quite unprofitable, but not always harmless. There is at bottom an error at work of the same kind, as if we were to confuse dispositive law with the implied intention of parties.⁴

QUESTIONS WHICH MUST UNDOUBTEDLY BE DETERMINED BY THE LAW OF THE forum, OR OF THE PLACE OF PERFORMANCE OF THE CONTRACT, AS THE CASE MAY BE.

§ 248. In the case of a relation of obligation, the following local laws may present themselves for consideration: First, the law of the place where action is brought; Second, the law of the place where the obligation had its origin, whether that consisted in a declaration of the will of the parties—a contract or legal transaction—or arose immediately by virtue of some statutory provision as to a particular state of facts, without reference to the will of the parties (quasi ex contractu, ex delicto quasi ex delicto); Third, the law of the place where the obligation is to be performed; Fourth, the law of the creditor's domicile; and Fifth, the law of the debtor's domicile.

The opinion that the law of the place in which the action is raised is to decide exclusively as to the relation of obligation between the parties, is only adopted by those who reject entirely the application of foreign law, and give the judge as his sole guide the law that prevails at the seat of his court. This opinion we have already impugned, in discussing the general principles of private international law. It is unnecessary to repeat the arguments that were then urged.

But from these general principles we may, no doubt, infer that the lex fori will take effect, so as to prevent a court from sanctioning a claim, which must, by the lex fori, be looked upon as inadmissible, as one that is contra bonos mores. If any such claim were recognised, there would be a direct realisation of a claim which the judge's own system of law says should be rejected. If in country A certain transactions for differences on the Exchange are held to be illegal gambling transactions, they can never, in that country, be the ground of action, between whomsoever and wheresoever they are concluded. There is no doubt of that. In the same way, no doubt can ever arise as to the supremacy of the law of the place of performance to this extent, that if the act, which is the subject of the obligation, is impossible or illegal at the place of performance of the contract, i.e. the place where the act is to be done, the obligation must be of no effect, by whomsoever and wheresoever it was undertaken.⁵ Obligations directed to anything that is legally impossible, or that is forbidden, are null. The former is obvious even in international relations: if, for instance, one bound himself to give a right in an immoveable thing, which is unknown to the lex rei sitæ, he has simply promised an impossibility. Again, as concerns transactions which are forbidden at the place of performance, if we were to admit that any such obligation had binding force, we should be doing violence to the law of the other State, which seems entitled, by virtue of its territorial sovereignty, to refuse to allow certain transactions within its own territory.

THE VARIOUS THEORIES: (a) LAW OF THE PLACE WHERE THE CONTRACT IS MADE: (b) OF THE PLACE OF PERFORMANCE.

§ 249. These special questions, then, we can, as a preliminary, put aside. We can also show without difficulty that the personal law of the creditor must not be held to rule in such matters. If the personal law of either party is to rule, it must be that of the debtor. The person of the debtor is without doubt more closely bound up with the whole legal relation than that of the creditor. The person of the creditor may vary without destroying the obligation, but a change in the person of the debtor is equivalent to the extinction of the old and the establishment of a new obligation;⁶ and although the will of both parties may have equal weight at the origin of the obligation, the performance depends in the main upon an act of the debtor, and any active step on the part of the creditor either does not take place at all, or, at all events, is quite subordinate to the other.⁷ Neither the decisions of the courts nor the voice of the authorities has adopted the view that, as a rule, the law of the creditor's domicile should prevail.

⁶ The change in the person of the debtor in the case of succession is, on the one hand, a matter of necessity, and, on the other, a compensation provided by the law, as the heir represents the person of his predecessor in matters of property.

Many authors do take the personal law of the creditor into account, but that is only in so far as they propose a modification of the principle which they generally recognise as regulative in cases in which both parties are under the same personal law. To this case we shall return again in the sequel.

We are left, then, with the following theories, as those which are chiefly represented in modern times, viz. :—

A. The theory which prevails in the Franco-Italian system of jurisprudence,⁸ takes as its foundation the law of the place in which the contract was concluded. Many weighty reasons favour this view. Both contracting parties can learn the law of their place with certainty, and this law offers at the same time to both of these parties a common ground of knowledge and information. Neither the one nor the other seems to have any advantage. For instance, how could trade possibly be carried on at fairs, markets, and exchanges, if every one who made a contract there could appeal to the unknown local law of his domicile, or of the place where it might so happen that payment was to be made, against all good faith and credit?

We cannot, however, regard the lex loci contractus as the only rule for matters of obligation, or even as the leading consideration in the matter. In the first place, it seems absurd that, as would be the result of this theory, if two natives of this country happen to make a contract abroad which they intend to fulfil in this country, foreign law, which may be entirely unknown to both of them, should regulate it. That would open a door of escape from every law of this country. The parties would only require to make a journey abroad in order to withdraw themselves from all prohibitive statutes, such as usury laws. And quid juris if the place of the completion of the contract could not be ascertained, because it took place during a journey by coach or rail? Is the transaction in such a case always to be void? Lastly, how could a contract concluded between persons who do not meet be brought to determination at all, since we are landed in this circle—that the question in what place the contract was originated could only be answered by a rule of law, and it is ex hypothesi undetermined what law is to be applied?⁹ However, even those who maintain this theory do not by any means maintain that it is as a rule applicable absolutely and in all cases: they make important concessions in favour of the law of the place of performance and the personal law of the parties.

B. Next, we have the theory which regards the law of the place of performance as regulative, a theory which has found a remarkable number of adherents in Germany, in deference to Savigny's authority, and has been recognised in the judgments of German courts, particularly the Court of the Empire, as it was even earlier in the Supreme Court of Commerce in Germany.¹⁰

In support of this view, it is pleaded that performance is the end and object of the obligation to which the whole view of the parties is directed.¹¹ This does not by itself, however, justify the subjection of the obligation exclusively to the law recognised at the place of performance.¹² All that one can infer is, that in points dependent upon the agreement of parties there is foundation for inferring a voluntary subjection to the law of the place of performance, by virtue of that expectation of parties which is

See Sachs, Rev. vi. p. 242, on the practice of the Supreme Ct. of Commerce in this matter; Ct. of the Empire (i.) 1st March 1882 (Entsch. vi. § 33, p. 131); Ct. of the Empire (i.) 8th July 1882 (Entsch. ix. p. 227, No. 60). In the former of these two decisions the regulation of all questions by the law of the place of performance is described by the court as the prevailing practice. So, too, practice of Bavaria, cf. Roth, Bayer. Civilr. i. § 17, note 109; Saxon Code, § 11: "Claims shall be determined according to the law of the place in which they are to be satisfied."

In the following case the Court of the Empire (i.) on 2nd Feb. 1885 found itself compelled to depart from the theory of the place of performance being regulative. A contract for the sale of a Hamburg ship then at sea, and bound for some port of the United Kingdom, or some port between Havre and Hamburg, was concluded at Hamburg between the owner, who belonged to Hamburg, and a German merchant from Shanghai, who happened to be at Hamburg. The law of Hamburg, and not the law of the place of delivery, which at the date of the contract was unknown, was held, in conformity with the view of the court below, to regulate the claims of the buyer, in respect of defects in the ship, which was shortly afterwards delivered at St Nazaire (Bolze, Praxis, des R.G. i. § 32, p. 8). See, too, the Ct. of the Empire (i.) 8th July 1882 (ib. § 35); in a contract of brokerage made by a native of Mecklenburg with Berlin dealer, as to the sale of a real estate in Berlin, it is not to be presumed that the law of the place in which the mandatory has to discharge his duty is that which will regulate the contract: the first thing to enquire is whether the parties wished the bargain to be carried out in all its consequences according to the law of the place of performance.

¹² One often, however, deals too lightly with the question, in what place an obligation is to be performed: thus the place of delivery is often, but erroneously, described as the place of performance. See, on the contrary, Foote, p. 347: "The contract of a carrier is performed in the place where he carries, not in the place whence he starts, or to which he is destined." As directed to that end; while the law of obligations consists to a large extent, although not exclusively, of rules which may be avoided at the pleasure of parties. But even with this limitation, it is impossible, without a revolt against the general logical rules for interpreting the intention of parties, to carry out the theory of the rule of the place of performance in regard to obligations. For even if we leave out of account that, as the parties often know nothing of the law of the place of performance,¹³ and as it is often very difficult to say what is the place of performance in this sense,¹⁴ we cannot assume any voluntary subjection of the parties to the law of that place,¹⁵ an alteration in the place of performance made subsequently to the conclusion of the contract must alter the contract in each and every point, if the law of the new place of performance differs from that of the old;¹⁶ and if there are several places of fulfilment, we are at a loss for any rule of interpretation.¹⁷

a matter of fact, a turn is not unfrequently given to the inferences which rest on the theory of the place of performance as regulative, which practically results in a reference to the law of the domicile or the seat of the business in question. See e.g. decision of the German Imperial Ct. of 19th March 1888, reported in Bolze, Praxis. v. § 474. In another case reported by Bolze, v. § 9 (excambion of two parcels of real estate lying within different territories), the Imperial Court (111) on 1st July 1887 had to recognise that there may be two different places of performance, and that recourse must accordingly be had to the law of the domicile of the parties, who happened to have the same domicile.

¹³ See, too, Clunet (J. xiii. p. 610), who for this very reason declares against the theory of the place of performance.

¹⁷ Where, for instance, are we to say that the place of performance of the obligation of the carrier is? Perhaps the answer would be, at the destination of the goods. But the carrier has to perform the obligations laid upon him at every moment of the transport, cf. note 12. It is a kind of haphazard decision, if we declare that where there are several places of performance, the law of the judge who is determining the case shall rule. (See decision of the Ct. of Comm. 9th December 1875, given with respect to the Saxon Code, §§ 11 and 6; Entsch. xix. p. 132.) The old Ct. of Comm. (see Entsch. xxiv. p. 180, of 28th June 1878) rightly laid down that if a joint stock company sets up different places for the payment of the interest on its debenture debts, it is not on that account to be held to have submitted itself to a plurality of laws as regards the substance of its obligations. But how is that decision to be reconciled with the theory which purposes to determine the law of the obligation exclusively according to the place of performance? Renaud (1886, i. p. 41) proposes to hold the place where the contract is made as decisive, if several alternative places of performance exist. That is quite capricious.

An appeal is made to the fact that by Roman law the forum contractus was set up in the place where the obligation was to be performed,¹⁸ and Savigny especially tries to make out that the local jurisdiction, as well as the local law of the obligation, depends upon a voluntary submission of the parties, and therefore that the rules which regulate the former are to be applied also to the latter.¹⁹ But, in the first place, the Romans, in determining the jurisdiction, had no intention of laying down what the law of the obligation was to be. Further, by Roman law the forum contractus was not exclusive, but concurrent with the forum domicilii of the debtor. This could not be the case if the Roman law had conceived the place of performance to be the seat of the obligation. In the third place, it is at variance with the general principles adopted by Savigny himself, and by far the greater number of authorities, to conclude from the competency of a court that the law recognised at its seat is uniformly applicable. By a similar deduction, we should hold that the law recognised at the seat of the court which had to decide any case must rule the case in all its bearings.²⁰ Lastly, we shall show (see our discussion of jurisdiction) that it is not by any means the case that the Roman law unconditionally set up the forum contractus in the place where the obligation was to be performed.

C. THEORY WHICH TAKES THE PERSONAL LAW OF THE DEBTOR FOR ITS LEADING PRINCIPLE.

§ 250. The theory which takes the personal law of the debtor for its leading principle, has been adopted by Molinaeus,²¹ Thöl,²² and more recently by Windscheid,²³ and Mommsen,²⁴ and Roth,²⁵ as well as Durand.²⁶ ²⁷ This theory, to which Stobbe (§ 33) comes very close, is in principle the correct theory, for this reason, that the general propositions of ¹⁹ Savigny, §§ 369 and 370; Guthrie, pp. 196 and 198.

²⁰ Against the application of the law recognised at the place of performance, see Wächter, ii. p. 42; Thöl, § 85, note 3; Kori Erört, iii. pp. 22, 23.

While Savigny sought to refer the exclusive supremacy of the law of the place of performance to a voluntary subjection of the parties in every respect to this law, Böhlau expressly rejects this ground, and places it "upon the authority of the courts and the possibility of a real protection." As Bekker very properly points out, Savigny's reasoning rests on a fiction. Böhlau's principle, unless he means to invoke the exclusive supremacy of the lex fori, which he denies, is a simple petitio principii.

law in the matter of obligations, the rules which do not give way to the pleasure of the individuals, exist generally in the interest of the debtor. We cannot hold that this protection shall cease on a subject by accident undertaking an obligation in a foreign country, or having to perform one there. In so far, however, as there is a question of the interpretation to be put on the intention of parties, we must unquestionably proceed upon the footing, that every person expresses himself in accordance with the law and the statutes which he knows, and has recourse therefore to the law to which he is personally attached. This rule of interpretation is applied in cases of unilateral obligations or transactions, especially in mortis causa settlements, even by those who propose to construe contract obligations by the lex loci contractus, or by the law which prevails at the place of performance.²⁸

Lastly, the view we have here maintained is supported by the fact that in very many cases, and in particular where no other place of performance is specially stipulated, the domicile of the debtor is the place of performance, and that in by far the greater number of cases, action to compel performance of a personal obligation, with a view to the possibility of ultimate execution, is brought at the domicile of the debtor.²⁹ The judex domicilii must feel himself all the more bound to apply the lex domicilii that, as we have already noticed, a consistent application of the lex loci contractus, or of the law that is recognised at the place of performance, seems irreconcilable with the maintenance of the law of the judge's own country. For instance, if one desired to evade the laws as to the maximum rate of interest, he would require merely to stipulate for a foreign place of performance, in order to be able to secure payment by an action in his own country. We must, however, keep in view that if the domicile be changed after an obligation has been undertaken, it has no influence upon the import and validity of the obligation, for this reason, that otherwise there would be a retroactive force attributed to the domicile. It applies not to obligations undertaken by subjects of the State before they became subjects, but only to such as they have undertaken while they have been subjects.³⁰ This is scarcely likely to be disputed, and is only specially mentioned in order to avoid misunderstandings.

The following difficulty has been raised in reference to the case that the contracting parties have not the same personal law. The essence of the contract, it is said, consists in a concurrent declaration of will upon either side (duorum pluriumve in idem placitum consensus). If we should ²⁸ Fœlix, i. § 96, p. 227.

²⁹ This is a reason for refusing to recognise that all the judgments, which, read literally, make the place of performance decisive, are really to be cited in support of that principle; they are not to be recognised to that effect, if the place of fulfilment and the domicile are in the particular case identical. See Wharton, § 410, and the decisions given there.

interpret the declaration of both parties according to their respective personal law, then we could never reach the notion of a consensus; and on the other hand, there is, it is said, no ground at all for conceding an absolute authority to the laws of either of the parties. If the parties to a contract have in contemplation a law that will give effect to their contract, they will generally proceed on the footing that one and the same law should regulate the whole of it, so that it should receive its full effect, just because the contract is meant effectively to reconcile their opposing relations. Apparently, then, it is said, there is no course left but to assume the law of the place of the contract as regulative.³¹

Against this argument we have, in the first place, to remark that in the law of obligation there are considerations other than the will of the parties. Besides that, however, this train of reasoning not being able to discover a law common to both parties, and desired by both, substitutes therefor a law which neither desires, since every person declares his will in conformity with the laws which are known to him—that is, the laws of his own country. For the real contract of the parties, then, it substitutes an imaginary contract.

On the other hand, the difficulty can be simply solved by the following considerations. Every bilateral transaction may be resolved into two unilateral obligations—sale, for example, into the obligation of the seller to deliver the thing, and the obligation of the buyer to pay the price; and indeed it was customary among the Romans to conclude bilateral obligations in the form of two unilateral stipulations.³² Both seller and buyer give each other such performance as may be prescribed by the personal law of the one and of the other respectively.^{33 34} That is what each has promised, and this promise the other party can only have understood in the sense of the law of the domicile of him who promised, because the assumption that every man declares himself in the sense of the law which he knows, is founded on considerations of general applicability and of good sense. But if the different personal laws give a discrepant result—if, for instance, in the case put, the law of the buyer's domicile throws upon him the risk of the subject sold, while the law of the seller throws it upon him, a contradiction seems to arise. We have, however, precisely the same difficulty if two express provisions at variance with each other find their way into a contract, and no interpretation sought from other circumstances avails to give exclusive validity to the one or to the other. The decision must be in favour of the defender, since the pursuer has certainly not made out his case.³⁵ In the case of an agreement by letters, or if the place of the conclusion of the contract cannot be ascertained, those who regard the place of the contract as regulative have no resource left except to fall back upon the personal laws of both parties.³⁶ An objection to the application of the laws of the different domiciles seems to lie in this, that one party might often be entitled to demand performance, while he himself was not bound at all. But in every contract the undertaking of the one party depends upon that of the other: the one has only validly bound himself in so far as the other is bound to carry out his undertaking. He can, therefore, if he is called upon to do his part, demand that the other party shall either do his first (if this is sufficient, as it often is, to bar any subsequent challenge of the transaction), or bind himself in some way that is recognised by the law of his domicile.³⁷ If, however, the party who is truly bound has already performed his part, and if, by the law of the domicile of the other party, it is not enough to set up the contract that performance so made has been accepted, then all that is left is an action to recover what has passed.³⁸ (Condictio indebiti sine causa in Roman law.) Most cases, however, will not turn upon this question, but upon whether the party who has already done, or alleges that he has done, his part, shall be satisfied with the minus, which is all that the law of the other party allows him.

³² Cf. Savigny, § 369; Guthrie, p. 195; and Wächter, ii. p. 45. Judgment of the Sup Ct. of App. Rostock, 3rd Nov. 1862 (Seuffert, xix. § 5).

³⁴ But if the one party has performed in accordance with the law which his country recognises, the result is, that no further demand can be made on him, but not necessarily that the other party must on his side recognise this performance as sufficient, so as to bind him to perform his part. The distinction does not seem to have been clearly taken in the judgment of the Imperial Court of Germany (vi.) of 27th June 1887, reported by Bolze, Praxis, iv. § 27, p. 7. The law of the place in which the manufactory of the seller stood was held to regulate the conditions of the sale, because the seller had to perform his part at this place.

THE PERSONAL LAW OF THE DEBTOR IS ONLY AS A GENERAL RULE DECISIVE.

³⁵ So, too, Windscheid: "As, however, the creditor is the person to make the demand, he must, in order that he may make a demand, accept the law of the debtor's domicile, if he, the debtor, takes his stand on this law, but conversely the law of his, the creditor's, own domicile may have to be taken, if it suits the debtor to appeal to it."

³⁶ Cf. Story, § 284. Judgment of the Court of Appeal from the Rhine Provinces at Berlin, 21st September 1831 (Volkmar, p. 141).

³⁷ See infra, § 252, on the point that the personal law in such matters is the law of the domicile.

broadly that no general rules at all can be recognised in connection with the law of obligations are to a certain extent, and indeed one might say in many respects, in the right.

In the first place, the provisions of the law of obligation often rest upon the consideration of circumstances that are purely local. If it were proposed to apply these provisions uniformly to the contracts of subjects into which they had entered in a foreign country, and which were to be performed abroad, the purpose of the legislature in making these provisions would be far overstepped, and natives living for a time abroad would find it very difficult, and often impossible, to carry on trade and commerce. No one, for instance, would hold that a tax imposed upon the sale of particular articles of subsistence in one country should be leviable in the case of these goods being sold in a foreign market by a native of the former country. The like, too, must in reason hold good of limitations on the rate of interest. If in some foreign country, where a subject of this country has an estate or a trading house, a higher rate of interest than ours is allowed and is in use, by reason that capital is more scarce, or the security is not so good, then the foreign lender with whose money the estate has been improved, or the trading concern extended, is entitled, even in our courts, to demand his higher rate of interest as was arranged. The restrictions on the rate of interest are local taxes upon the price of money. The opposite theory, instead of benefiting our citizens, would destroy their credit, since the foreign judge would certainly pay no attention to our law upon this head.⁴⁰ It is of much more consequence whether the money lent has been expended here or abroad. In the first case, the local limitations upon interest receive effect, but not in the second, for the interest is the price paid for the leave to apply the money. Thus, too, it is the law of the foreign country as to interest, and not ours, that decides a question where one native of this country lends another a sum for the improvement of an estate in a foreign country. On the other hand, our law on the subject must be applied if a foreigner lends one of our subjects money for the improvement of an estate in this country, or for the extension of a business carried on here. It is plain what an advantage this theory has over that which rests upon purely external characteristics, by which the law of the place of performance or of the execution of the contract is applied in every case. The application of our laws is fully ensured, while they are not allowed to hamper foreign trade by their interference. Our task will partly consist in testing the different rules of law, with a view to determining whether they rest upon local considerations such as we have mentioned.

⁴⁰ Cf. Stephen, ii. p. 82. He says, in reference to the limitation of the rate of interest: "The statutory prohibitions, it will be observed, have always been confined to English transactions, for if a contract which carries interest be made in a foreign country, our courts will direct the payment of interest according to the law of that country in which the contract was made. Thus Irish, American, Turkish, and Indian interest have been allowed in our courts to the amount of even 12 per cent. (though by Statute 13 Geo. III. cap. 63, § 30, British subjects in the East Indies are prohibited from taking more than 12 per cent.), for the moderation or exorbitance of interest depends on local circumstances, and the refusal to enforce such contracts would put a stop to all foreign trade. And by Statute 12 Geo. III. cap. 79; and Geo. IV. cap. 47, all mortgages or securities for money lent on lands, tenements, or hereditaments in Ireland or the West India Colonies, bearing interest above 5 per cent., but not above what is allowed by the law of the place, shall be valid although executed in Great Britain, and whether the interest be made payable in Great Britain or in the country where the property is situate." The words in italics are quoted from Blackstone. In this we have the express testimony of a system of law much concerned with the interests of commerce, to the effect that native rules of law are not to be applied even to the subjects of that country themselves.

In the second place—and here we shall find the second part of the task furnished for us by the law of obligation—it is among all civilised peoples of the present day a rule of the law of obligations, that all such relations are to be determined in the ultimate resort by bona fides.⁴¹ Even in such a case as the law of bills, where apparently considerations of strict law decide, this very strictness, which protects the person who has acquired his rights bona fide by means of the littera scripta, rests upon the principle that every one may rely upon this littera scripta, without having to fear the many objections that may be taken by the debtor. In cases, then, where the application of the law recognised at the domicile of the debtor would do violence to bona fides, while other local laws would indubitably support it, then the latter and not the former is the law which, by the unanimous voice of all systems of legislation, must decide. We have already seen that no trade could go on at fairs, markets, or on exchanges, if both parties could appeal to the law of their domiciles to regulate the ordinary contracts of these markets, etc. The difference in the laws which prevail at the domicile of this or that seller would make it impossible for a buyer to determine which offer was the more favourable, taking into account the possible loss or deterioration of the goods, as well as the time allowed for payment and delivery. Commerce demands that there shall be one law that shall necessarily determine the import of all contracts for all buyers and sellers alike, and the only possible one in such cases is the law of the place where the contract was concluded.⁴² If appeal is made to another law, violence is done to the principle of bona fides. The following cases may serve as illustrations: A person owns a trading establishment abroad; he cannot suppose that the law of his domicile can be applied to contracts concluded abroad in connection with that establishment. Another contracts debts for his subsistence abroad, or opens an hotel; he cannot avoid liability by an appeal to the law of his domicile. Another delivers goods abroad to a railway company for carriage; the law that is recognised in the country where the railway is situated determines the meaning of the contract of freight.⁴³ The managers of a railway cannot be supposed to make different contracts with each individual, according to his caprice or his probable intention. A person who uses the railway in the ordinary manner must be subject to the law that is recognised at the place where it is situated. On the other hand, the very requirements of bona fides may place one of the parties under a law, which, in the particular case, is the most unfavourable to him of all the laws that could be applied. E.g. A foreign railway or shipping company keeps an office in A, where contracts are made. Any one who contracts with the company in A, may appeal as he pleases to the law that is recognised there, or to the law which regulates the company generally. It is the company's business to meet any possible conflicts of the two systems by conditions of which special notice must be given. This consideration may perhaps supply the solution of the case of Cohen v. The South-Eastern Railway Company, which was decided in England, and has been so much criticised.

⁴² Cf. a judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin of the 26th September 1849: "Contracts made by our subjects abroad, which are to be put in force in this country, will, in ordinary circumstances, lead us to the conclusion that the parties meant to subject themselves to the law of this country. But this conclusion cannot be drawn in the case of contracts as to moveables, which are at once performed by both parties, as, for instance, a bargain concluded and carried out as to the sale of cattle in a foreign cattle market" (Entscheidungen, vol. 18, p. 150). A bargain made at the market, which does not rank among those ordinarily made there, is to be otherwise judged of, e.g. a contract for the sale of an estate, which is accidentally made at the market. It is of no moment that the parties who make the contract during the fair or market, and within the territory to which it belongs, are subjects of the same foreign State. Judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 3rd April 1856 (Striethorst, 20, p. 303).

[1877, L.R. 2, Ex. Div. 253. The pursuer brought an action against an English Railway Company, which was subject to the English Railway Statutes, and was authorised to run steamers between Boulogne and Folkestone, for damage done to her luggage at Folkestone. She was an English subject, and had taken out her ticket at Folkestone. The Court held that as the Company were admittedly responsible by French law, and, assuming the contract to be regulated by English law, were responsible by that law also, it was not necessary to determine which law ruled. Their inclination was, however, to hold that English law ruled. Lord Justice Brett threw out the opinion that different laws might rule at different stages of a journey which has to be performed through different countries. That would seem to be contrary to any reasonable assumption as to the intention of parties and the bona fides of the contract. See Foote, p. 425.]

In this connection the place of performance, too, is of importance. In the first place, it has to be ascertained whether the whole transaction, from its nature, must be developed and carried out where it was entered upon.⁴⁴ If, even without a special agreement, performance must take place where

⁴⁴ Cf. Dudley Field, § 601: "A contract made and agreed expressly or tacitly to be performed within the jurisdiction of the same nation, is governed by the law of that nation." E.g. debts which are to be looked upon as the daily expenditure of a person on a journey, or spending some time at a watering-place, or as a student at an university, must undoubtedly the contract was concluded, then, as a general rule, the whole transaction belongs to the law of that country, whereas the local law of the contract is not to be displaced by selecting some other place of performance purely at random.⁴⁵ In the same way, the choice of a particular place of performance will regulate the obligation, if a prohibitive law of the place in which the contract is made⁴⁶ stands in its way, or in so far as the will of the parties pronounces indirectly in favour of attaching to the performance modifications provided by the law of the place of performance. The latter⁴⁷ is the case where a certain sum of money is promised, to which a different value is attached at the place where the contract is concluded from that obtaining at the place of payment; or if a contract bears to be for delivery of a certain quantity, expressed according to a measure of weight, to which different meanings are given at different places. Payment can only be made, or the goods measured or weighed out, as a rule, at the place of performance, according to the currency or the measures or weights in use there; and this justifies the understanding that parties, when they concluded their contract, had no other currency, measure, or weight in view. If, for instance, a bill is drawn in Constantinople upon London for £100, the holder of the bill is entitled to demand £100 in English, and not in Turkish currency.⁴⁸

be dealt with according to the law of the place in question, where the person spent his time. (Cf. Savigny, § 370; Guthrie, p. 207; and Wharton, §§ 414, 415.) The contract, by which a traveller bound himself after leaving the service of the pursuer not to sell or manufacture her articles, is to be regulated by the law of the place where the contract was made, where the pursuer was domiciled. Ct. of the Empire (ii.) 11th February 1887 (Bolze, Praxis, iv. § 21, p. 6).

The judgment of the Appeal Court of Genoa of 30th April 1886, reported in Journal xv. p. 290, contains a decision which agrees no doubt with the literal text of the Italian Code, but in my opinion does not correspond with the circumstances of the case, by which the law of the country of the parties was applied to transactions upon a foreign exchange.

⁴⁶ See on this point the following paragraph.

⁴⁷ German Commercial Code, art. 327: "If the time of performance is said to be spring or autumn, or the like, then the usage of trade at the place of performance rules." Art. 336: "Measure, weight, standard of coinage, coinage, measure of time and distance, recognised at the place of performance are, in doubt, to be held as regulating the contract. Cf., too, art. 352. Art. 353: "If, in making the bargain, the market price or the price of the exchange is fixed as the price, then, in doubt, the current price at the time and at the place of performance, or the trade centre that determines prices for that place, is to be thereby understood." Cf. art. 569 as to the time for loading vessels. (The regulations of the port, or, failing them, the usage of the place, is to rule.)

[In the case of Ainslie v. Murrays, 1881, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. viii. 636, two litigants in the courts of Scotland, both of whom were resident in Scotland, agreed to settle the action on condition that the defenders should grant the pursuer's firm a power of attorney to sell certain property in Rangoon, and to pay them-

But this rule is not to be applied if, from the circumstances, we may infer that parties had in the particular case some other end in view. For instance, if a loan is made in Constantinople in currency, and London is fixed upon as the place of repayment, the debtor has only to refund £100 Turkish currency, since the essence of such a contract is that the debtor has, putting interest out of the question, only a duty to repay what he got. If, to take another illustration, in a contract of sale, the currency of the place of payment would give either an unreasonably high or a disproportionately low price for the goods, while the currency of the place where the contract was concluded would give an ordinary price, it cannot be assumed that parties have had the former in view.

In contracts affecting immoveables, performance can only take place on the part of the person giving a permanent or temporary right over such property, at the place where the thing is. Setting aside the consideration that performance is in this way always subject to the prohibitive laws in force at the place where the thing is, and that real rights in immoveables can only be given in the forms of the lex rei sitæ, and, therefore, that there is from the first the probability of a reference to that law, the person who acquires a right of use, or a personal claim to the use of a parcel of property, generally contemplates taking up a permanent residence in the place where the thing is, and at the same time we may assume that both the disponent and the possessor are acquainted with the lex rei sitæ.

In doubt, then, contracts as to landed property must be interpreted in accordance with the lex rei sitæ,⁴⁹ although the circumstances of a particular case may lead to a different result,^{50 51} which accounts for the opinions which some authors have adopted at variance with that which we have maintained.

selves a sum of £4250 out of the proceeds; if the proceeds fell short of that sum, the defenders were to pay the difference. The properties being sold, and the price being paid in rupees, which are worth in Rangoon 2s., but in Scotland only 1s. 8d., the total sum realised being in any view less than £4250, the question arose whether the price was to be credited on the basis of the Rangoon value or the Scots value. The latter was adopted, two of the judges holding that it must be so, because Scotland was the locus solutionis—Lord Shand agreeing in the result, because the contract was for the sum of £4250, i.e. a sum of English currency; that the parties intended to make up that sum, and that the debtor could not escape for less. Like the author, his lordship examines what was the true intention of parties.]

It is, therefore, by no means my intention to raise the personal law of the parties to the position of an exclusive rule, and that is my answer to the objections which v. Martens (§ 77) has urged against the principle I have maintained. We come pretty near the theory, which,

D. is set up by several authorities of repute in the most modern treatises,⁵² the theory that no universal principle at all can be set up for contract law. But the theory is somewhat too indefinite. It may no doubt happen that, testing the case by its concrete circumstances, which this theory says are to be decisive, the result is a complete "non liquet," and then it may be that the personal law of the parties is all that is left. But at all events we must not, like v. Martens, confuse the concrete circumstances of the case with the concrete or express intentions of the parties as to the law that is to be applied (see supra, § 247 ad fin.). Again, we must not fancy that no general rules at all can be set up in the law of obligations, but that each particular case must be decided according to some undefined instinct. It is no reason for not discussing the question on general and scientific principles, that it is not possible to determine all conceivable cases on the lines of a single principle, or that there are cases on the boundary line between one principle and another, which can only be resolved with an admission that there is doubt about the matter.

LAW OF DOMICILE OR OF NATIONALITY?

§ 252. The next question that has to be answered, if or in so far as the personal law of the parties is to be taken as our guide, is, Is it the law of the domicile, or the law of the nationality or citizenship of the parties, that is to be understood? The answer is plain, from what has already been said. As matter of principle, it is the law of the nationality that must rule; but it is excluded in so far as the nature of the subject persuades us that the relation of obligation in question will be completely developed in another country, i.e. the country of the domicile. But this exception will invariably occur in the case of obligations which take their rise in the free contract will and intention of the parties. As a rule, we cannot suppose that a ⁵² Stobbe, § 33; v. Martens, § 79. This seems to be the result of Wharton's discussion, §§ 393 et seq.

The practice of England and of the United States sometimes applies the law of the place of execution, sometimes that of the place of performance. Cf. Westlake Holtzendorff. [The Lord-President of the Court of Session in Scotland lays down very much the doctrine of the text. "By the term locus contractus is sometimes understood the place of making the contract, . . . but in general what is meant is the locality as ascertained from the nature of the contract itself, and what is to be done under it." Valery v. Scott, 1876, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. iii. 965. Storey, § 280, takes the law of the place of performance to be the general rule, but remarks, § 282, that it is "often a matter of serious question whether that law or that of the place where it is made should prevail." The rule in England is to be fixed by substantial considerations, the preference being given to the country with which the transaction has the most real connection, and not to the law of the place of contract as such.] The influence of Savigny's teaching has, as Rivier (p. 72) truly remarks, made itself much felt in modern times. We must not, however, forget that very frequently the place of performance is the domicile of one or other of the parties.

party to a contract should propose, that his contract relation should for the first time come into full play and development, when he shall have given up his present residence or domicile. Besides, an appeal to the law of nationality will in fact result in violation of bona fides. It may very well be that to ascertain the capacity of a person to contract, one may have to refer to a certain extent to his national law: but we cannot, in view of the despatch with which ordinary commercial contracts are often, or must often be made, measure each and every stipulation of a contract by the national law of the other party. Just as the place of the making of the contract is, in this sphere, generally strong enough to drive the personal law of the parties into the background, so a similar force must be attributed to the law of the domicile as against that of the nationality. It is therefore unsound to give, as the Italian Code, § 9, Alin 2 disposizione sulla pubblicazione, and § 7 of the new Belgian proposed code give, most weight to the national law of the two contracting parties, and not so much to that of their domicile.⁵³

IMPORT OF THE PRINCIPLE OF THE LAW OF THE DEBTOR'S DOMICILE.

§ 253. Our opinion, however, is that the decision of the points that arise in this subject by the law of the debtor's domicile is in principle and theoretically the only unassailable starting-point. We do not mean to say by any means that, as a matter of fact, this law must be applied to the majority of cases, and that it is the rule in that sense. Just as little does the theory we maintain go the length of asserting that, in each and every relation, the contract obligation is always subject to one and the same territorial law. An obligation, which in certain respects is subject to the law of the place where the intention of the parties was declared, may, as we noticed, be subject to the law of the place of performance as regards certain conditions of performance, while in some other respects the law of the place where action is brought may have a bearing upon it. And, on the other hand, there are rules as to the discharge of existing obligations, which, once established by the lex domicilii of the debtor, demand universal recognition: such as, for example, are the total or partial discharge of the obligation by the operation of a negative prescription, and the discharge of the debtor, which, according to some systems, is in certain circumstances operated by bankruptcy. If the object of some particular rule of law can only be attained by leaving the lex loci contractus, or the law of the place of performance, entirely out of account, the judex domicilii is bound to apply that rule thoroughly.

If effect be given to these modifications, the view which we have adopted is no longer open to the criticism that, while it may no doubt be suitable for the cases in which the judex domicilii of the debtor is competent, it is not adapted to give rules for decision to another judge, e.g. the judex loci contractus or the judex domicilii creditoris, who have nothing to do with the protection of the person of the debtor. If we have excluded the purely local provisions of statutes recognised only at the place of his domicile, and, from consideration for bona fides and what may be presumed to be the intention of parties, have allowed the law of the place where the contract is concluded or is to be performed to have its operation, we have done enough to secure the intercourse of our subjects with foreigners; for no one can be disappointed in any well-founded expectation (bona fides) that his own law will be applied to relations of obligation entered into with foreigners: this our limitations have ensured; and if they are not applicable in any particular case, the foreign judge is all the more under obligation to recognise the lex domicilii of the debtor, since, if he were in every case to apply the lex loci contractus or the law of the place of performance, then, as we have seen, he could never succeed in having the law of his own country observed abroad. We undertake to show in the sequel that, where practice and the most approved authorities take the law of the place where the contract is made or is to be performed as their principle, our view, too, leads as certainly to that result, without carrying with it the inevitable consequences, prejudicial to all sense of justice and equity, which accompany the unbending application either of the law of the place of the performance, or of the place where the contract is made.

If objection shall be taken to the principles laid down by us, because they are capable of various meanings, and so leave scope for capricious interpretations, we may answer by pointing to the impossibility of expressing fully in any code, or for one particular positive law, the principles of bona fides which govern the law of obligations. The cases, for instance, which the rich casuistry of Justinian's Pandects exhibits are mere illustrations which, by analogy, the lawyer may apply to the endless multiplicity of relations of obligation. We have less right to require of a system of international law what cannot be attained even for a particular system of positive law. If the cases which have hitherto supplied the most important material for questions of international obligation are discussed by us in such a way that those other questions, on which we shall not bestow particular attention, may be determined from the analogy of those that are fully dealt with, then we may fairly consider that our task is complete, because the rest may be left to judicial determination in each case as it arises.

FORMULATION BY LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENT.

§ 254. It is, however, an affair of the utmost difficulty to formulate in legislation the principle of private international law which shall regulate the law of obligations. That is at once demonstrated by a reference to the attempts in the Italian Code and the new Belgian Draft Code to do so.

The Italian Code, in § 9 of its preliminary rules, provides: "The import and the effects of obligations are held to be regulated by the law of the place in which the documents were executed, and if the contracting parties are foreigners belonging to the same nation, by the law of their nationality. In every case an exception is made if some intention to another effect can be shown to exist."

The application of the law of the place of execution is thus held to be the rule. But that is not quite suitable for the performance of the obligation, which to some extent necessarily, and to some extent reasonably and presumably, is subject to the law of the place of performance. The leading exception, however, in accordance with which, if both parties belong to the same nationality, their contract is to be regulated by the law of that nationality, is, in very many cases, in palpable contradiction of what the nature of the subject and the ideas of the parties demand. If the parties do not know each other to be fellow-countrymen, they will often as a matter of necessity believe—and especially if they consult the Italian Code—that their bargain will be ruled by the lex loci contractus; and even if they recognise each other as countrymen, it is quite out of place to call in their national law in the case of bargains which are concluded at fairs and markets, or on public exchanges, as we have already noticed. Again, the reasonable consideration to take into account would seem to be, not whether the parties belong to the same State, but whether the personal law of the one in the case of the particular contract is identical with that of the other in its provisions, especially as we know that in different provinces of the same State different rules of law are recognised. Accordingly, the Belgian Draft Code, after providing in the same way at the outset, § 7:⁵⁴—

"Les obligations conventionnelles et les leurs effets sont réglés par la loi du lieu du contrat," has this subsection:—

"Toute fois, préférence est donnée aux lois nationales des contractants, si ces lois disposent d'une manière identique."

But if the parties are not aware of this agreement of their laws—and such knowledge is often a much more difficult thing to achieve than a knowledge of nationality—they will in the end be dealt with by a law, the application of which they could not foresee. Again, the same considerations may be urged against this theory as may be put against the Italian formula. Against both we have this further objection to make, in accordance with the exposition we have given, that the law of the domicile will better suit what may be presumed to be the intention of the parties, than will their national law. If a German e.g. has been for twenty years—it may be said his early youth—domiciled abroad, and has carried on business there, are we to believe that he had in his mind, not the law of his domicile, but the law of his nationality?

But, it is said, both the Italian Code and the Belgian Draft say in the end, that the intention of parties to some other effect shall be allowed to prevail. This intention, however, must by some special circumstance be shown to exist, and if any force at all is to be attributed to the foregoing rules, they must at least have the force of presumptions. Thus either the difficulty of proof will involve the application of the foregoing rules to cases to which they are quite inappropriate, or these rules will sink almost to the point of being meaningless. And, lastly, what are we to understand by the "will" or the "intention," as the Belgian Draft calls it, of the parties?

If the will of the parties be expressly declared, it must, of course, be allowed to determine the meaning of the legal transaction, in so far as that will does not come into conflict with coercitive laws. If parties in Berlin e.g. expressly declare that they are entering upon some mercantile contract according to the usance of Bremen, no one will doubt that the Bremen usance is applicable to the case. But where there is no such express declaration—and that is the general case—the question will be one, not so much of the intention of parties, as of the nature of the subject, although, no doubt, we are not altogether without real indications of intention which are implied, not expressed, as, for instance, where the parties use the technical legal language of some particular country.⁵⁵ It may, perhaps, have been in truth a confusion of the nature of the subject with the implied intention of the parties, which led the framers of the new Belgian Draft to the following singular limitation on the intentions of parties:—

"Ces règles ne sont pas applicables si, de l'intention des parties expressément ou manifestée par les circonstances, il résulte qu'elles ont entendu soumettre leur convention à une loi déterminée. La faculté accordée, à cet égard, aux parties contractantes, ne peut avoir pour objet que la loi nationale de l'une d'entre elles au moins, la loi du lieu du contrat ou la loi du lieu où celui-ci doit être exécuté."

If, for instance, some custom of trade, which prevails at a particular place, has proved itself of great practical value, why should parties not be at liberty to adopt it as the basis of their contract, supposing that no coercitive law intervenes, even although their contract should have nothing whatever to do with the place where the usage prevails.⁵⁶ This restriction may, perhaps, turn out in the future to be a serious drawback upon Belgian trade.

Perhaps we might draw up a statutory enactment in some such form as this:—

"In so far as contract obligations are to be determined by a foreign law, the determination must be in accordance with the nature of the subject, and must respect the mode of satisfying the contract which has been expressly or by implication provided by the parties. In so far as in this way neither the law of the place where the contract was made nor the law of the place of performance falls to be applied, each of the parties will be ruled by the law of his domicile, and in so far as the law which regulates the matter does not contain coercitive provisions to the contrary, the parties are at liberty, either expressly or by implication, to subject themselves to another law."

In view of the indefinite character which must necessarily attach to all provisions, dealing with the law of obligations in its international aspects, that are not distorted, it may perhaps be asked whether it would not be better to refrain from any provision on the subject by way of statutory enactment.

B. PARTICULAR QUESTIONS.

1. SUBJECT OF THE OBLIGATION. LEGALITY OF THE TRANSACTION. (EVASION OF FOREIGN FISCAL REGULATIONS.)¹

§ 255. We have already noticed (cf. § 248) that an obligation is invalid everywhere, if the transaction which constitutes the subject of the obligation, is an act which is forbidden at the place that is selected, as, or is necessarily presumed to be, the place of performance.² E.g. a man binds himself to deliver some particular materials for the manufacture of drink at a place in which such manufacture is forbidden. Conversely, however, the obligation is valid, although the transaction is illegal at the place where the contract is made, if it is to be carried out altogether at a place where it is legal.³

It has, however, been proposed to make an exception to this rule in the case of prohibitions which rest on purely fiscal grounds. The most important example of this is where it is forbidden to import certain wares where the customs laws of foreign countries are to be evaded. It is often maintained that, in such cases, the judge should look upon a transaction that has that end in view as a legal transaction. Pardessus⁴ says that, in so far as customs duties go, States live in a kind of war with one another, and older authors, such as Emérigon⁵ and Straccha,⁶ express themselves in

² Cf. Günther, p. 740; Massé, ii. p. 116; Wheaton, p. 116; Wächter, ii. p. 404; Story, § 246; Huber, i. 3, § 5; Mittermaier, i. § 31, note 9; Wharton, § 486; Fiore, §§ 280, 281; Stobbe, § 33, note 5a; Field, § 604; Foote, pp. 288, 297. It will be understood that all authors who make the place of performance the rule in every case are to be reckoned here. But the impossibility of performance as a matter of fact or a matter of law is to be tested by the state of circumstances and of the law at the place of performance. Sup. Ct. of App. Lübeck 31st October 1859 (Seuffert, xiv. § 195).

⁵ I. chap. 8, § 58.

a similar fashion. This ground, however, may justify retaliation, but can never justify the principle itself of refusing recognition to the revenue laws of other States; for, as Vattel remarks,⁷ every sovereign has the right of limiting the import or export of particular goods, without thereby giving other States, who claim the same right for themselves, any ground to complain. It comes to this, that it can hardly ever be possible to transgress foreign revenue laws without deceiving the officers of that Government—a proceeding which can never be regarded as creditable. An obligation which requires such a deception needs no more to show it to be necessarily regarded as invalid. But, as a matter of fact, this view gains more and more support daily.⁸

Of course, contracts which aim at an invasion of recognised principles of public law are also invalid. Such as are loans for the support of ⁷ I. ch. 8, § 90.

⁸ Pothier, des assurances, § 58; Story, §§ 245-257. According to Story's and Massé's notes, the English authors Marshall and Chitty, and the French jurist Delangle, adopt the same theory. Pfeiffer, Prakt. Ausführ. iii. p. 85. Mohl (Staatsrecht, Völkerrecht, i. pp. 724, 725) refutes at the same time the view that the State which favours contraventions of foreign revenue laws has any permanent advantages to expect from it: "Revenue laws are an essential means of compelling all classes of subjects to contribute to the burdens of the State; and, therefore, the maintenance of manifold rights and privileges, which every State is bound most completely to ensure to its subjects, is dependent upon their observance." At the least, as Mohl remarks, the opposite view must be rested upon the belief that advantage may somehow be drawn from this system of smuggling. By the same reasoning, theft, robbery, murder, and swindling in a foreign country will be supported. See the judgment of the Supreme Court of Cassel, of 13th December 1828, reported by Pfeiffer, pp. 85, 86, which pronounced for the nullity of a contract directed to the evasion of foreign revenue laws, as being intended to withdraw from the State in question a right founded on law; and the fact that the courts of Hesse had no jurisdiction to impose punishment in such cases could not be decisive. In the same sense Heffter, § 32, note 8; Fiore, § 287; Laurent, viii. § 114; Brocher, ii. § 159, p. 92; Weiss, p. 802, and Westlake, § 213, all express themselves to the same effect. C. de Bruxelles, 17th February 1886 (J. xiv. p. 214), the court holding that a contract, the object of which was to smuggle in France, was null. In France the question is unsettled, although the tendency is towards the view taken in the text (cf. C. de Pau, 2nd July 1886, and Clunet, J. xiv. p. 57). The case of a contract directed not merely to smuggling, but also to the corruption of the foreign officials, is beyond all question. Massé, ii. No. 83, "La corruption quelque soit le but qu'elle se propose étant contraire aux principes de morale universelle. . . . C'est ce qui a été jugé par un decret de la Cour royale de Pau du 11 Juillet 1834." The grounds of a judgment of the Supreme Court at Lübeck, of 14th June 1886 (Seuffert, xxi. § 32), are to the opposite effect. It is said that the view, that the transgression of foreign revenue laws is to be considered inadmissible, has not yet spread among commercial nations. So long as this is so, competition must tempt nations to set themselves above the revenue laws of their neighbours. In the result we may concur in this judgment; for the question related to an entirely arbitrary prohibition of through carriage, of which the pursuer knew nothing, and was not bound to know anything, whereas the carrier, who was sued for damages, ought to have known of it. On the part of the pursuer, therefore, there was no intention of evading the foreign law. The question whether a transaction has for its object the evasion of revenue laws does not belong to international law; it is to be determined by the actual circumstances of the particular case, and this is a solution of the variety of the judgments reported by Story, § 251. In one case the transaction was not declared void, although the person who sold the goods knew that they were to be smuggled, because it was necessary, in order to produce that legal result, that the smuggling of the goods should form part of the contract, or that the seller should himself contribute in some way to the smuggling, e.g. by packing the goods in some special way. In the other case the contrary was found.

rebellions in a foreign country, or contracts for supplies to a belligerent State, in so far as the principles of neutrality are thereby infringed. The principles of public law are a part of the legal system of every civilised State.⁹

Undoubtedly, however, a distinction may be taken between the legality of the act, which constitutes the subject of the obligation, and the legality of the [antecedent] engagement. [For an instance of this distinction, see the case of Santos, 1860, 8, C. B. N. S. p. 861, where it was held that a Brazilian might sue a British subject for delivery of slaves sold in Brazil, where slavery is legal, although a British subject might be held to have committed felony under a British statute if he had bought or sold or held slaves even in Brazil.]

As a general rule, no regard need be paid to the law of the domicile or residence of parties, in so far as police prohibitions are concerned: for police prohibitions do not bind subjects in a foreign country. It might, of course, be that the State, by an order in that form, should bind all its subjects, even though they should happen to be abroad; but that must be distinctly enacted, and third States would have to refuse absolutely to uphold such prohibitions, by giving them extra-territorial execution.

The law of the place where action is brought rules, however, to this extent, that the judge cannot by his sentence compel any act which, by the law of his country, must be regarded as immoral, even although it was intended to do the act in some other country; and, in the same way, the judge may not work out any contract which encroaches on the law of his own country. It is, however, to be remembered, that a legal relation which in its nature belongs to another country, for that very reason does no violence to the law of this country, and for that reason, as we have already noticed (§ 36), may often have to be recognised by the judge of this country as a fact.

NOTE Q ON § 255. SMUGGLING, ETC.

[The doctrine recognised in England and the United States may be learned from the statements of Westlake and Wharton, to which the author refers. With regard to smuggling, the doctrine of the English law is stated by Addison (on Contracts, p. 99) to be that a foreigner who sells goods abroad, which are intended to be smuggled into this country, cannot sue on the contract of sale, if he shares in the illegal transaction, or packs the goods in a particular way to facilitate their being smuggled. But he may sue for the price of the goods in an English court, even although he knew that they were intended to be smuggled, if he does not actually aid the act of smuggling.

The law of Scotland is to the same effect, and is there stated in a judgment of the Court of Session in 1793 (Cullen & Co. v. Philp, Morison's Dict. p. 9554): "When a merchant settled abroad, whether a foreigner or native of this country, simply sells goods to a smuggler, tanquam quilibet, and makes delivery on the spot, he can maintain action for them in our courts, though he suspected, or even knew, that they were meant to be smuggled into Britain; but if he is accessory to the smuggling, and thereby to an infringement of the laws of the land (which he is bound to know as far as concerns his trade), he cannot demand the aid of the British courts for recovery of his debt." The same doctrine is stated by Prof. Bell, Comm. i. pp. 326, 327. Foreigners and natives who are directly accessory to the smuggling, or are participant in it, are denied all right of action in respect of the goods. But the law of the country in which the contract is made, is to be applied in favour of natives of this country and foreigners alike, where there is a sale independent of the smuggling, even although the vendor knew to what purpose the purchase was to be turned.

⁹ Cf. Wharton, §§ 495, 496, and the decisions there cited.

But the courts of Scotland will not refuse to enforce a contract for smuggling into a foreign country, or for any other end which is pronounced, by the law of the country where the contract was made, or that of the country in which it is to be carried out, to be null as being forbidden by the laws of these countries, if it is not condemned by the law of Scotland as in itself immoral (per Ld. Justice Clerk Moncreiff in Gelot v. Stewart, 1871, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. ix. 1057). A common instance of the application of this rule is in connection with the stamp laws of a foreign country, see supra, p. 289 et seq. Again, the court seem to have held that they would allow one American to sue another for implément of a contract entered into in the Confederate States during the civil war, with reference to a mercantile adventure to be carried out by running the blockade of the southern ports, which had been established by the Federal fleet, on the footing that the Confederate and Federal parties were true belligerents; but that, if it should be ascertained that the Confederates were mere rebels, i.e. citizens of the United States engaged in illegal acts, then the court would perforce hold that the whole transaction was illegal, and could not receive any effect, since no contract between American citizens to furnish munitions of war to be used against their own country could be legal (Clements v. Macaulay, 1866, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. iv. p. 583). The legality of two natives of England, however, arranging for the supply of munitions of war to belligerents is not doubtful, unless it is prohibited by statutory authority. See cases cited in Wharton, § 496, especially ex parte Chavasse 1865. De. G. J. and S. 655.]

2. INTERPRETATION OF CONTRACTS.

§ 256. The interpretation of contracts¹ is assumed by some authors to include the whole subject matter of contracts, in so far as that is capable of modification at the pleasure of the parties. But it is better, with

¹ See Savigny, § 374; Guthrie, pp. 243, 244; Fiore, § 271; Wharton, §§ 431-439; Laurent, vii. §§ 479-482.

Savigny, to confine the subject of the interpretation of legal transactions to the doubts which may spring from the wording of them. No definite and adequate general rule for the interpretation of legal transactions in this sense can be laid down for international law, any more than any one general rule can be laid down to control such interpretation within the domain of any one local law, the latter problem being, strictly speaking, identical with that which is presented to us. In the one case, as in the other, the whole matter consists in ascertaining the true intention of the parties from their words, their acts, and the circumstances.

Indirectly, however, the question, what local law rules the transaction, is of importance, in so far as, supposing that bona fides demands the application of the law of the place where the contract was made, the same consideration will induce us to interpret it according to the phraseology in use there: for the intention of one of the parties only cannot be decisive; we must also enquire whether that intention was made intelligible to the other party. Savigny does not bethink himself of this circumstance, and he comes therefore to the contradictory result, that while the local law which is to be applied is a matter to be determined according to the presumed intention of the parties, and in consequence the law of the place of performance is to be the universal rule, the interpretation of contracts, a matter depending just as much on the presumed intention of the parties, is to be tested, in so far as phraseology and the construction of terms are concerned, by the law of some place other than that of the performance of the contract.²

Of special importance is the language which the parties have used, and the place where the transaction was concluded:³ in cases in which the parties do not meet, the place from which the relative writings are dated is of weight,⁴ and in the case of offers, proceeding from the one party, and

² Most authors recognise this close connection of the interpretation with the local law regulative of the contract in other respects. Story, §§ 272, 280. But yet, it is going too far to say that they never diverge. See Boullenois, ii. pp. 494-498. Especially may this fact be of importance, that one has passed a long time in a foreign country; in such cases, in certain circumstances, one might have to use the fashion of speech in use at that place, instead of that of one's own domicile.

³ But this place may be quite immaterial, if, for instance, the presence of the parties there is purely accidental, both of them being domiciled somewhere else, and, it may be, at the same place. In such cases, too, it will not be altogether a matter of indifference, whether or not the parties knew each other to be countrymen. To this effect, Imperial Court of Germany (11), 13th December 1887 (Bolze, Praxis, v. No. 20). [“Take the case of two Scotsmen, meeting in Paris, who contract regarding the disposal of a moveable in Scotland. It is of no consequence that they happen both to be in Paris.” Lord President Inglis, in Valery v. Scott, 1876, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. iii. 965.]

simply accepted by the other, the terminology of the offerer must be taken as the rule.⁵ One who makes a demand for the services of a tradesman, must, unless he stipulates to a different effect, pay him at the rate which is recognised at the place where he carries on his business;⁶ and in support of that result it may be said, that the tradesman has in a way, by carrying on a trade there, offered his services once for all at the seat of his place of business.⁷

The rules of interpretation furnished by the law of Rome, according to which, in case of doubt, the interpretation was to be against the stipulator, the seller, and the lessor,⁸ are not against us. They are dealing with interpretation within one and the same language and terminology, they do not touch the question which of several terminologies or languages is applicable.⁹

Accepting, however, the view which I have maintained as to the treatment of the law of obligations in general, we shall as a rule, so soon as we know what local law is to rule the particular case, determine at that moment what terminology is to be adopted for its interpretation. It will almost require the use of a foreign language, or of some special technical expression, to give any other result.

We have avoided setting up too abstract rules for the determination of international law on this point, and, on the other hand, we are not, as we have said, of opinion, that the bare intention of one of the parties, which presents no point to attract the notice of the other, has a claim for our consideration. That is the shortest way of putting the matter.

3. CONDITIONS OF THE VALIDITY OF CONTRACTS AND OF THE ENFORCEMENT OF THEM BY ACTION. (PROHIBITION OF LOTTERIES.) CHALLENGE OF CONTRACTS.

§ 257. The validity of contracts and their force in judgment may depend upon the observance of a particular form. We have already cannot demand more than what he has suffered.) Trib. Comm. de Caen, 7th September 1883 (J. xi. p. 282); to the same effect in a similar case, see Clunet, ibid. p. 284. Wächter (Archiv. f. d. civil. Praxis, vol. xix. p. 121) gives the following case: An insurance company at Leipzig had in its printed conditions excepted the case of destruction by riot (Aufbruch). In a conflagration which occurred in a foreign country, the question arose, whether the legal idea of riot was applicable, since the laws of different countries define this idea in different ways. Wächter decides that regard must be had to the language of the law of Saxony. See Savigny, § 374; Guthrie, p. 244 note (d.)

⁷ That is not the rule, however, for determining the question whether one is or is not bound to the tradesman, but merely for settling the amount of his remuneration. See the judgment cited in the immediately preceding note, and Ct. of App. Berlin, 22nd October 1874 (Seuffert, xxxiii. § 124): the grounds of decision there seem to settle the rate of remuneration independently of contract.

remarked, in discussing the rule "locus regit actum," that the transaction in such a case must be recognised generally as valid and good as a ground of action, if it is in accordance with the forms recognised at the place where it was entered into.¹ If, then, informal contracts are generally recognised in any country, then an informal contract concluded there may be pleaded in judgment in any other country, although according to the law of that second country such a contract would only create an obligation on which no action could be raised. Whether, again, it will be enough that the transaction, as regards its form, is in accordance with the law of some other country, will depend upon what laws govern it as regards its substance. For it may be laid down that the same laws to which the essence and import of the transaction are subject, will and should regulate the form of the same, since its form is simply the outward token of its essence and import. Besides that, however, the purpose of the parties to bind themselves by a valid contract must be evident. This consideration will show that there can seldom be a binding contract, if in the form of the contract the lex loci contractus is not observed.

If the transaction is forbidden by the law of the place where it is entered into, then there can be no form recognised by the lex loci contractus by which it may be validly concluded.² Thus, all such contracts must, as a rule, be pronounced null, unless for this exceptional case it is sufficient to observe the form imposed by the law of some other territory. For instance, according to the penal code of France,³ a sale for delivery of public funds is invalid if at the time of concluding the contract the scrip is not in the possession of the seller. A contract of this kind, therefore, concluded on the Exchange at Paris in contravention of this provision, is, as a rule, to be held null everywhere. But if two persons domiciled in another country conclude a bargain of this kind in a railway carriage while they are in some territory where French law prevails, then either party

² Asser (cf. Asser-Rivier, § 36, p. 78) refuses to accept this result. He is of opinion, taking the very instance which I have taken in the text, that, "if such a transaction is concluded on the Exchange in Paris, can it be said that the law has not prescribed the form of it?" Asser makes a confusion between the civil and the criminal law; within the meaning of the criminal law the parties have concluded a transaction, although it is an illegal transaction. But a transaction which is null within the meaning of the civil law can have no form in the eye of the law at all, not even an informal form, for a nullity has no form. This reasoning of Asser rests on a circle, and is at the same time misleading. He says that the accidental circumstance, that the suit comes up for decision in another country, can never give a subsequent validity to a transaction which is invalid by the lex loci actus. But in this he assumes—what he ought to have proved—that the declaration of invalidity has an extra-territorial operation, and it is not always a matter of accident that the suit comes up for decision before a judge, other than the judge of the place where the contract was made; e.g. if two subjects of country A are making a short journey through country B, and there make a contract with each other, which is to be performed in A, completely valid by A's law, and invalid only by the law of B. The validity of this contract in country B cannot well be doubted; e.g. X sells Y in country B a ticket for a public lottery in country A. According to Asser's reasoning, the contract is invalid.

may bring an action for compelling performance before the judex domicilii, if the law of the domicile of these parties knows no such restriction,⁴ and if their intention clearly was directed to the execution of a binding contract.⁵ The same rules will decide if, for instance, one makes some stipulation in Vienna contrary to the provisions of the 879th section of the general code of Austria.⁶ The question whether an obligation will give rise to action, whether the undertaking, that is, in itself, apart from the act to which it is directed,⁷ is valid or permitted or not, is undoubtedly a question as to the substance of the contract, and must therefore be determined by the law to which the obligation is itself subject, and must therefore be independent of the law recognised at the seat of the court.⁸ But if an action arising out of the particular legal relation is held in our country to be immoral, or indecent, it must be thrown out, without respect to the law of the place where the contract was made or where it is to be performed, or to that of the domicile of the parties.⁹ These cases, and such

⁵ Such exceptional cases are generally overlooked, if one argues with Huber, in confl. § 3: "E contra negotia et acta certo loco contra leges ejus loci celebrata quum sint ab initio invalida, nusquam valere possunt." The reason "quum sint ab initio invalida" contains a petitio principii: it assumes, what is not proved and cannot be proved, that every transaction is to be determined by the lex loci contractus. Story, § 243, says of contracts, "If void or illegal by the law of the place, they are generally held void and illegal everywhere." He maintains it is a principle of the law of nature; Foote, pp. 292, 297, seems to come to the result stated in the text, although he gives no special demonstration of it.

⁹ If, for instance, at the place of action gambling debts cannot constitute a ground of action. Savigny, § 374; Guthrie, p. 252. The law of England and that of the United States seems up to this time less disposed to throw out the action on the ground of the lex fori, and to be disposed, unless in specially pressing cases, to hold by the lex loci contractus. See, e.g. as to the recovery of gambling debts, Wharton, § 492. Phillimore, § 676, remarks: "The general rule, however, is never—i.e. unless express exceptions are made—to extend the prohibitions to contracts made abroad." The jurisprudence of the continent is more inclined to place the moral character of the law of the judge who is dealing with the case above the bona fides of the international law of contracts, which would let the lex loci contractus have its effect. Cf. e.g. a judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Rostock, of 17th December 1857 (Seuffert, xix. § 107): "It is immaterial to consider whether the lex commissoria is recognised in England, for the judge of this country is absolutely bound to see that the prohibition of so sternly compulsory a nature, which was enacted as a protection against the pressure of usury, shall receive effect unconditionally." But see a judgment of the German Imperial Court, of 10th May 1884, S. T. and H. (J. xiii. p. 609), in which the court applying the law to which the contract belonged, i.e. that of the place of performance, declared a stock exchange transaction in France null, because null by French law, and refused action. The question of suing on a foreign gaming contract has never occurred in Scotland, but it is thought no such suit would be entertained, the ground on which suits upon native gaming contracts are thrown out of account being that courts of justice will not concern themselves with such transactions—cases as those in which some legal relation cannot be sued upon for want of a prescribed form—e.g. where action cannot be maintained for more than a certain sum except upon a written document—have been so mixed up¹⁰ as to have led to the very general adoption of the view that where a transaction or contract cannot be sued upon in some particular country, no action at all arising out of a transaction of that class can be maintained there, although it was concluded and is to be performed in another country, and both parties are foreigners.¹¹ If the law restricts the judicial operation of particular obligations, that provision no doubt implies that the judge is bound to throw out any action of the kind, in spite of the desire of the parties that the transaction should be upheld. If, then, for instance, an action is brought upon a guarantee by a wife for her husband, a forbidden transaction, the judge must necessarily dismiss it. But that does not settle the question whether the law meant to deal merely with bonds undertaken by married women belonging to its own country, or bonds which were to receive effect there, and not to touch those undertaken by foreigners in a foreign country.¹² The theory which holds that the lex fori must always determine whether action can lie or not, leads necessarily to this, that more favour is shown to a transaction which is entirely void, than to one which is valid in itself, but on which no action can be brought.¹³

In this connection, too, the question of prohibited gambling by means of lotteries falls to be discussed. If a State will not tolerate at all public lotteries with money prizes, or at least money prizes of considerable value, or only sanctions lotteries for charitable and suchlike purposes,¹⁴ the courts of that country cannot be asked either to compel the payment of a prize, or to recover the price of a ticket; the State in such a case regards sponsiones ludicrae—a reason which would apply as much in a suit between foreigners for a bet made abroad. The same considerations are held to apply in the case of lotteries; see case of Christison, cited in note 14 infra.

S. 63] (Foote, p. 374), where it was held that the company could make conditions of carriage in Boulogne, which would have been illegal by Act of Parliament for conveyance on English soil exclusively (a special rate for goods packed in a particular way).

¹³ Wächter, ii. p. 402; Demangeat on Fœlix, i. p. 255, note a.

gambling by lottery as something immoral, and mischievous to the public. But if, as is frequently the case, the State in the interest merely of its own fisc forbids trafficking in foreign lottery tickets and gambling in foreign lotteries, all talk of the State assisting a legal relation, which from its own point of view is immoral and not actionable, by entertaining in its courts a suit founded on a foreign lottery, is out of the question. The thing, then, to be investigated is whether the case on hand, which has given occasion to the suit, is one that ought and can, from its own nature, be touched by the prohibition of the State. The widest scope which can be given to the prohibition is that it should affect all persons who are in the territory, and all natives who buy tickets abroad with a view to evade the law. Foreigners, who are in a foreign country, cannot, it is plain, be bound by any such prohibitions. Again, it is unworthy of any State, which desires to recognise its neighbour's law, to refuse judicial aid to a legal relation which has arisen in a foreign country in a perfectly legal fashion, from some idea of stretching its fiscal regulations to their largest extent. If, then, for instance, a foreigner has gambled in a foreign country in a lottery which is legal there, or as a collector has become debtor to pay a prize in one, and then travels into another State, which forbids gambling in that foreign lottery, he will be liable there also to action for the price of his ticket, or for payment of the prize.

We must, however, go further. Even a subject of this country who is domiciled abroad, or resides there for a considerable time, must in the nature of the case be free from the pressure of fiscal prohibitions of the kind. And it is at variance with that bona fides, which is so necessary in international law, to refuse action to a foreign contracting party—who in a foreign country is under no duty of turning to the prohibitions of our State, and does not need to inform himself as to their import—for not knowing that the person who took a ticket in the lottery belonged to a country which forbids gambling in foreign lotteries. The courts of the United States seem to take this view,¹⁵ as it is their endeavour generally to protect the bona fides of commerce in conformity with the lex loci actus. The jurisprudence of the Continent of Europe, on the other hand, seems for the most part to exhibit the spirit of a mere tax-collector. The opinion which prevails is that, as it is a revenue law of the one country or the other that is in question, or as the legislature is in pursuit of some moral object,¹⁶ it is permissible to set the statute on this subject above all the rules of international competency which are recognised on all other matters. The decisions themselves, however, are not unfrequently more sound than the reasoning on which they are based. Thus a judgment of the Supreme Court of Berlin, of 16th October 1855, proceeded on the ground, that the question whether or not the transaction was permissible must in a Prussian court be determined by Prussian law; and the pleas of the defenders—who were domiciled in Prussia; and had sold to the pursuer, who was domiciled in Bohemia, tickets in a marine lottery for Prussia—that they were free from liability, because in Austria the sale and purchase of Prussian lottery tickets was forbidden, were repelled. Again, in a judgment of the Appeal Court of Lübeck of 11th September 1849,¹⁷ it was said: “Foreign laws forbidding gaming in lotteries in other countries are not to be applied by the courts of Frankfort, as the Frankfort lottery is a financial institution of the State; and it cannot, therefore, be held that the legislators of Frankfort intended to give to courts of that place power to apply such laws. If a collector has invited a foreigner to game in the lottery, knowing that that was forbidden by the laws of his (i.e. the collector’s) country, he cannot appeal to these foreign laws, so as to escape payment, if the foreigner wins; this plea will be repelled by the Replica doli. The same result, viz. decree against the collector by the tribunals of the State to which the lottery itself belongs, may more correctly be referred to this consideration, that the obligation of the defender was to be tested by the law of his own domicile, and that the foreign law by which the obligation of the other party was to be tested, could not on general principles (see supra, § 250) be taken into account at all, after that party had already performed his side of the contract. A judgment of the German Imperial Court (iii.), of 12th July 1881,¹⁸ held it to be sound that an action by a foreign lottery collector directed against a person domiciled in Prussia, presumably a Prussian, on account of a claim founded on the purchase of lottery tickets, should be thrown out without taking any account of an averment that in certain cases the tickets had been procured, not in Prussia, but at Bremen, at the domicile of the collector himself, on this ground, because the question whether an act is to be regarded as illegal, is to be decided by the law of the court to which appeal is made.¹⁹ The obligation of the defender in this case was ruled by the law of Prussia, and was obviously null. Nor was this nullity affected by the fact that in this or that instance, when the defender happened to be in the immediately adjoining territory of Bremen, he took tickets there. All the less could any weight be put upon that fact, as the collector, the pursuer, presumably knew of the prohibition which existed in the law of Prussia, as the defender was well known to him: thus the application of the Prussian prohibitive law could not for a moment be represented as an invasion of bona fides.²⁰ The exact ground upon which the decisions in such cases have been put is, however, of special importance, because in more modern times even the public loans of foreign States may often be touched by prohibitions of this nature,²¹ and because modern legislation generally experiments in all possible and conceivable prohibitions, frequently without any great success. It is worth while, then, to protect at least in some measure the possibility of international commerce and intercourse in lines that will harmonise with bona fides.

¹⁵ See Wharton, § 487.

¹⁶ See Weiss, p. 802, and the judgments of the French courts cited there: also Laurent, viii. § 112. It is, however, to be noticed that the French authors on this subject, who have principally in view the law of France (see note 14), have, in that respect, another and a better foundation for their opinion than German authors and German courts have, who, in the rules of law enacted by the statutes of their country, have before their eyes a case in which the legislator maintains the lotteries of his own country, and only forbids those of foreign countries.

The challenge of contracts is subject to the same law as that by which their validity is to be tested. Their liability to challenge is simply an incomplete or conditional invalidity.²² In the challenge or reduction of a sale because of lesion to the extent of more than one-half of the whole,²³ or because of defects in the thing sold, the law as to locus premitentie,²⁴ the right to resile upon rejection of arles or arrha that has been given, the right of re-purchase, and the right of restitution against a contract, we find applications of this rule.²⁵

4. IMPORT OF OBLIGATORY CONTRACTS.

§ 258. Within certain limits, the import of an obligation depends on the declaration of the intention of the parties. But yet it would not be correct to say that the import of an obligatory contract is merely that which may be presumed to be their intention. The so-called dispositive rules of law which belong to this subject may, no doubt, be excluded by the will of the parties; but it is by no means the case that they are to be applied only where they correspond with what was probably the intention of the parties.¹ If this were true, these rules would be excluded in every case where one could not point to some declaration of intention, perhaps a tacit declaration, by the parties that they should be applied. It is upon a confusion between the presumed intention of the parties and these so-²¹ Cf. e.g. C. de Douai, 6th August 1883 (J. xi. p. 190).

²² Rules as to the challenge of legal transactions are part of substantive law. Judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 11th February 1858 (Striethorst, Neue Folge, 2nd year, vol. i. p. 51). Cf. Massé, p. 158.

²³ Fœlix, i. p. 249 (§ 109); Hert, vi. 4; Massé, p. 220 (in the sale of real property, as a rule, the lex rei sitæ. See Massé, p. 223); Fiore, §§ 293, 294; Brocher, ii. § 82. Laurent, viii. § 145, proposes that the personal law of the parties shall be the absolute rule, because there is a close connection between a failure of consensus and incapacity of the person. But although the law protects a party against his own thoughtlessness by allowing him to challenge a transaction on account of lesio enormis, this is not effected by declaring him to be incapable of acting.

²⁴ Boullenois, ii. p. 454; Fœlix, i. p. 230.

²⁵ See generally J. Voet in Dig. 4, 1, § 29; Story, § 331; Wächter, ii. p. 404. Wächter recognises this in so far only as rights are concerned which parties may renounce. According to the general principles which we have assumed (§ 247), we cannot approve of this restriction. See, too, Savigny, § 374; Guthrie, p. 249; Renaud, D. Privatr. i. § 42, note 26, and the judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Lübeck, of 30th January 1850, reported by Römer, ii. p. 228. As to restitution, see supra, § 154.

called dispositive rules of law that the theory of those authors rests,² who say that the immediate effects of a contract are to be determined by the lex loci contractus, while its indirect or accidental consequences must be ruled by the laws of the country where these consequences may have taken place. For instance, it is said that among the immediate consequences of a contract of sale are the delivery of the subject sold to the buyer, the payment of the price, the right to renounce the contract on the ground of enorm lesion, and the passing of the risk to the buyer; while among the accidental consequences are unwarrantable delay on the part of any of the contracting parties, or the renunciation of the contract by reason of the occurrence of some subsequent event.³ The former are results that can be foreseen, the latter cannot. But the whole theory must be rejected, for the very reason that it is only the particular capacity and prudence of individuals that can determine what is unforeseen. It is difficult to understand, as a matter of fact, why there should be any greater difficulty in foreseeing a delay in performance, than in foreseeing the accidental destruction of the subject, and indeed it may very well be that, if the buyer had a reputation for dilatoriness, punctual payment should belong to the category of things unforeseen.

Further, it is an error to determine objections which may be taken to the validity of a contract by the law that is recognised at the seat of the court, instead of by the law under which the contract itself falls.⁴ No doubt there may be objections which are rested on considerations of the forms of process, and there the lex fori will decide; but it is different with objections depending on substantive grounds—they determine up to what point the validity of an obligation may be carried, and can therefore be decided by no other law than the local law, which for other purposes determines the validity of the obligation.⁵

5. CONTRACTS, THE OBJECT OF WHICH IS A MONEY PAYMENT.

§ 259. We have already noted, in discussing the general principles of the law of obligations, that in cases of doubt the coinage recognised at the place of payment must be taken to be the proper medium of payment.¹ We need only mention one point in this connection which is much controverted, especially in the judgments of English and American courts.

Suppose that a debtor, who is bound to pay a certain sum at a particular place, is asked for payment at some other place, is the sum to be determined by the nominal or statutory relation which the currency of the place in which the demand is made bears to the currency of the place where payment was to be made, or is it to be determined by the rate of exchange current between these two places? For instance, action is brought in the United States for a debt of £100, nominally payable in England—by statute in the United States the pound is equal to 4 dollars 48 cents,² but the course of exchange with England gives it a higher value by 1 per cent.—is then the pursuer of the action entitled to 448 dollars, or to that sum and 1 per cent. besides? Upon this question there have been conflicting decisions in the courts. The following seems the true answer. In strictness, the creditor is not entitled to require payment to be made at any other place than that originally appointed, nor is the debtor entitled to discharge himself by tendering payment anywhere else; and, therefore, the sentence of the court must condemn the debtor to pay the sum fixed at the original place of payment according to the statutory equivalent. It might be impossible to work out such a decree at the original place of payment if the debtor had no sufficient estate there, or if the court of that country should refuse to give legal redress. If, then, the reason for not raising the action at the appointed place of payment be that the debtor has no estate there, the judgment of the court must be in such terms as will make it possible to carry it out at the place where action is brought, and, therefore, since the debtor has failed timeously to make payment at the appointed place, and must bear the consequences of that failure, the creditor will receive, in addition to the original sum, enough to pay the act of transmitting that original sum to the place where payment should have been made. If, then, the debtor wishes to pay in bills, or if there is no other way of remitting the money safely (e.g. if it should be impossible to ensure the money that has to be remitted), he must make good to the creditor the difference of the exchanges in case the rate at the place of payment as compared with that of the place of action is above par, while in the converse case he may take credit for the difference. It may, however, be equally convenient for the creditor to receive payment at the place of action; if in such a case he should, nevertheless, demand payment at the place originally fixed, the debtor by establishing the fact may plead the exceptio doli, and the creditor, who has no interest to receive payment there, would be satisfied with receiving so much as might be equal to the sum originally contained in the obligation according to the value set upon it by the law of the place of action. Lastly, it may absolutely be for the creditor's advantage to receive payment at the place of action; in such a case the debtor would be entitled to deduct, upon similar grounds, the difference between the rates of exchange in the two places.³ In the case of settlements between traders, it is generally in the interest of the creditor that payment should be made at the place arranged, and that the rate of exchange, if the payment is made by bills, should determine the amount. In such cases, however, unless there should be some statutory prohibition,⁴ the judgment of the court can only give the pursuer the sum sued for, along with the expense of transmitting it safely to the place of payment; for the mode of payment, which may, for instance, be made by post-office order or by the remittance of specie under insurance, is left to the choice of parties until steps are taken to compel it.⁵

² There is, however, an exception to this, viz. in the estimation of duties on goods where duty is payable ad valorem. Story, § 309, note 6.

FORCED CURRENCY.

§ 260. The question, whether a creditor must accept a statutory forced currency of depreciated foreign paper, is answered in the negative by Massé;⁶ and in the same way by Pardessus, § 1495*a*, and Wharton, § 518; at least the creditor, they think, can only be required to accept such a paper currency at its real value. Although the creditor has no means of forcing his debtor to make any further payment in the country whose law ordains that payment may be made in this paper currency, he may in such a case sue his debtor in the courts of any other country where that debtor possesses property, and obtain and put in execution a decree for the full amount of the debt. To this view I cannot, however, assent.⁷ The creditor might, with as much justice, dispute the binding force of any

⁵ Cf. Story, § 368 et seq.; Wharton, §§ 514, 515. Lord Eldon says [in Cash v. Kennion, 1805, 11 Ves. 314], "If he fails in that contract," i.e. his contract to pay at a certain place on a certain day, "wherever the creditor sues him, the law of that country ought to give him just as much as he would have had, if the contract had been performed." "From this," says Westlake, § 226, "the conclusion has been drawn that, where the time and place of payment are fixed by contract, the rate of exchange ought to be taken as at the time so fixed." [Bertram v. Duhamel, 1838, 2 Mo. P.C. 212, and in accordance with this doctrine the rule is stated thus in Mayne on Damages, p. 209: "Where an action is brought in England to recover the value of a given sum in a foreign currency, upon a judgment obtained abroad, the value is that sum in sterling money which the currency would have produced, according to the rate of exchange between the foreign country and England at the date of the foreign judgment." See, too, the Scots case of Ainslie v. Murrays cited supra, p. 550. In Campbell v. Hannay, February 15, 1809, F. C., the Court of Session held that a person sued for payment of a sum which he should have paid in India, was not entitled, as the suit in Scotland had been rendered necessary by his own default in not paying in India, to claim discount at the Indian rate of exchange. This case can hardly be defended on sound principle: reason would support a decision that the creditor should not suffer by the debtor's obstinacy, but the Court were not entitled to impose a fine. The ordinary principle of allowing the current rate of exchange on payment e.g. of an Indian debt in England, is applied in Kibble v. Graham's Trs. by the House of Lords (1830, 4 W. and S. p. 166). The Supreme Court of Comm. of the German Empire on 28th June 1875 decided (Treschow v. Bockelman, J. iv. p. 161) that, in all that concerns payment or performance, the law of the place of payment or performance will rule.]

other law which in whole or in part destroyed his right of action under the contract—e.g. the law of prescription, if it did not exist in the legal system to which he was personally subject. If the obligation in dispute is generally subject to the law of the country in which there is such a forced currency, the discharge of the obligation must be ruled by the law applicable to this currency. But the fact that payment happens accidentally to be made somewhere in that country is not decisive of the point.⁸

This view too is, as a practical matter, not of any great danger. A forced currency is only ordained by the government of a country in the extremity of necessity, for the institution of such a depreciated currency must have the worst effect in the future upon the credit of the State and of its subjects. To apply the view first stated would only ensure a very small measure of assistance, because it is purely accidental whether the debtor has property abroad or not; and since he could not in future venture to send any articles of property, or even money to creditors, for fear of an attachment being laid upon it, the result would be that commerce would be completely crippled, and the public would suffer. The case would no doubt stand differently if it was proposed to apply this forced currency, according to its nominal value, to all claims which in truth belonged to a foreign country, but which accidentally came to be paid or to be sued upon in the country where this currency was in force.⁹

ADOPTION OF A NEW STANDARD. THE ACTIONS BROUGHT AGAINST AUSTRIAN RAILWAY COMPANIES AFTER THE INTRODUCTION OF A GOLD STANDARD IN GERMANY.

§ 261. The question, in what currency a debtor must pay, received a peculiar illustration shortly after the German Empire, by the laws of 4th December 1871 and 9th July 1873, adopted a gold standard in place of a ⁸ Two countrymen make a contract at their domicile, and for convenience agree that payment shall be made in some country where a forced currency is subsequently introduced. In this case, the creditor must accept the paper, for the enactment extends to all payments made within the territory of the State, but only at its real value.

⁹ Cf. too, Massé, ut cit: "Il arrive souvent que les lois d'un pays, dont le valeur monétaire est dépréciée, établissent dans l'intérêt du commerce des règles particulières pour les paiements à faire aux étrangers." Cf. e.g. § 3 of the Italian Statute of 1st May 1866, which is no longer of any practical force, and the judgment on it of the App. Ct. of Florence of 21st March 1870 (Jour. viii. p. 446), with Clunet's note, ibid. It is plain, from the exposition we have given in the text, that an enactment like that of the 1895th § of the Code Civil is to be applied to foreign creditors, even although the obligation falls under the law of France: that article provides: "L'obligation qui résulte d'un prêt en argent n'est toujours que de la somme numérique énoncée au contrat. S'il y a eu augmentation ou diminution d'espèces avant l'époque du paiement, le débiteur doit rendre la somme numérique prêtée, et ne doit rendre que cette somme dans les espèces ayant cours au moment du paiement." Massé, p. 171. Gust. Hartmann, in his paper cited in the next note, § 57, says very soundly: "The only civil tribunal that can decide the case is, in respect its powers are restricted, neither an adequate nor an appropriate instrument to afford the necessary protection to the citizens of its own country, who are touched by a foreign financial law, which may happen to be unjust.

silver standard.¹⁰ The German statute of 1871 took as its basis the actual relation of gold to silver that then existed, according to which 15½ lbs. of silver were worth 1 lb. of gold. Soon afterwards an enormous fall in the value of silver took place, so that France e.g. found herself forced to suspend free coinage of silver, and in that way practically to adopt also a gold standard. Austria adhered to her paper currency; but the value of silver sank so low, that the value of the Austrian silver florin was no longer any higher than that of the paper florin, and at times even sank below it. Now a number of Austrian railway companies had put upon the international market debentures, in which the amount of the bond and of the interest coupons to be paid were first stated in Austrian silver currency, but at the same time also, at the option of the holder, in German thaler currency, in francs, and partly also in pounds sterling, in English currency, and in Dutch.¹¹ At the same time, besides the place or places of payment in Austria, there were other places of payment appointed, at the option of the holder, in the German Empire, in Paris, in London, etc. The railway companies then, or by far the greater number of them,¹² paid at the appointed places, but only at the subsequent value of the Austrian silver florin, i.e. according to the exchange of the Austrian silver florin; and in consequence foreign creditors suffered a loss, according to the value of silver, of from 15 per cent. to 20 per cent., which latterly was as a rule the amount of the depreciation. A number of actions were fought, with much excitement among the public and the press, against the companies in Germany, jurisdiction being given to the German courts by the establishment of the places of payment within the Empire. By an unbroken series of decisions, what was at one time the Supreme Court of Commerce for the Empire, afterwards the Imperial Court (Reichsgericht),¹³ gave decree against the companies:¹⁴ whereas the Austrian Courts (see Bekker, p. 12) gave judgment of absolutor. The grounds of the German decisions may be shortly summed up to this effect, that the obligations in question, as they had a place of performance in Germany, were, in the option of the creditors, to be ruled by the substantive laws of that place of performance, at least in so far as the business of payment was concerned, and that they were ¹⁰ On this subject, see particularly a paper by Bekker, "Über die Couponsprocesse," and Gus. Hartmann's "Internationale Geldschulden," 1882.

¹² The Aussig Teplitz Company, the Staatseisenbahn Company, and the Süd Bahn, satisfied their creditors without any deductions. See Bekker, p. 7.

¹³ Cf. judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Comm. 19th February 1878 (Kaiserin Elisabeth Bahn), and 8th April 1879 (Süd-NordDeutsche Verbindungs Bahn). (Dec. vol. xxiii. § 72, p. 205, and vol. xxv. § 11, p. 41.) Judgment of the Imp. Ct. of 12th December 1879 (Elisabeth Bahn) (Entsch. d. R.G.I. § 12); also R.G.I. against the Lemberg-Czernowitz-Jassy Co. of 4th October 1882 (Entsch. ix. § 2).

¹⁴ Of all the German courts, that of Cassel was the only one that gave judgment in favour of the defending companies, see Bekker, p. 19. This judgment mistakenly lays down that a debtor, as regards the payment due by him, can subject himself to any other law than that to which his obligation is in other respects subject, can thus for this purpose subject himself even to several systems of law, so that the creditor may have his choice.

thus brought under the provisions of the law of the German Empire, i.e. in the present case its laws as to currency.

§ 262. The assailable point, as Bekker and Hartmann agree in thinking, is the theory borrowed from Savigny of the determination of everything connected with the obligation according to the law of the place of performance, and also the theory of the implied intention of parties. But, at the same time, we may fully concur in the judgments of the German courts as against those of Austria in so far as the result is concerned. The statements of the different currencies for payment upon the bonds were not, as was averred on behalf of the companies, made for the convenience of the public. As every one knows the difference between the currencies of different countries, statements made for that purpose would have been idle. The object rather was to lull the foreign public into the belief that any depreciation in Austrian currency should have no effect at all upon the sum of principal and interest due under the bond. So familiar was the history of Austrian currency and of Austrian public debts, that it seemed worth while to refer to a number of foreign currencies, which, in the event of any depreciation in that of Austria, should afford the creditors a guarantee if they chose to take it. But then something quite unexpected happens. It was not the Austrian legislature that altered the currency, but, on the contrary, the Germans did so, and, in consequence it may be of this change—we may at once concede this point, although in the main other factors determined this—the value of silver sank. It is therefore incorrect, and here again Bekker and Hartmann are agreed, to speak of any real intention of parties, even although by implication merely. The only question to be asked is, What in these circumstances accords with the nature of the case, with the reason of the thing, or, as Hartmann expresses it, with the necessary bona fides of international commerce and intercourse?

Now, what the Austrian obligants, in their endeavour to give security to the creditors by a reference to the currencies of other countries, said was truly this: "If this Austrian currency of ours seems to you to some extent to be an untrustworthy customer, at least you will rely on these foreign currencies we lay before you, and, as the currency of all States depends upon their laws, you will trust the laws of these States. These States, whose credit is above suspicion, will not make any changes in their laws to your prejudice." But in this vote of confidence, which the Austrian debtors in this way passed in favour of foreign currency laws, was involved a further vote of confidence, viz. that these foreign currency laws would not change for the advantage of the creditors, or rather that, if they did change,¹⁵ the change would correspond with some change in the nature of the thing itself, and what was called a change would in truth rather be the maintenance of the status quo. We reach this result simply in this way, that wherever one precious metal is adopted as a medium of currency in place of another the same assertions may be made, viz. that it is done in obedience to necessary laws, and, on the contrary, that these laws do not require any such change. It may be that in every case, after all practical interest in the matter is over, science can tell us with certainty which of these assertions was well founded. But, so long as the matter is one of practical consequence, a government can do no more than give a positive answer in view of the relations of credit over which it itself has control.¹⁶ The debtor, then, who asks for credit in a foreign country, and calls in foreign legal systems as his sureties, trusts their discretion in this matter: at least, if his creditor desires it, he, the debtor, must recognise them as worthy of credit. A debtor, who does not desire to give any such vote of confidence in a foreign legislative system, must simply contract upon the currency of his own country. But then, of course, if this currency is not sound—and it is unsound, if it fails to follow the requirements of the time, where that is necessary—he must in issuing his scrip put up with more unfavourable conditions in other respects, e.g. in the rate of interest he will have to pay.

The same considerations dispose of the following argument also on the Austrian side, which is the most formidable that can be urged in that behalf.¹⁷ If, so the objection is put, any given financial reform was to affect other countries, the State, to which the creditors belong, would have it in its power with one stroke to double the money obligations due to its subjects by foreign countries. All it would require to do would simply be, in passing from a silver to a gold standard, to double the relative value of gold as compared with silver. But such a system of robbery is, as Hartmann (p. 55) remarks, inconceivable among civilised States. If for no other reason, at least for this, that as all its subjects could not be creditors, it would hit one section of its own subjects very hard, and would produce the greatest confusion in all relations of property within its own bounds. The more natural supposition is that every civilised State would strive to strike the true proportion in such a change in its money laws. We may then go further, and say that if a person chooses another as his repository of trust, as an oversman or umpire, he may of course, if the person so chosen practises deceits, challenge the validity of the decree, but cannot do so, if there is no dolus or even culpa lata proved against him, but he is rather shown to have done his best in his own interest to reach a sound decision.

Bekker, who on the main question¹⁸ holds the Austrian companies to have done right,¹⁹ thinks that in truth the claims of the creditors were for a certain quantity of pure silver, and he therefore proposes that in future, to avoid disputes, scrip intended for an international market should not be for a specified sum in any local currency or coin, but directly for a specified weight of the precious metal, e.g. a certain number of grammes of gold. He proposes to abolish in the future all that justifies the existence of the bearer bonds in different currencies that are at present so extensively used.

¹⁷ Cf. Hertzka in Faucher's Vierteljahrsschr. für Volkswirtschaft, vol. i. 1876, pp. 221, 229.

In this proposal, however, Bekker overlooks, as Hartmann, who again supports the judicial determination arrived at by the German courts, very rightly notices, that the creditor's concern is that he shall on the day of settlement get, not a particular quantity of precious metal, but money's worth; or, to speak more accurately, a power of purchase or exchange to a certain extent of the great mass of commercial commodities. To be still more exact, he desires to get the same power of purchase or exchange, which the sum of money written upon his bond represents at the moment at which it is issued, and conversely the debtor, too, desires to give on the day of settlement to his creditors this same power of purchase or exchange, but no more. But, since the value of gold is exposed to serious fluctuations, scrip, issued for certain quantities of gold, will not succeed in attaining what in all reason the parties must have desired. In theory it is quite sound to point, as Hartmann does—and this furnishes him with a bridge by which to pass to another proposal—to the possibility of a vast additional burden being laid upon the debtor, if the value of gold and its purchasing power should rise uninterruptedly, especially if a fall in silver took place concurrently, and the debtor belonged to a country with a silver currency. But in the case of bonds, which are not to be paid up for some time, things may go the other way. The purchasing power of money generally may sink, and, although at the same time the value of gold as against silver may rise, it is still possible that the creditor, who takes payment in gold, may suffer very real prejudice, although he will have no cause in law for complaint. The international bimetallic currency, which is recommended by many well-known persons and by Hartmann himself, change of standard had currency in North and South Germany respectively, would pay all they could be asked to pay, if they made their payments in Austrian silver currency exclusively, and defrayed besides the trifling percentage, which would be the result of their undertaking to maintain a constant exchange upon the German places of payment as compared with the exchange of the day, which of course would vary. They required only to pay something more than the exchange on a bill payable at sight.

¹⁹ But then all the scrip of the different companies' defenders was by no means in all respects alike, as the decisions of the Supreme Court in Germany showed, and as Bekker himself, p. 135, sets out. Even in Bekker's view those alternative bonds, which were first issued after the German change of standard, would, in the option of the creditor, about which there would be no doubt, require to be paid in gold, since no one could for a moment maintain that in these cases the debtor was not subject to the changes which had taken place in the German legislation as to currency. Again, the scrip which was expressed in pounds sterling must suffer the same fate, because in England no change had taken place at all, and, in any case, in England the same number of gold pieces would have to be paid as had been due at the outset.

will not protect the creditor from loss in this case, or prevent damage in the opposite case of a rise in the value of money, an event which, it may be, is not so likely to take place. But it is quite beyond the sphere of law to attempt any discussion of bimetallism, since it does not yet exist, and, to all appearance, has not come any nearer for years. There is no other means readily available for protecting both debtor and creditor from excessive loss than the old expedient which lies in full information as to the obligations on both sides.²⁰ If, for reasons which can be easily understood, the great debtors despise this remedy, there is no help for them, in so far as the derangement of values is concerned: apparently, however, they can easily console themselves with advantages of another kind.

§ 263. The practical business world, however, by issuing its bonds as against different currencies, leaving the choice of them to the debtor, has instinctively grasped at what is the best remedy for the time, and, perhaps, in spite of theoretical objections, such as Bekker's, for all time. The remedy, which shall protect the creditor against any depreciation of currency that may occur in any State, particularly in that of the debtor, is that he shall have an option of demanding payment in the currency of some other State, or of several other States. It may be that the creditor will gain, if one of these States makes a miscalculation in some currency law.²¹ But, on the whole, the probability of this is much less than that of its opposite, just because States as such are for the most part severely burdened with debt, and are therefore much more inclined to do something for debtors than for creditors. This course of action, which the business world had with sound instinct adopted, had a consequence which very few people dreamt of, owing to the change of currency made by the German Government, and the depreciation in the value of gold as compared with silver, which followed on that; but this consequence was none the less on that account in accordance with the bargain which had been made.

The future will show whether it was an advantage for the great undertakings that must have recourse to the international money market, and in particular an advantage for Austria, that the largest part of the Austrian railway undertakings should try, under cover of erroneous judgments of the Austrian Court, although pronounced in optima fide, to throw discredit on these international forms for transaction of business. A great part of the Austrian State debt, and the debts of railway and other establishments requiring credit, has had to make special provision for payment in gold and in foreign currency, e.g. in German marks. Without doubt that must have contributed to depreciate still further silver and Austrian securities.²²

²¹ The Austrian companies may be supposed to have made a considerable profit at the expense of their creditors, by paying in silver florins; because the premium on silver as against Austrian paper money was gone, and accordingly these Austrian debtors paid no more than if they had been paying in paper, whereas their obligation was to pay in silver, which was then of a much higher value. Arendt and Hartmann (p. 61) have pointed this out.

6. PAYMENT OF INTEREST. LEADING POINTS OF VIEW.

§ 264. The obligation to pay interest is always an accessory of some other leading or principal obligation. Hence the question whether interest—be it pactional or by operation of law—is due, and from what point of time and up to what point of time it is due, must be dependent on that territorial law to which the leading obligation is itself subject. But, since the payment or performance of an obligation may to a certain extent be subject to some law other than that on which the validity of the obligation and questions therewith connected depend, the point, as to the height to which the rate of interest may be raised, and what, among several, is to be the recognised maximum, needs special consideration. Of course, unless there is some coercitive enactment in the way, the real intention of parties, be it express or implied, may make a difference in this respect. But the most difficult question in this connection, and that which is of most practical importance, is that of the rate of interest.¹

The payment of interest may either be put as an indemnity to the creditor for the gains which he might have made by using or laying out his money in some other way, or as a crop which grows where the principal is used: "Usuræ vicem fructuum obtinent" (L. 34, D. 22, 1). If we take the former point of view, we shall adopt the law of the creditor's domicile as our rule;² if we take the second, we shall adopt that of the debtor's domicile; for it is the labour and the other property of the debtor out of which the lent money produces fruit. This cannot, however, be asserted without making exceptions. Circumstances may show that the creditor, if he had had the money, would not have spent it at his domicile, but elsewhere, and in the same way that the debtor will make the money productive at some other place than his domicile. The law of these other places will then decide: the former we may describe as the place where ²² The grounds of judgment in a most interesting decision by the German Imperial Court (i.) of 9th February 1887 (Entsch. xviii. § 12, p. 47, præes, p. 53), in substance amount to the argument stated in the text. In that case, the Austrian Company had not appointed any place of payment within the German Empire. On that account the grounds of the previous decisions could not be applied. I first had my attention attracted to this judgment a year after I had written the text.

² The law of nationality has no meaning here: for it must be presumed that one denies oneself, or takes the use of money not in one's own country, which has been abandoned, but at what is actually the centre of one's business life.

the money would have been spent, the latter as the place where it was spent.

But when does the consideration of the creditor's abstention from spending give us the rule, and when is our rule to be taken from a consideration of the investment or application of the money made by the debtor?

In any case we must take the creditor's position as decisive, when we have to make good a wrong to him: and in such cases it will plainly be sufficient, if an actual wrong has been done to him, be the debtor as innocent of it as you please. The practical justification of such a rule is that, in cases of failure to perform civil obligations, the subjective fault in the party failing is often impossible to substantiate. It will be conceded that in many other cases connected with contract relations we must frequently be contented with objective wrong, and that an exact enquiry into the subjective responsibility for it would frequently be entirely unpractical.

Putting these cases aside, the point of view of where the creditor would have spent the money, the law of his domicile, must prevail, if the creditor has given the money for what is, comparatively speaking, but a short time. The application of the money to a particular purpose for a short time seems to be a subtraction of it from the ordinary rules of enjoyment or use of it at the creditor's domicile, a denial of that enjoyment to the creditor. But, on the other hand, we must put ourselves at the point of view of the application of the money by the debtor and for his behoof, and take that point of view as our guide,³ when the money is given to be used for a considerable period: if in a sense an investment has been made of it on or over the property of the debtor.

In such cases the creditor in truth is drawing a harvest from the work and from the property of the debtor, both of which are, by the capital invested in them, either made to bring forth fruit for the first time or to bring forth more abundantly.

The place where the money would have been spent by the creditor is, however, frequently the place for the performance of the obligation to pay interest, especially where the place of performance is fixed by special agreement of parties in commercial transactions. For the man of business will naturally direct all payments due to him to the place where, but for them, he would have to deny himself money.

The distinction, in matters of interest, between cases in which the ruling consideration is where the creditor would have used the money, and those in which it is where the debtor has employed it, will no doubt in many cases give rise to doubts. But we are not entitled on that account to say that this basis of treatment of the subject is unsound. No doubt it is new, and, in the former edition of this work, the solution of such questions was made dependent on the distinction of obligations to pay interest into pactional and ex lege.⁴ But this distinction will not give us a principle for the determination of the territorial law, for this reason, that if parties know that in particular circumstances interest will be paid on outlays and advances, e.g. even although there has been no special stipulation to that effect, the undertaking of an obligatory relation of that kind is not so essentially different from an express stipulation for interest that in the one case one territorial law should be applied, and in the other case an entirely different law.

Wharton (§ 501) distinguishes between, 1st, Interest secured by contract, either directly or by implication; 2nd, Interest which must be paid on account of a wrong, particularly breach of contract; and, 3rd, Interest on account of delay. This division is not very far from what I have adopted; but delay in performance is, accurately speaking, also a kind of breach of contract, and Wharton himself abandons his division again, in order to be able to apply Savigny's theory of the seat of the obligation, and the supremacy of the law of any fixed place of performance.

MAXIMUM RATE OF INTEREST.

§ 265. The local law may in the first place be important for determining what is the highest legal rate of interest,⁵ and on this point one theory, which is very strongly represented among German lawyers,⁶ forbids the judge ever to allow a higher rate than is sanctioned by the legal system which prevails at the seat of the court: because the meaning of any law which limits the rate of interest is that no judge of the land shall use his authority to further any undertaking so immoral and so contrary to the public interest as an usurious contract. That by foreign law, to which the transaction is subject, the creditor could have recovered the stipulated interest from any other debtor belonging to that country, and the debtor could have been forced to pay it to any other creditor, is not sufficient to disprove the correctness of this last rule, although it may raise a doubt as to whether the transaction can properly be held to be usurious. Laws against usury are intended to protect the debtor from oppression; but this can only come within the cognisance of the law of the place where the court is situated, in cases where the borrowed money is to be laid out at that

⁴ See, too, on the same side, Fiore, § 261.

⁵ This question has, it must be admitted, in modern times lost much of its importance, and does not come up so often for consideration, as many States no longer have a limit to the legal rate of interest. But still analogous questions may arise even in these States, in so far as they do not allow absolute freedom of contract in the matter; this is the case by the law in 1867 of the North German Bund, now that of the German Empire.

Industrial progress would be very seriously hampered in countries which are for the first time being opened to civilisation, if the subjects of other countries could not make loans to them at higher rates of interest.⁷

Besides all the older authors, who take the law of the place where the contract is made, or where it is to be performed, without any further limitation, as the rule in this matter, Savigny's theory⁸ is directly and expressly resisted by the modern French school,⁹ by the law of England and that of the United States, by that of Austria;¹⁰ further, e.g. by Fiore (§ 264), Wharton, Brocher (Nouv. Tr. § 145, in a comprehensive discussion),¹¹ and Asser-Rivier (§ 91).

Many lay down as an universal rule for interests that they are regulated by the law of the place where the contract is made;¹² others take that of the place of payment, when the place of payment is fixed.¹³ These theories rest upon the assumption that the law which is to rule the

¹⁰ In Austria the decree of court, of 12th January 1787, provides that interests which have been validly bargained for by the law of the place in which the debt was contracted, may be validly ranked by a judge in bankruptcy, although they are higher than are usual in Austria (Unger, p. 188).

¹¹ Brocher in the end takes the law of the debtor's domicile as the ruling law (loi du principal établissement du débiteur). In its practical result that will be very much the same as the rule of the text. If the debtor changes his domicile, it may be that a new law will rule the prolongation of interest payments for a new period.

Cass. 21st December 1874 (J. ii. pp. 374, 375); and Clunet, ibid. In the cases reported the decisions were sound. Boullenois's view is not distinct, ii. p. 472 (cf. with ii. p. 446); but he, too, seems to take, in cases where a place of payment has been fixed, the law that is there recognised. Bouhier, chap. xxi. Nos. 194, 195, takes a peculiar view. The law of the domicile of the creditor is to prevail, except in so far as he may have subjected himself to another.

obligation is simply determined by a voluntary submission of the parties. But if parties have not the power to take a foreign law at their pleasure as a rule of determination (as, for instance, two Prussians cannot at their pleasure adopt American law as the rule for a contract which they are concluding as to a subject situated in their own country),¹⁴ they are just as much incapacitated from doing this indirectly by capriciously choosing some other country for the place of performance, or for the conclusion of the contract. And even the adherents of this theory maintain the impossibility of choosing a foreign place for the performance, or the conclusion of the contract, in order to escape from the law of the country to which the parties belong.¹⁵

The place of performance is, however, like the place of the contract, so far of importance that from it may be inferred in what place the loan is really to be spent.¹⁶ E.g. a native of this country contracts a loan abroad to meet the expenses of his stay there, and this loan is to be repaid during his stay abroad. The legality of the interest stipulated in this case must be determined according to the law of the foreign country. Conversely, if one lends money abroad to one who is to keep it for a considerable time, and to continue to pay interest upon it after he has returned home, it may then be taken that the loan is to find its real application at the domicile of the debtor.¹⁷ Any agreement that may be made that the creditor is to receive repayment of capital and interest at his domicile, can certainly never determine¹⁸ the legality of the rate of interest.

¹⁶ C. Lyon, 3rd August 1876 (J. iv. p. 356). [The general doctrine is thus expressed in that case, viz.: "In truth money is a commodity; its price varies according to the place where the contract of loan is realised and put into operation. Thus the rate of interest must perforce depend on the economic conditions among which the parties contract, the contract is performed, the lender remits his money, and the borrower who receives it ought to pay it. Further, the contract of loan made and carried out abroad, even by a French subject, should be ruled by the law of that foreign country." More recently the Court of App. at Rouen has decided (12th July 1889, J. xvii. p. 123) that a loan made to a foreign company whose place of business is abroad, is, as regards the rate of interest, stipulated to be ruled by the foreign law, even when the lender is a French subject. But where no interest is stipulated, and an action is brought to recover both principal and interest in France, then the rate allowed will be the French rate (Benaïad v. Samama, 1885, J. xiii. 459). These decisions are all to some extent rendered obsolete, by the abolition of limitation on the rate of interest in commercial matters, by the statute of 12th January 1886. In France now any rate in commercial matters is legal.]

VARIOUS GROUNDS FOR OBLIGATION TO PAY INTEREST.

§ 266. In proceeding to consider particular cases, we find:—

First, That as a rule the obligation to pay interest upon money advanced on real security will be ruled by the lex rei sitæ, the law of the place where the security subject is.¹⁹ That is because, where we are concerned with capital outlays that have a tract of future time in view, the law of the place of their application must rule, and that is the place where the real estate lies. The only exception to this rule, as Wharton points out, will be if the loan is made primarily on the personal credit of the borrower.²⁰

Second, Interest upon advances against goods to be delivered, will be dealt with by the law of the domicile, or trading establishment, of the person who made the advance.²¹ In particular, a commission agent calculates the interest on his outlays according to the custom of his domicile.²²

Third, In open accounts current, each of the two traders reckons interest according to the rules of his own country.²³

Fourth, Interests upon capital sums given for the support of a manufacturing or trading house are subject to the law that prevails at the seat of that business.

Fifth, Interests on sums, which are payable on scrip at some particular place, will be calculated by the law of this place of payment; in any case this holds in favour of a bona fide holder, even as regards the limitations on the rate.²⁴

Sixth, As regards interest due ex lege,²⁵ for instance—

(a.) The rate of interest which the buyer has, under certain circumstances, to pay upon the purchase price depends on the law of the seller's domicile, or on that of his trading establishment, as the case may be; for

¹⁸ The domicile of the creditor may also be of importance. If two natives of this country enter upon a contract of loan in a foreign country, it is more easily inferred that the transaction is in fraudem legis, or that the money is to be spent at their domicile, than it would be if the creditor were a foreigner. The term in fraudem legis may be fitly applied to cases in which parties, to escape from the usury laws of their own country, choose some foreign country as the place in which the contract shall be made, or shall eventually be performed. In reality, the parties, in such a case, hold their own country to be the territory to which the whole transaction belongs, and they disguise this fact. A mark of this would be that the creditor cannot show any interest in having the contract performed abroad (Thöl, § 65, 2).

²¹ Wharton, 407 ad fin.; Fiore, § 262, says the law of the place where the advance is given, but means perhaps what is stated in the text.

²² App. Ct. of Lübeck, 31st October 1859 (Seuffert, xv. § 222).

²³ Fiore, § 263.

²⁵ It is generally said, and that was what I said in my former edition, that interest ex lege is subject to the law of the place to which the legal relation, whose operation is to produce the interest, belongs. (Cf. e.g. Fiore, § 261: "Because interest ex lege is one of the immediate the matter here is reimbursement to the seller, for having parted with the thing sold. But if traders have specially arranged for payment of the purchase price at some other place, as a general rule we must hold that it is at that place that the seller needs the money. He must have interest then according to the law and the rate that is recognised there. In sales of real property we must, as a rule, have regard to the rate that is due according to the law of the place where the property is.²⁶

(b.) The obligation of a guardian to pay interest for moneys not timeously invested by him for his ward, or not timeously handed over by him on the expiration of the guardianship,²⁷ must be ruled by the law of the guardianship, and by the rate which prevails where the moneys might, in due course, have been employed to profit. In such a case we are plainly dealing with neglect, i.e. with a wrong.

(c.) This is still more appropriate when one, e.g. a mandatary, has illegally applied moneys to his own profit. But, as one who acts illegally cannot be permitted, as a matter of fact, to make any profit out of that illegality, he must refund at that rate of interest which is the highest of those that can be considered in the matter. The opposite party, who has right to the money, may therefore, as he pleases, claim either interest according to the custom of his own domicile, or according to the law of the domicile or trading establishment of the mandatary. Again, too, if the mandatary ought to pay at a particular place, which has been fixed, if that be the place where the money that is due was to have been laid out, the rate of interest of this third place may be appealed to.

(d.) In the same way, in the case of moratory interest,²⁸ the domicile or the trade establishment of the creditor must rule. But if some place of payment distinct from the domicile of the creditor has been stipulated for, then, as a general rule, the rate of interest of this place will prevail, and the authorities, as well as the judicial utterances on the point, almost all express themselves as in favour of the law of interest as it prevails effects of the obligation." Laurent, viii. § 220.) But this rule is not fair altogether in different cases; it is inadequate for this reason, that the payment may, as we noticed above, fall under a different law from that which rules the question whether the obligation is good.

²⁶ The obligation which, by the law of Italy (Code, § 507), falls ex lege on the liferenter to pay interest on the burdens over the estate, is in itself to be ruled by the law to which the liferenter is on the whole and in other respects subject. For the burdens and privileges of the fiar, as against the liferenter, must be determined by one and the same law. The rate of interest may, however, fall to be regulated by the custom of the place where the thing is situated, e.g. if the fiar, to meet the burden, has incurred a loan upon security of the subject at that place.

at the place of performance.²⁹ This rule will almost always be a sound rule in the case of payments between traders, and obligations by bill must, as is well known, except in the case of what are known as "domiciled bills," be performed [i.e. paid] at the domicile or at the trading establishment of the individuals who are bound by them. We must, however, remember that in truth moratory interest is a measure of damages of a rough and ready kind. If, then, at the domicile of the creditor a rate of interest prevails, the exorbitancy of which can only be explained by the fact that money claims are less well secured, and less easily recovered there than elsewhere, we cannot, as a matter of course, allow the creditor that high rate. If, too, the creditor was accustomed to invest his money in the debtor's country, and if the claim was only brought into court because the debtor was in arrears in the payment of a rate of interest which had been stipulated, we may hold that the creditor's loss is no greater than the interest which prevails at the debtor's domicile. Here, as in many other cases in international law, we can only hit upon what is right by a sort of aequitas.

Process interest, i.e. interest which a defender, without any of the other circumstances of actual mora, has to pay in respect of the duration of the process [if he shall lose his suit], just because a process had to be instituted against him, is in truth simply a special kind of moratory interest. The institution of the action supplies the mora. The question, then, whether it is due must depend on the law to which the obligation is itself subject, while its rate must be determined on a consideration of the matter already discussed. A judgment of the Imperial Court³⁰ seems to test this kind of interest by the lex fori. But it cannot be a decisive element that this kind of interest is no doubt in a sense a product of the process. It may be better described as a product of the original obligation. This latter is modified by mora, and also by the institution of a process. The German Civil processordnung does not speak of this kind of interest, and holds it therefore not to belong to the law of process, but to substantive law.

NOTE R ON §§ 264-266. INTEREST.

It is abundantly settled by Scottish authority that the rate of interest on contract obligations will not be determined by the lex fori, but by the law of the contract. Thus, in the case of Graham v. Kibble (1820, 2 Bligh 126), the House of Lords had to adjudicate in a case where a person had deposited bonds with a trading house in India, these bonds bearing interest at eight per cent. The depositor then died, having named one of the partners of the Indian house to be his executor; he realised the bonds, and employed the proceeds in the business of his firm in India. Some time afterwards, the representatives of the depositor brought an action in Scotland against the executor, who was then domiciled in Scotland, and finally established his liability to account for the bonds. In a subsequent action for the interest on the bonds, the House of Lords gave eight per cent. on the bonds up to the date they were realised, twelve per cent. (being the current Indian rate) from that date till the date when decree was pronounced against the executor, and five per cent., the British legal rate, from that date till payment, the debt having become, after the previous decree, a British debt. Again, in the case of Ferguson v. Fyffe (1841, 2 Rob. 267), which was a case wherein the representatives of a person deceased sought to recover a sum of Indian interest from a mercantile firm in whose hands the deceased's funds had been left for many years for use in their business, the Lord Chancellor (Lyndhurst) remarks: "The Court of Session appears to have taken a very correct view of the international law upon this subject, in considering the law of the country where the debt is contracted as furnishing the rule by which the nature and extent of the obligation were to be tried." His lordship refers approvingly to a previous case, Palmer and Co. v. Glas (1835, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. xiii. p. 308), where the Court of Session applied the law of India as to the rate of interest in the case of a claim for moneys invested in an Indian business. In both cases Indian interest was given. It will be observed that his lordship speaks of the place where the debt was contracted. From the context it will be evident that this expression is not used merely in the narrow sense of the place in which the instrument of obligation was drawn up, or the money originally paid over, but as meaning the place in which the loan was employed. The same rule was followed in the more recent case of Price and Logan v. Wise (1862, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiv. p. 491), where Indian interest was allowed to the executors of a clerk, who claimed moneys due to him by an Indian commercial firm.

Again, in Gillow and Co. v. Burgess (1824, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. iii. p. 45), interest on an open account, for furnishings by an English tradesman to a person resident in England, was refused by the Scottish Court on account of the provisions of the law of England that in such circumstances no interest is due. On the other hand, an Irish Insurance Company, which establishes agents in Scotland and undertakes to pay its policies in cash in Scotland, must submit to the law of Scotland as regards interest (St Patrick Assurance Company v. Brebner, 1829, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. viii. p. 51).

In this latter case, however, the court were of opinion that interest would be due (but for special circumstances) on the amount sued for after the date of citation in the action, that is, that process interest would be regulated by the lex fori. But, as has been seen in the case of Kibble already quoted, Indian interest was allowed on an Indian debt at twelve per cent. up to the date of final judgment, a decision which was repeated in Wilkinson v. Monies (1821, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. i. p. 89), interest on an American debt being allowed there at seven per cent. up to the date of judgment. In Palmer and Co's. case, cited supra, Indian interest was allowed up to final decree, and the lex fori was thus set aside in favour of the lex contractus.

7. PARTIES TO OBLIGATIONS. AGENCY.

§ 267. The local law, to which an obligation is, as regards its import and effect, generally subject, will also rule the question whether each of several persons, who have jointly stipulated for something or jointly contracted a debt, has a right to claim, or a duty to satisfy the whole obligation.¹

If the obligation does not rest upon bona fides, or if the special character of the contract (e.g. ex delicto) does not require the application of the lex loci actus, and if there is no room to infer from the intention of parties that the duty undertaken by them is to be read according to the law of the place of performance, then the lex domicilii will settle for each debtor whether or not he is bound to satisfy the whole or what part of the debt, or whether he is entitled to refer the creditor to some other debtor (beneficium divisionis, excussionis).²

Story (§ 327*b*) takes the following illustration: By the law of England a double policy of insurance upon a ship for the same voyage is quite competent; in case the ship is lost, the insured may require the whole sum insured from either of the underwriters he pleases, and then the underwriter who pays has pro rata a right of recourse against the other. By the law of France the first policy, which covers the full value of the subject, is the only valid policy, and the first underwriter, if he should have to pay, has no recourse at all against the second.³ Now, in this case, the insurer who has had, according to English law, to make good the obligation, has no action against a French insurer, and neither has the first insurer, who has by French law become answerable, any recourse against the second insurer in England. There is no recourse against the French insurer, because, in binding himself, he did not mean to make himself liable to any such claim, and the Frenchman has no right of recourse against the other, because the French law, which supplements and prescribes his contract intentions for him, knows of no such right.⁴

³ Code de Commerce, art. 359.

⁴ So, too, Story, for this reason: "If a different view were adopted, there might be an entire want of reciprocity."

It is a very important and very common question whether a contract concluded by any one as representative of another, is in a legal sense made at the place where the principal is, or where his agent is. Fœlix, i. p. 244, Fiore (§ 248), and several of the judgments to which Story (§ 286*b et seq.*)⁵ refers, take the latter view, for the reason that the mandatary fully represents the mandant, and therefore the case must be treated as if the mandant had come to the place where the contract is concluded.

As Hert⁶ has noticed, however, according to this view the case must be distinguished, in which the contract which has been concluded by the mandatary is not to become binding until it has been confirmed by the mandant. In such a case the mandatary has in truth only prepared the contract, it is the mandant who concludes it. This is to be remembered in connection with the method in which many insurance companies⁷ at the present day are in use to make their contracts of insurance, and in connection, too, with those not uncommon cases in which commercial travellers do not make a definite contract for the house which they represent, but merely collect orders and then hand them over to their principals for definite acceptance. But again, on the other hand, we must distinguish the case in which the mandatary has given himself out to the third party not as a mandatary, but has concluded the contract in his own name, as commissioner in the technical sense.⁸ In such a case the mandant has simply given the mandatary an order to do a piece of business in accordance with his own (the mandatary's) law, or in accordance with the law of the place where the business is to be done, and the mandant has subsequently to relieve the mandatary of the transaction. These distinct cases are frequently improperly confused.

§ 268. Two views of the case may be taken; first, we may hold the contract to have been made by the agent or mandatary, and to affect the principal or mandant only by virtue of the contract or the legal relation that exists between him and his agent.⁹ This view will give a result contrary to that expressed above, for, as the agent's contract only takes effect as

⁵ Wharton, § 406, is of this view; so, too, Foote, p. 366. "Qui facit per alium, facit per se."

This theory of English law and of the law of the United States hangs together with the prevalence of the view, in England and the United States, that the law of the place where the contract is made is, generally speaking, regulative of it. The results are in England evaded by holding that in doubt the contracting party has contracted only with the mandatary, and not with the mandant. See Foote, p. 368.

⁶ De coll. § 4, note 55. Accordingly a decision of the Appeal Court at Lucca holds (J. viii. p. 449) that in such cases the contract concluded by the agent is not liable to the stamp-duties imposed by the law of his (the agent's) country. See Clunet, ibid.

⁷ See the grounds of decision given by Lord Lyndhurst [in Pattison v. Mills, 1828, 3 W. and S. p. 218, and 1 Dow and Cl. 342: "If I, residing in England, send down my agent to Scotland, and he makes contracts for me there, it is the same as if I myself went there and made them."]

⁸ So, too, Fœlix, ut cit.; Fiore, § 249; Pardessus, § 1354.

⁹ So Thöl, Handelsrecht, ii. § 25.

regards the principal by force of the contract between these persons, and only so far as that contract permits, the obligation of the principal must be determined by the law to which the contract of mandate itself is subject,¹⁰ and that, as a rule, will be the lex domicilii of the principal. By the second view, which regards the contract as concluded with the principal himself, and looks upon his mandatary as a messenger, it is still more difficult to reach the result stated above. If we consider the matter as if the intention to contract did not originate with the agent, but with the principal, that intention of course originated where the principal happened to be, and the case we are considering cannot be distinguished from that of a contract concluded by letter or telegram. The theory which regards the contract as if it were concluded by a principal who is personally present on the spot, rests upon a contradiction; it looks upon the principal as the party to the contract, but makes the law of the agent the test by which the contract is tried.

It is, however, correct to say that, within the limits of the authority given to the agent, his representations, and the law to which these are subject,¹¹ must rule, but beyond these limits no responsibility attaches to the principal.

In support of the opposite view, it is urged that if the other party to the contract, in reliance upon the law of the place of contract, has bona fide held the powers of the agent to be larger than they were, it is necessary for the sake of protecting commerce to apply the lex loci contractus. This is, however, a mistake. If any person contracts with one who describes himself as the agent of the subject of another country, he has a plain intimation that he should inform himself as to the laws of the place where that authority was conferred.¹² If he neglects this, he no more deserves protection than if he had contracted without inquiring whether there was any authority at all; in both cases he may have recourse upon the agent to whose express or tacit representations he trusted.

When we consider the point more closely, it will be seen that to determine the authority of the agent by the lex loci contractus would be quite inconsistent with the security of commerce. Statutory representatives of legal persons and those who represent others by virtue of family relationship as well as ordinary business agents, could, by contracts made abroad, where the law of the land gave them wider powers, bind the persons represented by them in a way entirely unforeseen. What use would there be, for instance, in a joint stock company restricting the powers of its manager by requiring the concurrent authority of a board of management, or of a general meeting of shareholders, when he would not be bound by that restriction in any contract concluded abroad? The owner or part owner of a ship who can, according to the law of the place where the shipping company exists, free himself from liability by abandoning the ship, might, by a contract of the master's concluded abroad, be bound to pay something more.¹³ But although, in conformity with the general principles which govern the interpretation of contracts, the law that is in force at the place where the authority originates, must be applied to ascertain the extent of the authority conferred, there may indirectly be established an obligation upon the principal to answer to the other party as the lex loci contractus may direct; e.g. a joint stock company appoints some one in a foreign State to be its permanent agent, and advertises the appointment in the public newspapers of that country without noticing the limitations imposed on such an appointment by the law of the domicile of the company. The public are in such a case entitled to hold that the authority of the agent is that which such a person has by the law and the usage of their own country.

¹⁰ Unusual limitations of agency can only be regarded if proper notice is given. Thöl, Handelsr. § 31, c.; Savigny, Obligationenrecht, ii. pp. 60, 61.

Story (286*d*) calls attention to this difficult case, but gives no decision on it himself: By the law which prevails at the place of execution of a power of attorney, the domicile of the mandant, that power of attorney

¹³ See the case given by Story, § 286*c*. "The question whether a third party, as partner of the debtor in the contract, can be made answerable for the prestations of a contract, is not to be ruled by the law of the place where the contract was made, but by the law of the place where the partnership was constituted." Judgment of Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, 31st March 1846 (Seuffert, ii. p. 324); Judgments of the Supreme Court of Commerce, 4th Dec. 1872 (Seuffert, xxviii. § 48); 17th Feb. 1871 (Seuffert, xxvi. § 101). Fiore, who proposes generally to apply the law of the place where the contract is made, provided the agent has power to make it, says very truly (§ 254) that in spite of that the responsibilities of the partners of a trading firm cannot be determined by the law of the place in which they have concluded a contract by means of an agent. The one view is contradictory of the other; for it is in truth the contracting will or intention of the firm that limits their liability. Fiore falls back upon the idea of capacity to act, and attempts to set up the authority of the law of the place to which the firm belongs.

¹⁴ E.g. by the law of England (5 and 6 Vict. c. 36) an agent provided with certain papers, and actually in possession of goods, may effectually deal with these as if he were the owner, in so far as the party with whom he deals is in good faith (cf. Stephen, ii. pp. 76, 77).

falls with the mandant's death, whereas, by the law of the place where it is to be carried out, the domicile of the mandatary, it would still subsist. Phillimore (§ 705) in such a case holds that a transaction concluded in name of the mandant in favour of a bona fide third party must be upheld, just because bona fides is one of the most essential principles of private international law. Fiore (§ 335) goes still further, and thinks that the power of attorney is to be regarded as still subsisting even as regards the relation of mandant and mandatary, because the law of that place in which the power of attorney is to have its operation must rule. The result of this latter position would be that a power of attorney, the operation of which was not confined to any particular place, but which was intended to have effect, wherever the person holding it thought fit to use it, would have to be ruled by an infinite variety of local laws as different circumstances might occur. It is by no means uncommon in practice to find such powers of attorney, and indeed they are matters of necessity. But if such a decision were given, any protection on which the person giving the power might rely by reason of limitations of the power would prove illusory. Besides, there is no ground on which a theory of testing contracts exclusively by the law of the place where they are to have their effect can be set up. Fiore himself does not adopt any such theory. But no more can I support Phillimore's view. If a man contracts as the agent of a foreigner on the ground of a power of attorney given in a foreign country, the third party contracting with him cannot reasonably be held excused, if he makes no enquiry at all as to the foreign law by which that power of attorney is ruled. The principle of protecting a third party who contracts in good faith must have some limitation, if it is not to be turned into a source of legal uncertainty. As then, in the case we have put, the third party is much better able to protect himself than the person who gave the power of attorney—supposing that this power of attorney is, as the solution given by Phillimore suggests, to subject him to a law of which he knows nothing—then in the interest of legal security we must decide in favour of the person who gave the power of attorney.

NOTE S ON §§ 267-269. AGENCY.

[To the statement of foreign law on the subject of agency it is unnecessary to add anything beyond a reference to the case of Christianse v. David and Javitz (16th Dec. 1885, R.G. vi. J. xiv. p. 84), in which it was held by the court that a commission agent for a German house, who was resident in London, was entitled to appeal to the law of England to determine questions as to the method of his remuneration, e.g. whether he was entitled to pay himself out of the proceeds of goods in his hands.

As regards the law of England and Scotland on the matter of agency, the questions which arise seem to fall under two heads, the first of which comprises questions as to the rights and obligations of the principal and agent inter se, while the second deals with the rights and obligations which principal and agent have against and to third parties.

On the former class of questions there is little or no authority in England or Scotland, a fact which may perhaps be accounted for by supposing that in such cases the relations of parties are always expressed in writing. The form of a mandate will be tested by the lex loci actus (Gt. Northern Railway Co. v. Laing, 1848, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. x. p. 1408). It was held in the case of Kerslake v. Clark (1820, More's Notes to Stair, vi.) that the extent and character of a power of attorney, upon which action was brought in Scotland, must be determined by the law of England, the country in which it had been granted, which was also, so far as it appears, the domicile of both parties. This case, however, would only go to exclude the application of the lex fori. Again, in the case of Cunningham & Co. Ltd. (1887, L.R. 36 Ch. D. 522), it seems to have been assumed that questions as to the extent of the powers of an agent acting for a company must be determined by English law, the law of the seat of the company, and not that of the seat of the transaction, Buenos Ayres, although the document embodying the transaction, as to which it was debated whether the agent had power to grant it, was expressed in Spanish.

But as regards the other class of questions, viz. what are the rights and obligations of principals, and, again, what those of agents against and to third parties, there is more authority in the laws of both countries. In the first place, Lord Lyndhurst has laid it down (Albion Insurance Co. v. Mills, 1828, 3 W. and S. 233) that "If my agent executes" a contract "in Scotland, it is the same as if I were myself on the spot, and executed it in Scotland." The result of this dictum would seem to be that the rights and obligations of the principal, in questions with third parties, will be the same as if he had himself concluded the contract, i.e. that he will be answerable to claims made by the other party, and will himself have right to sue on the contract, to the exclusion of his agent, in the one case as in the other. Lord Kyllachy in a recent case (Delaurier v. Wyllie, 1889, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xvii. at p. 191) states the law of Scotland in the same way: he says the general rule is not "on this matter doubtful. It is that whether the principal is disclosed or undisclosed, contracts made by an agent on behalf of his principal are the contracts of the principal, who may sue and be sued upon them, and to whom, in the case of sale, the property passes by delivery to the agent. Such is certainly the general rule, and I have not been able to discover that any exception has been established in the case of foreign principals." This opinion is no doubt entitled to great weight, but it would rather seem as if the safer way of stating the law were that the question whether an agent dealing factorio nomine binds a foreign principal or not is a question of fact, and the presumption will vary in each case, this much no doubt being certain, that the mere fact of the principal being a foreigner will not raise the presumption that the agent intends to bind himself (Millar v. Mitchell, etc. 1860, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxii. p. 833). That presumption may be stronger where the agent is buying for a foreign principal, and where the prestation on his side, viz. payment, can be made by agent just as well as by principal: it will be weaker where he is selling for a foreign principal, since delivery of the object sold may obviously not be within his power, and cannot have been believed by the other party to be so. This is the view of the law taken in the recent case of Bennett v. Inveresk Paper Co. 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 975, where it was held that, although by the usage of trade there might be a presumption that a British commission merchant deals as a principal and not as an agent, that presumption will give way to evidence that he is acting as agent, and if that be proved he may then sue in his own name. The law so established in Scotland is different from that of England, and it had at one time in Scotland been thought that the English rule was the proper one, and that the fact of the principal being a foreigner raised a presumption that the agent was himself bound (Cochrane, January 16, 1818, F. C. Bell's Comm. i. p. 536).

The law of England is stated in Addison on Contracts (p. 65) to the effect that when an English agent contracts on behalf of a foreign principal, it will, in general, be presumed that the agent was intended to be responsible for the fulfilment of the contract. The agent does not pledge the credit of his foreign constituent, and that constituent cannot be sued on the contract. The reasons for this doctrine are thus explained by Mr Justice Blackburn (Armstrong v. Stokes, 1872, L. R. 7, Q. B. 598): "The great inconvenience that would result, if there were privity of contract established between the foreign constituents of a commission merchant and the home suppliers of the goods, has led to a course of business in consequence of which it has long been settled that a foreign constituent does not give the commission merchant any authority to pledge his credit to those from whom the commissioner buys them by his order or on his account. It was true that this was originally (and in strictness perhaps still is) a question of fact; but the inconvenience of holding that privity of contract was established between a Liverpool merchant and the grower of every bale of cotton which is forwarded to him in consequence of his order given to a commission merchant at New Orleans, or between a New York merchant and the supplier of every bale of goods purchased in consequence of his order to a London commission merchant, is so obvious and well known that we are justified in treating it as a matter of law, and saying that, in the absence of evidence of an express authority to that effect, the commission agent cannot pledge his foreign constituent's credit." The foreign principal will thus not be liable to action under the contract, nor will he, conversely, be entitled to sue on the contract (Elbinger Actien Gesellschaft v. Claye, 1873, L. R. 8, Q. B. 313), but that will not prevent him from following his own goods or their proceeds, if he can identify them (Kaltenbach v. Lewis, 1885, L. R. 10, App. Ca. p. 617). Reference may be made to the criticism of these views of Lord Blackburn used by Lord Maclaren in the Court of Session, in the case of Bennett, quoted supra. His lordship treats Lord Blackburn's statement as a statement of what is known to be a general usage in the foreign trade, giving rise to a presumption of fact, and not as a statement of a rule of law.

But the same law will not be applied in cases in which principal and agent are both foreigners, and an English third party has dealt with the agent factorio nomine. There the foreign law will be taken into consideration as a circumstance in determining the nature and effect of the authority given by the principal to the agent. It is said, however, that the question whether that principal, who is undisclosed, can sue upon the contract made by the agent with an Englishman and prestable in England, is a question to be determined by English law, the law of the contract between the agent and the third party, and not by the law of the mandate or agency. In determining that question, however, a different rule will prevail from that stated above for the case of a foreign principal and an English agent: the question then would seem as in Scotland to be a question of fact, and a highly important element is the law of the agency. (Maspons Y. Hermano v. Mildred, 1882, 9 Q. B. D. 530).

It is somewhat remarkable that in cases where the agent is English and the principal foreign, the question does not seem ever to have been put, What is the law regulating the mandate? It would appear to have been assumed that the law of the contract—of sale or whatever it might be—would determine the question, and that the law of the mandate was not worth consideration even where, as in Scotland, the question was held to be one to be determined upon the circumstances of each particular case. This is the more remarkable, as in Scotland (Edin. and Glasgow Bank v. Ewan, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xiv. p. 557) the question as to the right of a company to sue or their liability to be sued as a company—an analogous question—was held to depend on the law which regulated the constitution of the company, since it was through the contract of co-partnery alone that they could come or be brought into the field.

The recent Factors' Act (1889, 52 and 53 Vict. c. 45, subsequently extended to Scotland) which deals with the power of a mercantile agent to give a good title to third parties by sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods of which he is in possession by consent of the true owner, is expressed in terms so general as to cover all such transactions concluded by agents in this country with reference to goods situated here, no matter what the powers of the owner, if we suppose him to be a foreigner, may be in questions with that agent. The questions naturally arising here, however, are the questions dealt with in the last paragraph of the text, and committed by the author to the determination of the lex rei sitæ.

One highly important branch of the doctrine of agency is that as to the authority of a shipmaster to bind his owners in a foreign port. Story states the law of England to be that the law of the domicile of the owner would rule (§ 286*b*), and the court of Bremen (Harvey v. Engelbert, 1877, J. v. p. 627) came to the same result, on the ground of the rule "locus regit actum," the mandate of the master being given at the domicile of the owner and of himself, and the extent of the mandate being, therefore, a matter to be determined by that law. Story indicates a doubt whether this is just, whether it would not be right to prefer the law of the place of contract. Brodie, in his notes on Stair, p. 956, thus sums up the matter: "The clear result, then, is that the transactions must be held to have reference to the master's implied mandate" (the commentator is dealing with contracts by a shipmaster) "according to the law of his own country—a mandate which it is the duty of those who deal with him as an agent to ascertain the extent of; and that, while they never can justly complain of having their right limited by such a principle, the shipmaster cannot be supposed to intend an abuse of his powers; whence the very gist of all contracts, the understanding of parties, would be wanting to infer a right, ex lege loci contractus, which the scope of his authority did not import."

Mr MacLachlan, in his work on Merchant Shipping, criticises the views advanced by Mr Story and Mr Brodie, and adopts as the rule in such contracts the law of the flag which the ship carries, a law which must be known to those with whom the master contracts (p. 180). This conclusion is rested mainly on a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, Lloyd v. Guibert, 1865, L. R. 1, Q. B. 115, in which Blackburn, J., says in language which is applicable generally to the law of mandate: "We think that the power of the master to bind his owners personally is but a branch of the general law of agency. And it seems clear that if a principle gives a mandate to an agent containing a condition that all contracts which the agent makes on behalf of his principal shall be subject to a defeasance, those who contract through that agent, with notice of that mandate containing such a limit on his authority, cannot hold the principal bound absolutely. And, we think, as far as regards the implied authority of the master of a ship to bind his owners personally, the flag of the ship is notice to all the world that the master's authority is that conferred by the law of that flag—that his mandate is contained in the law of that country, with which those who deal with him must make themselves acquainted at their peril."

In this decision, regard is paid to the question, What is the mandate? It is required of those contracting that they shall enquire what that mandate is, but, as we have seen, that doctrine does not seem to be carried into the general law of agency, where the obligations of parties hinc inde are determined without any such reference.]

8. CONTRACTS CONCLUDED BY LETTER, TELEGRAM, OR TELEPHONE.

§ 270. The discussion of contracts concluded by agents leads naturally to the question, by what local law contracts concluded by letter between persons who never meet¹ are to be determined. We have already (p. 280) discussed the question in so far as the form of the contracts is concerned, and the result of the principles we have established is that the general rule whereby the laws of the domiciles of the two parties decide, must be applied. No reason at all can be given why either the offerer or the acceptor should be entitled to appeal exclusively to the law of his own domicile. Each party can only hold the other to be bound in the sense in which the law of that other's domicile permits.²

The great majority of authorities,³ however, propose to regard the law of the place, in which the transaction was concluded, as authoritative. In this theory there is in the first place, as we have already pointed out, a vicious circle of reasoning, since it is impossible that the question as to what local law shall rule should be dependent on the question as to where in law the contract was executed, but rather the former question must be answered before the latter can be put. Further, the determination of what local law is to rule is made to depend in a way that is not desirable upon the issue of a very doubtful controversy, on which widely different views are entertained.⁴

Wächter,⁵ Savigny,⁶ and Stobbe (§ 33, note 11) are of the opinion which I hold; but Roth, too, must be counted as an adherent of this theory, since his general view is that the domicile of the contracting parties must decide. Savigny, no doubt, makes this distinction, that where there is a definite place of performance fixed the law of that place is alone to be applied. It is not necessary again to discuss this point, resulting as it does from the principles adopted by him.⁷

Very often, and particularly where there is a final and complete offer made on the one side, which is simply accepted on the other, the contract must be interpreted according to the law of the offerer.⁸ In this way, the view which I have taken frequently yields the same result as that which

² We must premise that the domicile, and the place from which the letter is dated, coincide.

³ Thus Burge, iii. p. 743; Story, § 285; Bornemann, i. p. 65; and Foelix, i. p. 225, § 105, are for the domicile of the acceptor; a judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Dresden (reported by Kritz, ii. p. 120); Massé, p. 130 (No. 94); Günther, p. 750; Seuffert, i. p. 252; Fiore, § 247; Laurent, vii. § 447, on the other hand pronounce for the domicile of the offerer. See, too, a judgment of the Appeal Court of the Rhine at Berlin, 21st September 1831 (Volkmar, p. 141). [Trib. Comm. Gand, 1876; Velghe v. Van Oye, J. ix. 564, takes the former view.]

⁴ On the different views, see Windscheid, Pand. ii. § 306; Lomonaco, p. 160. Different codes are likely to differ on this point. See Allgem. Deutsch. Handelsgesetz. §§ 319-321, and Brocher on the law of Switzerland, ii. p. 80.

⁶ § 371; Guthrie, p. 216.

makes the place where the contract is concluded the determinant, that place—i.e. place of execution—being held to be the place where the offerer was first made aware of the acceptance of his offer.⁹ The result plainly would be otherwise if the offerer made use of phraseology which is current at the domicile of the other party.¹⁰

Contracts concluded by telegram must be dealt with in the same way as those concluded by letter.¹¹ No difficulty, according to the view we have adopted, is occasioned by the conclusion of a contract by telephone, a thing which is of more and more frequent occurrence, as the contrivance is extended between places more and more distant. It shows still more plainly that it is altogether unprofitable and misleading first to set up artificially a place where the contract is to be held as having been made, and having done that to ascertain the law which is to be applied and the meaning of the contract-declaration, in place of simply taking each limb of the contract in the sense in which the particular circumstances of the case show us it must have been meant to be given on the one hand and taken on the other.¹² [See supra, p. 280.]

The case of the domicile of the writer and the place from which he dates his letter being different, is generally passed over; but it must be an event of common occurrence, as, for instance, when one for some time is engaged in carrying on trade in a foreign country. It may easily be solved upon the general principles we have assumed. Under the same conditions under which the law of the place where a contract is made is applicable to a verbal contract, is the law of the place where the letter is dated to be preferred to the law of the domicile of the writer.¹³

§ 271. If an agent, in consequence of a mandant contained in a letter, makes a contract at his own domicile and in his own name, the mandant is liable under the conditions and to the extent prescribed by the law of the agent's domicile; not, indeed, because that is the place where the contract was made, but because the agent has without doubt bound himself by that law, and is to be kept scatheless at the hands of his principal even according to the law of his own domicile.¹⁴ If the agent should buy for himself the

¹⁰ Bard, § 199, is right to call attention to the case of a letter or telegram being forwarded to a person at another place, in which he happens to be for some altogether temporary purpose. The contract may have become binding at this place. But is its law, the law of a place of which neither party had any thought, to rule? He, like Massé (§ 579), is of opinion that no universal rule can be set up, but that the circumstances of the particular case must decide. Our conclusion is simply that the whole question as to where the contract was formally made is useless, and may be thrown out of view.

¹¹ Laurent, vii. § 451. He again appeals to Asser on telegraph law.

¹² Windscheid, e.g. (Pand. § 306), holds that, even when both parties live in the same territory, the point of time from which their respective obligations date is not the same.

¹³ Particularly if bona fides requires it.

goods entrusted to him, the law of his domicile would rule this sale; for the mandant would have to give any other purchaser that privilege, and he has himself contracted under the same conditions as any other purchaser.¹⁵ If the mandatary does not make the contract in his own name, the principles we have already laid down as to the contraction of obligations by an agent will apply.¹⁶

9. RATIFICATION. CONDITIONAL CONTRACTS.

§ 272. A kindred question is the question whether the place where a contract is ratified, or the place where it is originally drawn up, is to be held as its true place.

Casaregis¹ decides that it must be the place where it was originally made. He says: "Ratio est, quia ille ratificationis consensus, licet emittatur in loco ratificantis, et ibi videtur se unire cum altero precedente gerentis consensu, qui venit a loco gerentis ad locum ratificantis, retrahitur ad tempus et ad locum, in quo fuit per gestorem initus contractus." But the question is not to be so absolutely decided. When any one becomes a party to a contract already validly concluded between others, it may very well be that he can only ratify that contract to the effect and in the terms in which it is already conceived;² and it was that case which Casaregis had in his eye. If, on the other hand, the contract was from the first concluded on condition of obtaining the approval of that third party, this case is to be considered as identical with the case where one sends an offer to another; the representative of the third party has only thrown the contract into the sort of shape which is likely to meet the approval of his principal.³ The place where the contract was drawn up is only of importance for the interpretation of the contract in the technical sense.⁴

On the other hand, where a contract already concluded is ratified by

is no doubt at variance with the rest of his theory ("Le contrat du commissionnaire perdrait toute son utilité si le commissionnaire ne pouvait agir qu'après avoir répondu par lettres qu'il accepte").

¹⁶ A judgment of the Supreme Court of Berlin laid down this doctrine: "With reference to a commission for the purchase of corn for spring delivery, given to an agent in Berlin, the usage of trade in Berlin, by which delivery must be made on a particular day, will be applicable, if this usage was known to the party giving the order."

¹ Disc. de commercio, 179, § 20, according to the citation in Story, § 286.

² In the same way, if one has contracted as negotiorum gestor of another but in his own name, and the principal subsequently ratifies the transaction.

the same persons, the question whether the law of the place where it was first drawn up, or of the place where the forms required by statute or stipulated by express agreement of parties are gone through, is to rule, depends, as Hert⁵ properly remarks, in the first place, upon whether the form serves merely for authentication or is required to give validity to the deed. In the former case, the place where the contract is put into the required shape cannot be held to be the place of the contract or decisive as to it; in the latter case, it is truly the locus contractus,⁶ but the previous agreement of parties is not without importance, in so far as antecedent negotiations may be used to interpret a contract.

If a contract is concluded under conditions, the law of the place where it is concluded, and not that of the place where the condition is fulfilled, will rule. This latter law can only demand attention, in so far as there may be any question as to the fact, which is made a condition of the contract. E.g. one promises another a sum of money on condition that he shall have himself naturalised in another country, and buy a manor or barony there. The validity of the naturalisation and of the purchase of the estate is, of course, to be tested by the law of that other country.

10. ALTERATION OF EXISTING OBLIGATIONS. Dolus, Culpa, Mora.

DESTRUCTION OF THE SUBJECT OF THE OBLIGATION.

§ 273. The alteration of existing obligations by contract needs no further elaboration. If a new contract is added on to an existing contract, the place of the latter contract is not identical with the place of the former. The second contract concluded, we shall say at B, is formally valid, if it is in conformity with the law recognised at B, although a different form is necessary at A, the place where the first and principal contract was made.¹

On the other hand, the alteration of obligations through the fault of the debtor is to be ruled by the law which is generally applicable to the interpretation of the contract. If the debtor produces an alteration of the obligation through culpa or dolus, that is merely an indirect result of the fact that by the obligations of the contract he was bound to act differently.²

⁵ IV. 55. Cf. Burge, iii. p. 775. For this decision, see, too, Fiore, § 249; Wharton, §§ 418a, 406; Laurent, vii. §§ 457 and 466.

¹ For instance, in one country contracts must be in writing; the parties to such a contract add thereto a pactum displicentiae in some State in which a contract of the kind may be informally entered into. It must, however, be kept in view that it may be doubtful, looking to the reference to the former contract made in a different country, whether the parties really intended to enter upon a binding engagement, since a particular form was required at the first place, and they did no more than make an informal agreement at the second.

Testa, pp. 104 and 121.

Nothing therefore depends upon the place in which he has, by reason of this act of culpa or dolus, incurred liability; the law of this place is only so far of importance as the amount of compensation due to the creditor is to be determined by it.³ We have already examined the opposite theory,⁴ which takes as its fundamental rule the law of the place where the illegal omission or act has been done.

The same principles will determine alterations caused by delay, mora, whether it be on the part of the debtor or the creditor, and will also rule the question as to whether there has been any mora. Of course, the question whether proper performance has been given or tendered will depend on the law of the place of performance, in respect that the performance is governed by the law or custom that prevails there. Very many authorities fail to distinguish these questions sharply,⁵ and it is no uncommon thing to find that those who in other matters are not disposed to allow the law of the place of performance to rule, do in this class of cases apply it indiscriminately, and sometimes with a reference to the principles of the law of bills. But any such reference, particularly a reference to the law of the protest of bills, is quite inapplicable to this subject, as we shall see. In this connection, however, we find in the literature of our subject very many gaps and a great deal of obscurity, and it is often barely possible to set out even with an approximation to certainty what view this or that writer takes. The liability of the debtor arising from mora, is identical with his obligation to timeous performance, and the loss suffered by the creditor in consequence of the failure to accept performance is the immediate consequence of the limitation of the debtor's liability contained in the original contract of obligation to which he was a party.⁶ The disadvantageous results of denying liability in an action, are to be considered as purely penalties imposed upon the debtor⁷ in the course of process, and depend, therefore, upon the law of the place where the suit is proceeding.

After what we have already said, it cannot be doubted that any alteration of the obligation by accident, e.g. by the destruction of the subject of the contract,⁸ or by a commodum attaching to it (fruits), is to be ruled exclusively by the local law to which the contract is generally subject.⁹

³ E.g. if a person uses an article committed to his charge in an illegal way, he must restore the current price of that article at the place where he has so used it. Cf. Story, § 307, who notes that if a vessel has been used in violation of a contract, the amount of damages must be determined by the rate of interest current in that place.

⁴ Felix, i. p. 249.

⁶ Cf. authors cited in note 2. As to interest upon postponed payments, see supra, § 266. Felix is of a different opinion. Bartolus ad L. 1, C. de S. Trin. No. 18, holds that the law of the forum must decide. Ibi contracta est mora.

11. TRANSFERENCE OF OBLIGATIONS. ASSIGNATION.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

§ 274. The transference of an obligation to some other person as creditor is subject to the local law to which the contract is generally subject: the question whether an obligation has been validly transferred, is identical with the question whether an obligation still subsists for the advantage of the former creditor, or whether another person can claim the advantages of it for himself.¹ The law which rules the obligation generally, that is to say, in most cases, the lex domicilii of the debtor, will decide.²

But the assignation or transference of a right to compel implement rests also upon an independent transaction between the former creditor and his assignee, it may be upon a sale between them. The essentials of this independent transaction and its operation depend upon a different local law from that which rules the obligation which is transferred. If the transference or assignation of the obligation, considered as an independent transaction between the original creditor and his assignee, is valid, the debtor plainly has no interest to refuse payment to the assignee.³ If he obeys the will of the original creditor, validly declared, that he shall pay to the assignee, he is protected in any question with the original creditor by the exceptio doli, and he has no further interest in the matter. The case stands thus: The debtor is free if he pays to a creditor who has right as assignee by the law that rules the obligation which has been assigned,⁴ but

² Fiore, § 340, recognises this. See the judgment of the German Imperial Court cited infra, note 4; see also Bolze, Praxis, vol. 5, § 22 (Cession of claims of inheritance up to a specified value).

⁴ We may thus agree with the result at which the Supreme Court of Bavaria, on 23rd June 1882 (Seuffert, xxxviii. § 91), arrived. The debtor, who was defender in the action, objected that by the law of the legal transaction, i.e. the assignation, itself, the cedent was entitled to recall it without the consent of the assignee, and the right of this assignee could not, as yet, on that account be made good against him. The court repelled this objection, on the ground, which was not, in my opinion, sound, that the contract of assignation was intended to come into operation in the debtor's country, and, by the law of that country, was irrevocable. See, on the other hand, German Imp. Ct. (ii.) 1st June 1880 (Entsch. i. § 157, p. 437): "For the determination of the question whether P's insolvent estate can make a valid payment to no he is also free if he pays to a creditor who has right by the local law that regulates the independent transaction.⁵ An exception to the former rule occurs only if the debtor knows for certain that the creditor has not yet truly assigned his rights to the pretended assignee according to the law that regulates the assignation; the debtor who should in such a case plead payment would be met successfully by the replica doli. For it must be held to be in accordance with all systems of positive law, that no debtor is entitled to pay to one whom he knows not to have right to the debt as against the original creditor.⁶

This is the only theory⁷ which can be actually put in force without hardship. If the local law to which the original contract was subject were alone to decide, the right of the creditor on the one hand would be endangered, and on the other could, in many cases, not be transferred without great difficulties: the former, because a declaration of will, which by the lex loci actus would have no binding force, would, by the law of the place of the original obligation, transfer to the assignee the obligation itself, or a right to claim upon it; the latter, because it would frequently be difficult, or perhaps even impossible, in a foreign country to observe the requirements of an assignation according to the local law applicable to the obligation so assigned. If, on the other hand, the law to which the assignation as an independent act is subject were to rule, we should require the debtor to know all kinds of foreign territorial law, that he might at his own risk determine what the right of any pretended assignee was—a requirement all the more unfavourable since the debtor has no power either to foresee or to prevent the assignation.

WHERE AN ARRESTMENT AND AN ASSIGNATION COME INTO COMPETITION.

§ 275. On these principles we can easily determine what is the effect of an arrestment of a right to enforce implement or payment which is said one but E, is to be determined by the law which prevails at the domicile of the debtor. Again, the German Imp. Ct. (iv.) 28th Nov. 1867 (Entsch. xx. § 53, p. 235), holding that the assignation in its material effects must be tested by the law which prevails at the seat of the legal relation, which is transferred.

⁵ Judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, 29th November 1855 (Frankfurt, Coll. of Römer, 2, p. 263), and 31st March 1856 (p. 359). "Questions as to the essentials of the assignation are ruled by the law of the place of the assignation." In both cases it may be observed that the foreign law was favourable to the right claimed by the pursuer. On the latter judgment, cf. Seuffert, vol. ii. p. 162. Judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, of 14th September 1850 (Seuffert, vol. x. p. 122, reported from the collection referred to, vol. ii. p. 100): "The form of the assignation is fixed by the law of the place in which it was carried through." In this case, too, the law of the place of assignation was favourable to the transference of the right. That the form should be determined by the law of the place where the assignation was carried through, is a consequence of the rule "locus regit actum." To the same effect, German Imp. Ct. (iv.) 28th Nov. 1887, Bolze, Praxis, v. § 22.

to have been already assigned. Payment made by the debtor in bona fide, in accordance with the law that regulates the principal obligation in question, must be recognised by all creditors; the debtor could not be forced to make payment a second time, even although the assignation were not yet validly completed according to the local law which regulates it. But if payment has not yet been made, the debtor cannot appeal to the territorial law that regulates the principal obligation, with a view of disputing the validity of the arrestment: for by laying on this arrestment it is asserted that an assignation, if such there be, is invalid by the local law that regulates it: until this question between the arrester and the pretended assignee is determined, no bona fide payment can be made.⁸

Let us take, in the first place, the case that the law of the obligation itself, i.e. the law of the debtor, requires fewer conditions for the validity of the assignation than does the law to which the assignation itself belongs. E.g. the former law requires no intimation to the debtor, the latter does. Now, let us suppose that in executing the assignation the former law is satisfied, but not the latter. The result is that, in a question with the arrestment, assuming the validity of the arrestment, the assignation is ineffectual, for the legal transaction of assignation has in itself never had any existence. In the converse case, where it is the law of the debtor that has the stricter requirements, the arrestment is still effectual, and must be preferred to the assignation. For the jus exigendi has not yet been transferred in accordance with the law that regulates it, and thus the assignation is, so far as the arresting creditor is concerned, res inter alios acta, a transaction which can have no influence on his right.⁹

NOTE T ON §§ 274, 275. ASSIGNATION AND ARRESTMENT.

[The law of Scotland holds that the question of the validity of an assignation of a personal debt must be determined by the law of the place where the assignation is made. An obligation which had been assigned in England, by a deed, which would have availed to transfer it in Scotland, the country where the main contract was to be performed, was not allowed to be sued upon by the assignee in Scotland, because the claim was one which the law of England pronounced to be incapable of being assigned or transferred (Taylor v. Scott, 1847, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. ix. p. 1504). The rule on which the decision bears to proceed is "locus regit actum." It seems a somewhat wide extension of this rule to hold that it regulates not merely the form of the transaction, but its legal possibility, the transaction being one that is to be enforced and performed in another country. It is only right to notice that there was another ground upon which the decision might stand, viz. that the English stamp law had been neglected. A better illustration of the principle is found in the recent case of the Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen (1888, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xvi. p. 112). There the law of the place of assignation of a policy of life insurance was held to determine the validity of the transference. Lord McLaren thus expresses the principle: "The assignment of the right of credit in the policy is a new contract, distinct as regards its nature, mode of constitution, and the law that regulates it, from the contract constituted by the policy itself. And the validity of the assignment will, in general, be determined by the lex loci contractus, that is, according to the law of the country in which the transaction is made, or the security given."

Such being the law as to the validity of transfers of the obligation executed abroad, questions have arisen as to whether such transferences, unintimated to the debtor in Scotland, where intimation is necessary to give complete validity to the transference, will prevail against arrestments used in the hands of the Scottish debtor, subsequent in point of time to the foreign assignation. Professor Bell (Comm. ii. p. 18) holds that, if there is no intimation of the assignation to the Scottish debtor, the arrestment must prevail. He does not, however, give any reason for his opinion. In the case of Strachan v. McDougle (1835, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. xiii. p. 954), a Scottish obligation, a policy of life insurance issued to a Scotsman by a Scottish Insurance Company, was, on the death of the insured, arrested in Scotland. It had previously been assigned in England by delivery of the corpus of the policy, but no intimation had been made to the debtor, an assignment good by the law of England, but incomplete, because unintimated, by the law of Scotland. The arrestment was preferred. It will, however, be observed from the report that the point now under consideration, viz. the question whether the validity of the transference should not be determined by the law of England, was hardly submitted to the court. Reliance seems rather to have been placed on the law merchant, as legalising transferences of such rights without the formality of intimation, and it was this contention that was repelled. In the case of Donaldson v. Ord (1855, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xvii. p. 1053), it was held that an English creditor deed, which is not in itself a complete assignation, could not compete with an arrestment used in Scotland. The creditor deed not being a complete assignation, the question in which we are at present interested is not directly presented for decision, but opinions, to which great weight must be given, are expressed to the effect that an arrestment must prevail against a foreign assignation for behoof of creditors if it is not intimated. The ground on which this conclusion is put is that in such a case you have a competition of diligence for a fund situated in Scotland, that the question is not one of rights, but of the remedies which these rights confer upon their holders, and that that question must be determined by the law of the country in which the competition arises. This is much the same ground as that taken in the text, viz. that it is necessary to consider whether the jus exigendi has been transferred by the law that regulates it.

It is doubtful, however, whether on principle this view is well founded. The jus exigendi must belong to the person to whom the right of credit belongs: the question is not a question of remedy, but a question of competing rights in the obligation, for compelling payment of which the remedy is given; the question is not one of competing diligences, but of the competing titles of creditors who each claim right to do diligence. If the transference is good, then the arresting creditor has neither title nor right on which to do diligence, for his debtor, in whose right he arrests, has parted with all the right he had by a contract that was valid by the law of the country in which it was carried through. This view derives confirmation from the doctrine expounded by Lord McLaren in the case of the Scottish Provident Institution (supra, p. 604), and is very forcibly expressed by Lord Rutherford in the case of Wallace v. Davies (1853, Ct. of Sess. Repts. 2nd ser. xv. p. 693): "The defence that the assignation has not been intimated is not a defence of the same character with that which might be founded on any of the statutory prescriptions, but it is that the right is incomplete; and in case of competition, that it cannot be completed so as to control or affect the right of a third party acquired in the meantime. But if, by the law of the domicile of the cedent—and in this case also of the assignee—the right has been effectually transferred without intimation; intimation which is only necessary to complete the transference cannot be necessary as matter of remedy. . . . If the right be complete by the law of the country which must regulate the transfer, it seems impossible to maintain that, as matter of remedy, something further must be done which the law of Scotland requires for completion of the right in the case only of transfers that are regulated by that law?"

If A has transferred in England to B fully and completely a right to a debt which is localised in Scotland, how can A's creditor thereafter arrest this debt in Scotland? He is not creditor of the person to whom the debt is due: his arrestment is therefore bad.

The principle laid down by Lord Kames, Pr. of Equity, iii. 8, 4, that "the will of a proprietor or creditor is a good title jure gentium," that ought to be effectual everywhere, and the dictum of Story (§ 397) that the creditor may transfer any obligation due to him in accordance with the law of his domicile, would also lead to the result we have indicated as the sound solution.

The question of Scots law here discussed came up in the English Courts in the case of the Queensland Mercantile and Agency Co. L.R. (1891), 1 Ch. 536. North, J., decided on the evidence before him as to the law of Scotland in favour of the arresting creditor, and the Court of Appeal affirmed his judgment (L. R. 1892, 1 Ch. 219). The English Courts, of course, pronounced no opinions of their own as to the soundness of the theory of Scots law, which was put before them in evidence as matter of fact. The case is likely to be carried to the House of Lords, who will determine the point on their own knowledge of the law of Scotland, without requiring evidence.]

In all that has been said it is assumed that the immunity of a debtor who pays in good faith, and after due enquiry, either to a pretended assignee or to his original creditor, will be assured.

The jurisprudence of England and that of the United States has in many cases, as regards the transference of debts, clung to the proposition of English law that debts belong as res incorporales to the class of moveables. In that way they thought that they were dealing with a moveable thing which belongs to the creditor. Then, according to the well-known rule "mobilis personam sequuntur," the transference of the debts would be ruled by the law of the creditor's domicile alone.¹⁰ But that which may hold good of the transference of a debt as one part of an universal succession—and, in truth, the application of the rule "mobilis personam sequuntur" is limited to that case—can never be applied to a singular succession which is founded on an assignment. Accordingly, in more modern times a fashion has been introduced of speaking of a place, a situs of the obligation itself, in this sense that the domicile of the debtor is usually looked upon as being such a situs.¹¹ This jurisprudence has thus wavered undecidedly between an exclusive application of the law of the creditor's domicile, and the exclusive application of that of the debtor's domicile,¹² without taking sufficient account of bona fides, to such an extent that in Westlake it is impossible to discover any distinct opinion. Judicial decisions, too, are full of contradictions. The result is a confusion which is still further increased by an indiscriminate introduction into the subject of the peculiar principles, which are recognised in the transference of bills and of bonds or securities payable to bearer. The laws of these countries have not yet got so far as to acknowledge that debts cannot in this connection be dealt with on the analogy of corporeal things; apparently, however, they are proceeding in that direction.

The law to which the obligation is generally subject must determine whether the assignee can raise an action in his own name against the debtor, or must do so as assignee alieno nomine. If this law recognises assignments in the strict sense only, so that the new creditor is only recognised as the procurator in rem suam of the original creditor, it is not possible that the debtor should by an assignment in a foreign country be placed in any less favourable position, although the difference may be only formal. But if that law allows a complete transference of the obligation, this further question must be decided, viz. whether such a transference was really entered into according to the law which is applicable to the assignation.¹³ Both local laws must, therefore, concur in giving the new creditor right to sue in his own name, before he can do so. On the other hand, the law of the country where the court is, is in this view unimportant. Although the creditor is as likely to come by his own whether he sues alieno nomine or suo nomine, the question as to which is the correct method depends upon the provisions of substantive and not formal law.¹⁴ The doctrine of English law has, as is pointed out in the text, fluctuated between the doctrine that the transference of rights in moveable property, including debts, will be regulated by the law of the owner's domicile, i.e. the creditor's domicile in the case of a debt which is assigned, and the more modern doctrine that such questions will be determined by the law of the situs. These principles are expressed in the cases cited by Mr Westlake, § 150, the latter being laid down by North, J., in a recent case (in re Queensland Mercantile and Agency Co. L. R. (1891), 1 Ch. 536, thus: "A transfer of moveable property, duly carried out according to the law of the place where the property is situated, is not rendered ineffectual by showing that such transfer as carried out is not in accordance with what would be required by law in the country where its owner is domiciled:" and his lordship illustrates this proposition by the case of a domiciled Scotsman giving a bill of sale over his furniture in a house occupied by him in London. He cannot dispute the validity of the bill because such a transaction is unknown to the law of Scotland.

For the case of the assignment of a right of credit, the law of the place of the contract, i.e. the place to which the contract truly belongs, will prevail; that may be the place of assignment, or the place of the domicile of the contracting parties, according to circumstances. Lee v. Abdy, 1886, L. R. 17, Q. B. D. 309.]

INCOMPETENCY OF ASSIGNATION OF CERTAIN CLAIMS. ASSIGNATION FOR A CONSIDERATION LESS THAN THE VALUE OF THE DEBT. (Lex Anastasiana.)

§ 276. We must determine in the same way the competency generally of any transference or assignation of the rights conferred by an obligation. If certain rights, or rights under certain circumstances, e.g. rights involved in a depending action (res litigiosæ, cf. L. 3, D. de litigiosis, 44, 6),¹⁵ cannot, according to the local law to which they are subject,¹⁶ be made the subject

¹³ The intention of the creditor really determines this question.

¹⁵ The Prussian A. L. R. I. ii. §§ 383, 384, expressly repealed the prohibition on the assignation of res litigiosæ, and is now expressly done away with by § 236 of the Civil processordnung for the German Empire. Cf. the provisions of the Code Civil, art. 1699.

¹⁶ This is, as a rule, the lex domicilii of the debtor.

of assignation, the debtor need not pay any heed, of course, to an assignation carried out in a foreign country.¹⁷ If assignation is permitted by this law, but forbidden by the law of the place where it was carried out, then the assignee cannot appeal to the lex loci actus in respect of the form of the assignation.¹⁸

In the same way we can dispose of cases under the Lex Anastasiana.¹⁹ This law simply provides that the assignation is invalid, and the debtor is free as regards any sum in excess of the price paid for the assignation.²⁰ Therefore, the local law to which the obligation itself is subject must rule in such a case:²¹ if this law declares that the rights under an obligation may be made objects of exchange without any such restriction as that the

¹⁸ Cf. supra, p. 250. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck on 31st March 1856, from the Frankfurt Römer Coll. vol. iii. p. 325, reported by Seuffert, vol. ii. p. 161, seems to contradict this. It pronounces that the validity of assignations of res litigiosæ is to be valid, not by the law of the place of the contract, but by that of the place where the process depends. The place of the process and the domicile of the defender were, however, the same. See, too, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Munich, 7th January 1845 (Seuffert, i. p. 444): "The act of third persons, the cedent and the assignee, cannot alter the rights and duties of the debtor, which were originally dependent on Prussian law. Roman law, under the dominion whereof the pursuer—who is assignee—lives, no doubt gives the debtor the exceptio Legis Anastasianæ. But this has been expressly rejected by the law of Prussia. Seuffert is right in holding (Comm. i. p. 256) that the position of the debtor cannot be altered by the fact that the assignation took place under other laws."

¹⁹ The Lex Anastasiana has been repealed by the Prussian A. L. R. I., ii. §§ 390, 391. The Imperial Court (iii.) on 13th November 1885 (Entsch. xiv. § 58, p. 238) decides in this way, and expressly repudiates Savigny's view. But yet we cannot agree in the final result of this judgment: the transaction on which the obligation which had been assigned proceeded—a contract for life insurance—was not to be decided by the law of the assured, on the ground that the company had promised to pay at his domicile. The court thought that the question whether the policies of an insurance company founded on the mutual principle may be freely assigned without any restriction, is not to be answered uniformly in the same way, i.e. by the law which prevails at the seat of the company, but that a different law prevailed in each particular case for each individual assured. This result is at variance with the necessities of life.

²⁰ Cf. the provision of the Code Civil, art. 1699.

²¹ See Stobbe, § 33, note 17.

price given must be equal to the sum contained in the obligation, no question as to the law of the place where the assignment took place arises, because this law, in subjecting free trade in obligations to restrictions, cannot reasonably be held to apply to rights which in their origin could be described as open to an unrestricted exchange. The opposite theory, by which it is maintained that the local law of the assignment itself should apply, would make the rights of the creditor entirely dependent on the circumstance that the assignment took place at this or at that place—a circumstance of no importance for the security of the debtor,²² and one that could, besides, easily be planned by a creditor. As a general rule, then, the lex domicilii of the debtor will regulate this question,²³ but not universally. We might, no doubt, for the reason that the Lex Anastasiana is in the interest of the debtor, hold the judex domicilii bound to apply it in every case to any obligation undertaken by one of his countrymen.²⁴ But this would be wrong, for all provisions for the protection of the debtor are not to be applied to obligations he may undertake in a foreign country, or that are to be performed there by him, and the bona fides of commerce plainly requires that the creditor should not be hampered in his exercise of a right so highly important as that of assignment, if he has trusted the debtor in reliance upon this right.

Savigny²⁵ maintains, in reference to the Lex Anastasiana, that the law of the place of action should rule, and that this statute rests upon the consideration that a traffic in the rights under an obligation sold for a sum under their nominal worth, might be oppressive and dangerous to the debtor, and must therefore be scouted as immoral and mischievous to the public. One may concede these premises without being led to Savigny's conclusion. For, although the law may regard as immoral a traffic in obligations which in their origin are subject to its dominion, it does not follow that the same will be the case with obligations which in their origin are subject to the law of a foreign territory, which gives the creditor an unrestricted right of sale. The contrary, indeed, must be affirmed, especially since some particular kinds of inland obligations, such as obligations on bills, are free from the limitations of the Lex Anastasiana, as being in their origin subjects of free trade. It needs no further exposition to show what uncertainty for the debtor might arise if the local law of a place of action, which could not be determined beforehand, were to be applied.

²² The Lex Anastasiana exists in the interest of the debtor, cf. L. 22, 23, C. Mandati, iv. 35.

12. SATISFACTION OF OBLIGATIONS. DISCHARGE. EXCEPTION non numerata pecunia. Beneficium competentiae.

§ 277. The satisfaction of obligations must be determined by the law to which the obligation generally is subject. In doubt, however, we must hold that, as regards the particular conditions of performance, as has already been noted (supra, p. 549), the parties have subjected themselves to the usages and the laws of the place of performance, that is, the place which they have previously selected as the place of performance, either expressly or by implication.¹ On this last proposition there is general agreement.

The way in which performance is to be made is specified by the terms of the obligation, and the question whether an obligation is discharged is coincident with the question whether it still exists.

The performance of an obligation may, however, itself constitute a special legal transaction, and as such may be subject to another law. We shall see the difference with special distinctness if we suppose the case that the creditor may possibly accept something as performance, or payment, which, in the sense of the original obligation, was no performance or payment at all.²

The performance of an obligation, if it consists of an act which cannot be held to be an independent transaction, must be determined exclusively by the law that regulates the obligation in other respects.³ If, on the other hand, it rests upon a special transaction between the debtor and

² See in this sense Fiore, § 301; Brocher, ii. p. 110. The question is in many cases simplified for those who propose that in all and every relation the law of the place of payment shall rule.

the creditor, this special legal transaction for discharge of the obligation must be ruled by the law to which that transaction itself is subject, unless we have to infer a reference by the parties themselves to the local law of the obligation originally made. For instance, let us suppose that by the local law of the original obligation payment by bills or drafts is only a conditional discharge, and depends upon these bills and drafts being duly honoured; but, by the law of the place of payment, this condition disappears. If the parties are the same who made the contract at first, then we must infer a tacit reference to the local law to which the obligation was subject from the first. But if the parties, one of whom is tendering payment to the other, are domiciled at the place of payment, the local law recognised at that place must be applied, and the payment must be taken to be unconditional; all reference to the local law to which the obligation was originally subject is in such a case excluded.^{4 5}

The competency of an exceptio or querela non numeratæ pecuniæ, as against an acknowledgment produced, is to be determined by the same rules.⁶ The matter is not subject to any doubt if it is permissible to insert in the document of debt itself, in any form, a renunciation of the plea or querela. But, even although the opposite were the case, that would not show that the plea was applicable in those cases where it must necessarily be assumed that either the transaction to which the payment and acknowledgment have reference, or the transaction of payment and acknowledgment itself, fell under a local law distinct from that recognised at the place of action; for it is undoubtedly a general rule that the application of many provisions of law, which have not been excluded by formal renunciation, may be excluded by the consideration that the bona fides of trade requires the application of some other different local law.⁷

It might also be said that this plea of no consideration was merely a peculiar rule of evidence, and that rules of evidence must be settled according to the lex fori.⁸ Without disputing this, we may say in answer that, since in such cases the plea rests upon the assumption that an acknowledgment has as a rule been given before performance of the contract, this assumption is inadmissible if the local law of the obligation, or the law of the place of payment and discharge, as the case may be, is such that the parties had or must have had in view the immediate operation of the discharge.⁹

⁴ So it is, too, with the operation of novation, delegation, compromise, and pactum de non petendo, or any other contract that is simply intended to serve as a discharge. Cf. Burge, cited above. Fiore, § 301, is of opinion that in the case of a novation, the law of the earlier obligation will always decide, because there is a fiction that the original obligation continues to subsist.

⁶ See Sup. Ct. of App. at Lübeck, 8th November 1853 (Seuffert, viii. § 5). In the case of a legal transaction concluded in Vienna and to be performed there, the objection non numeratæ pecuniæ was held to be determined by the law of Austria, and not by the lex fori.

⁷ See supra, § 251.

⁸ On this see the law of process. Cf. Savigny, § 374; Guthrie, p. 248; Holzschuher, i. p. 75; Fœlix, i. p. 254; Massé, pp. 172, 173.

⁹ Cf. Fœlix, i. p. 448.

It is the same with what is termed the beneficium competentiae—i.e. the right of the debtor to have his liability limited in certain cases to an amount not exceeding what his means permit him to pay, after deduction of what is necessary for his own maintenance. This right only belongs to the debtor as against particular specified claims, and it rests, therefore, upon the material law of these obligations.¹⁰ In so far, however, as the beneficium competentiae is to be regarded as a right that cannot be renounced, resting, as it does, directly on grounds of boni mores, and one to be settled therefore by the law which is recognised at the seat of the court which is in course of executing the decree, the debtor will have the benefit of the lex fori. As to the beneficium competentiae or moratorium that arises in bankruptcy, see infra on the law of bankruptcy.

The competency of the plea of compensation must be determined by the court in accordance with its own law, in so far as it may fall to be repelled upon formal grounds of process.¹¹ But, on the other hand, a stipulation that this plea shall not be taken against him must be undoubtedly held to be a right of the creditor, springing from his contract, and connected with definite claims under it.¹² This substantive right will not be lost to the creditor, by the fact that process happens to depend in a place different from that to whose laws the contract is in other respects subject.¹³ Conversely, however, the right to plead compensation may be a matter of contract, e.g. by virtue of express stipulation, or on account of some direct connection between the counter claim and the claim made by the pursuer of the action.¹⁴

A complete or partial discharge or repudiation of obligations due to a foreign country and to foreigners, or a measure, the effect of which is that foreign creditors chiefly are touched by it, or any confiscation that is at variance with the principles of public law, can never bind foreign States or foreign subjects,¹⁵ even if the repudiation takes place under the style of a substituted payment (Surrogatzahlung) or of an arbitrary impost.¹⁶

¹⁰ Savigny, § 374; Guthrie, p. 248; Unger, i. p. 186. See, too, Fiore, § 309, whose view on this subject is not quite clear, because he mixes up with it the question of a beneficium competentiae which takes its rise in bankruptcy. Fiore is of opinion that, as the matter here is one of special favour shown by the law to the debtor, the beneficium cannot be recognised in another country, unless the forum contractus and the forum domicilii are identical.

¹² E.g. by Roman law (L. 14, § 2; C. de compens. iv. 31) compensation cannot be pleaded against a claim upon depositum. (Cf. too, the rule of the Prussian law, A. L. R. i. 16, §§ 366, 367, whereby no compensation can be pleaded against alimentary obligations.) Whether a particular claim can be pleaded in compensation depends upon the local law of this counter claim; it determines the extent of the operation of the counter claim.

¹³ Story, § 575, proposes the lex fori as the general rule. Cf. Burge, iii. p. 874.

¹⁴ To the same effect, Foote, pp. 426, 427.

¹⁵ See Story, §§ 334, 337, 349. Wharton, § 521: "If it be a gross imposition on a foreign creditor, it will not be recognised as binding by the State of which the creditor is a subject."

13. EXTINCTION OF CONTRACTS.

§ 278. The right to challenge a contract is, as we have already said (p. 568), subject to the same law as that which determines the validity of it.¹ Its liability to challenge is in fact simply an incomplete invalidity, and the reduction of the contract on the demand of one only of the parties to it is simply an inherent condition of the contract, whether the fact, on which the reduction is based, was present at the date at which the contract was concluded or happened subsequently.²

The extinction of an obligation by novation or by remission is to be ruled by the law by which the novation itself, as an independent transaction, is ruled.

This is Fiore's opinion too (§ 309), and Foote's (p. 384), who refers to an interesting judgment of Lord Brougham's [Warrender v. Warrender, 1835, 9 Bligh. at p. 124, 2 S. and M. 154, in a question of marriage. His Lordship says: "A party relying on the lex loci contractus, in construing the import and tracing the consequences of the marriage contract, cannot well be heard to deny that the same lex loci must regulate the construction and consequences of any deed of separation between the married pair."]

14. EXTINCTION OF OBLIGATIONS BY PRESCRIPTION, AND IN THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE DEBTOR.DIFFERENT VIEWS. THE DOMICILE OF THE DEBTOR JUSTIFIED BY PRINCIPLE.

§ 279. The means by which a contract obligation may be extinguished, with which we have up to this time been concerned, are means which are either inherent in the nature of the obligation itself, or in what may be presumed to be the intention of the parties. Extinction and restriction of the right of credit by prescription or limitation of actions, and by the bankruptcy of the debtor, are extinctions and restrictions which cannot be deduced from the nature of the obligation, or from what may be presumed to be the will of the parties: they are purely positive provisions, although their practical utility has led to a very general recognition of them as legal institutes. The question is, whether they are subject to the law which, in other respects, rules the obligation, or whether some other principles are to be recognised in dealing with them. But, as the discharge of obligations in bankruptcy is in very close connection with the law of bankruptcy, it will be of advantage to postpone the discussion of the extinction and limitation of obligations till we deal with the subject of bankruptcy itself, and at present content ourselves with discussing the question of limitation or prescription of actions.

² Laurent, vii. § 171, to the same effect, as against Félix, i. § 258, who applies in this case his theory of the distinction between the direct and the accidental consequences of the contract which we have already noticed. See, too, Brocher, ii. § 173.

The question,¹ then, by what local law the conditions and the effects of the prescription of personal claims should be ruled, has been much discussed, and much disputed. We may distinguish four different theories.

According to the first theory, which is the ruling theory in the law of England, the United States, and Scotland, this limitation is merely a form of process for dismissing claims, and is subject therefore to the law recognised at the seat of the court.² A further consideration is adduced, viz. that the rules of prescription have for their object the avoidance of disputes over antiquated claims, which have probably been extinguished, in the interest of general peace and security. The law will then be just as unwilling to allow foreigners to bring such claims into court as to allow its own subjects to do so, and just as unwilling to do so whether the obligations are contracted or to be performed in this country or abroad.³

But the right of action is something more than a mere matter of procedure: such rights as are confined in their operation to some particular kind of suit, and the existence of which depends upon the institution of that suit, are mere matters of procedure. Just as it is from no mere rule of procedure that a natural duty, which has no appropriate action, is therefore an imperfect obligation from the first: so neither is it a matter of mere procedure that an obligation, which at first was perfectly

Verbindl.* § 95; Burge, iii. p. 378 (see below, note 17); Wheaton, § 94, p. 125; Story, § 576; Holtschuhler, i. p. 76; Beseler, i. p. 157; Mittermaier, § 91; Judgment of the Privy Council at Berlin, 11th April 1825 (Simon & Strampf, i. p. 325; of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 22nd June 1844 (Devis, 10, p. 1021; of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Darmstadt, 10th October 1840 (Seuffert, xii. p. 446). In these decided cases the place of action and the domicile of the defender were the same. The judgments of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Celle, 28th May 1850, and 6th February 1855 (Seuffert, viii. p. 12 and p. 324), take as their principle the consideration that laws as to the limitation of actions have a distinctly compulsory character. "The limitation of action constitutes an absolutely universal force which operates on all rights on which action can be maintained on similar grounds in each case. This arises and comes into play after the substantive legal relation has been fully constituted, is independent of this relation, and results simply from the conduct of the party with reference to the working out of his rights." Cf. of App. at Rostock, 16th May 1859, 6th March 1863 (Seuffert, xv. § 90, and ibid. § 184). Schmid (p. 74) founds the exclusive application of the lex fori on the ground that only those claims are to be regarded as well founded in law, which are sure of judicial protection at the place where action is brought. That is a patito principii as regards those claims which are in other respects to be ruled by foreign law.

See Westlake-Holtzendorff, §§ 223, 224; Wharton, § 534. See, too, Westlake, Rev. vi. p. 395. Foote (p. 420) supports undoubtedly the lex fori, whereas Westlake personally disputes the application of the lex fori, and is inclined to apply the lex contractus.

valid, should by the lapse of the time, during which it might have been made effectual, fall back into the position of a natural obligation. Besides, we must remember that by many codes of law the operation of such an extinctive limitation or prescription in the case of personal rights of contract is not limited to the restriction of the privilege of suing upon them. For instance, is it not something more than the obligation as a ground of action that is touched by the provision of the Hanoverian law of 22nd September 1850, denying the competency of pleading personal claims by way of compensation,⁴ or by a law which declares that after the lapse of the prescriptive period the obligation is discharged?⁵ In such cases even the adherents of this theory hesitate to apply the lex fori:⁶ and such laws cannot be held to mean that obligations such as those we are dealing with are regarded, after expiration of the prescriptive period, in all respects (e.g. if a right of pledge has been constituted in support of them) as nullities, in the same way as when an obligation has been entirely performed.

The first reason assigned cannot therefore be held sufficient to support the theory; neither can the second.

The provision that action on certain claims must be brought within a certain time does not mean that actions upon such claims shall not be investigated by the court at all; on the contrary, it is in the option of the defender whether he shall or shall not plead prescription,⁷ and in any case there is nothing to prevent determinations being judicially given as to the previous existence of prescribed obligations, which come under consideration as incidental or prejudicial points.

Upon the consideration that prescription, as we have shown, belongs to substantive private law, rests the second theory, which proposes that the local law to which the obligation is subject generally, should rule in questions as to the prescription of actions. This view is at the present time the ruling theory in German science and practice, although it is not the only theory which is entertained. It has been adopted by the old Commercial Court of the Empire and the existing Imperial Court.

⁴ The like is the case according to the Code Civil, arg. art. 1291 : Zacharia, iv. § 653 : ii. § 262, note 6.

According as the place of execution or the place of performance of the obligation is held to regulate it, so is the one place or the other assumed as regulative on the question of prescription.⁸ The practice of the old German Supreme Court of Commerce and that of the present Imperial Court follow this latter theory.

It does not, however, by any means follow from the fact that the prescription of actions belongs to substantive law, that it is to be ruled by the law of the place of execution or of performance, because the obligation itself must be construed by one or other of these laws. In particular, it cannot be conceded that parties have, by virtue of their contract, a right to a definite period of prescription, which is the reason assigned generally for the application of the law of the place of execution or of performance. Although, as we have seen (§ 249), the effects of a contract are not to be looked upon as the tacit agreement of the parties, it is true that we cannot hold any right to be in accordance with the contract which, if tacitly implied in Martens, p. 342, proposes that the intention of the parties as disclosed in their contract, and, in default of any such intention being disclosed, the law of the place of contract, should rule. Félix, i. pp. 239, 240, expresses himself hesitatingly.

it, would be at variance with the express will of the parties. But the express will of the parties applies only to the due performance of the contract, whereas, if we were to assume that a right to any particular term of prescription was implied in the contract, we should have to suppose that at the very outset of their contract parties were contemplating a breach of it, and there could not be a more flagrant contradiction of the bona fides to be observed in all contract relations than this. This view would make the law of prescription a premium upon a breach of contract, instead of a penalty upon a negligent creditor, and a protection against claims of long standing and of little substance.⁹

We cannot, obviously, assume that the intention of parties was by implication directed to the period of prescription recognised at the place of execution or of performance, because the contract happens to have been executed or to have its place of performance abroad;¹⁰ and there can be no question of a period of prescription in accordance with contract, when we come to deal with obligations which are not grounded on contract.

Lastly, a certain intimate relation between the prescription of actions and the performance of obligations has been traced by Laurent and Lehr. Laurent (viii. § 234) thinks that the State in which the performance of the obligation is to take place has, comparatively speaking, the largest interest in the obligation, and consequently in the action upon it. This is simply a petitio principii. If a Belgian promises another Belgian to deliver something to him in St Petersburg, what special interest has the Russian State in that, or, as Laurent puts it, what interest has Russian society? Lehr, on the other hand, says that prescription is a presumption that performance has taken place, and so as it were an equivalent for it. Suppose for a moment we concede that this is the basis of prescription. Does it follow from that that the lex loci solutionis is to be applied? We think it does not: it is reasonable that that law should assert itself as controlling the details of performance and the legal and actual possibility of giving specific implement, but it is not necessarily regulative of the question as to the legal obligation in itself, and that is the question with which we are concerned.¹¹

Besides that, there are very many cases, and in particular those in which no special place of performance is stipulated, in which, by insisting on the place of performance, we find ourselves coming back again to the lex domicilii debitoris; for, failing any particular place of performance, the debtor must give performance at his domicile. In this Lehr agrees with us.

¹⁰ Gand specially puts his argument upon the intention of parties, Nos. 739, 740.

¹¹ The argument that prescription is a kind of extinction of the obligation, and is therefore unconditionally subject to those laws which rule the obligation in other respects (Asscher, Akad. Praefschrift, Amsterdam 1881, p. 56), forgets the distinction between the discharge of the obligation as provided by the parties themselves in terms of their contract, and extinction by the direct interposition of the law.

Finally, the following considerations will serve to exclude the general application of the lex loci contractus: If the period of prescription were in reality a jus quæsitum of the parties bound up with the origin of the obligation, a new statute, introducing a period of prescription, could not be applied to claims which arose before the passing of the Act. But this result is certainly incorrect; for if that were so, then the very oldest and most dubious claims would be withdrawn from its operation. Parties, too, although they cannot, according to generally received theories, protract the period of prescription by any provision of their contract, would be able, by settling upon any foreign place of performance they pleased, or by making a journey abroad, or by dating a contract from some foreign town, to exclude the period of prescription settled by the law of their own country—a result at variance with the prevailing view of the common law of Rome, and the express enactments of particular systems.¹² If, then, as we must assume, in accordance with the law of all civilised peoples, the law of prescription is an institution intended to give security to general intercourse, how can we say that it is the intention of the law to withdraw the property of our own citizens, and their relations to that property, from the protection of this principle, because a contract is concluded or is to be performed abroad? ¹³

The reasons last adduced meet the peculiar view of Pothier,¹⁴ who proposes that the law of the creditor's domicile should rule. The only principle on which this view can be supported is one which we have already, in dealing with the law of things, shown to be incorrect—viz. that a man cannot lose any right except in accordance with the law of his domicile.

We must, however, recognise that the law under whose sway the contract in itself lies, will be disposed to maintain a right of action as arising from the contract for the full period for which it declares that such a right should subsist. Let us take a contract, which has been concluded by a citizen of State A within the territory of State B, and is to be performed also in State B, and therefore must be ruled by the law of State B. In such a case it would be wonderful if that contracting party could in the courts of B successfully plead that in his own country, State A, there was a shorter period of prescription than in B, and that he could no longer be sued in B. To have regard to the laws of A to any such effect as this would be at variance with the good faith of contract law in B. The result which we reach is, then, that the law which rules the contract in other respects will settle questions of prescription of actions too, but unconditionally only in cases in which the action is raised before the courts of that country itself.¹⁵

¹³ Thöl, § 85, note 9.

¹⁵ Laurent, although he himself is of a different opinion, admits this (viii. § 250).

Finally, a theory which prevails in French jurisprudence, and is widely recognised in practice, makes the law of the debtor's domicile the rule, and, as a matter of fact, the object, which lies at the bottom of all prescriptions of personal actions, justifies to a certain extent the observance of the law of the domicile. The debtor is by means of prescription to be protected against doubtful claims, which probably are unfounded or have been discharged;¹⁶ and by this means the general security of law will be advanced. But if this rule is to attain its object, it must extend to all the obligations of persons who live permanently in the country, as, conversely, it is not to be applied to the obligations of foreigners who remain in our State temporarily only, and do not execute or propose to perform in this country most of the obligations which they undertake. If the law of prescription is not extended to all obligations undertaken by persons domiciled in our country, the result will be that if, for example, there was no such thing as limitation or prescription of actions in the law of the place where the obligation arose, or was to be performed, the creditor would have it in his power to disturb the legal security of our subjects for ever by these claims of long standing; and, conversely, if foreigners happened to be sued in this country, the application of our laws would imperil the legal security—the whole object of this rule of law—not merely of the creditor, but of the debtor also in the highest degree.¹⁷ But, on the other hand, there is no good reason why the law of the debtor's domicile should give the creditor a right of action, if by

¹⁷ Merlin, Rép. Prescription, i. § 3, No. 7 (Fœlix, i. p. 239); Pardessus, No. 1495. P. Voet, 10, § 2; J. Voet, Comm. in Dig. 44, 3, § 12; Boullenois, i. p. 365, pronounce for the lex domicilii of the debtor. But see Boullenois, ii. p. 488; Thöl, § 85, note 9; and Grawein, p. 200, who gives a most accurate exposition. Stobbe, § 33, proposes that the lex obligationis should rule, but declares that, as a rule, this is identical with the lex domicilii. He says: “But if the person concerned is permanently resident abroad, and contracts obligations in this country, the law of prescription must be determined, in cases in which the person concerned lives permanently abroad, and undertakes obligation there, by the law of that place, because it was to be expected that the action would be raised there.”

We may also in a sense include in this class English and American authors. Although they take the lex fori as their rule, yet their view comes to coincide with that taken in the text, since by English and American common law personal actions have to be brought at the debtor's domicile. Cf. Burge, iii. p. 880. There is no doubt, however, that in more recent times the forum contractus has obtained a stronger hold in the jurisprudence of England and that of the United States (see Wharton, § 713). But on the one hand (Wharton, § 715), the extra-territorial or international validity of so wide an extension of the forum contractus is not generally admitted, and on the other hand, as a matter of fact, far less use is made of the forum contractus in England and in the United States than e.g. in Germany. This fact is pointed out by Grawein (p. 197).

The following recent French writers have pronounced in favour of the lex domicilii: Labbé; Massé, i. p. 458; the German jurist Brocher, ii. § 275, p. 408; C. Cass. 3rd Jan. 1869 (Arrêt Albrecht), on which see Laurent and Brocher ut cit.; C. Cass. 7th June 1880 (J. viii. p. 263); C. Besançon, 11th January 1883 (J. x. p. 151). See also Clunet's note in J. i. p. 333, note 2.

the law which regulates the obligation in other respects the right of action is prescribed; the creditor, too, has no right to expect the application of any law which shall be more favourable to him than that which is in other respects regulative of the obligation. Accordingly a debtor, who is sued in foro domicilii, may appeal also to the law of the obligation, if this is upon the whole more favourable to him.¹⁸

LIMITATIONS UPON THIS PRINCIPLE.

§ 280. But it is just as true that the recognition of the law of the debtor's domicile can by no means be held to be universal.¹⁹ It can only be justified where the courts of that domicile are concerned with the determination of the question. As we have noticed, the law of the country to which the contract is in other respects subject, would have no ground for refusing, to the detriment of security of legal intercourse, to set itself in motion within its own territory; while the special considerations of protection are only applicable to persons who belong permanently to the territory, and are thus matters of concern to the law and to the courts of third States. The rule which we reach is this: the debtor may, it is true, appeal to the prescription, which exists by the law of his domicile, but only as against an action taken before the courts of his domicile.

Again, appeal to a prescription which has come into play by the law of the domicile must be excluded, in accordance with the rule of international law which requires that bona fides should in all events be observed, wherever the application of that prescription would run counter to bona fides. That is to say, if the debtor by himself leaving the territory of the State in which the forum contractus lies, or by removing all his property from it, has put an end to that forum to all international effects, he cannot plead at once that the action, which can no longer be instituted in foro contractus, is already prescribed by the law of his domicile, but

See judgment of the Supreme Court of the Netherlands, 4th April 1874 (J. i. p. 141), in favour of the lex domicilii debitoris.

Brocher, Nouv. Tr. says: "Prescription is, generally speaking, a measure of civil police intended to consolidate rights." He draws no particular conclusion from this. In my opinion he must needs have recourse either to the debtor's personal law or to the lex fori.

¹⁸ A number of the codes of States of the American Union contain provisions of this kind, e.g. the Alabama Code, § 2911, says: "If the laws of another country bar a suit upon a contract or act done there whilst the party sought to be charged thereby was a resident of such country, it is barred in the same manner here." Kentucky's revised statutes, § 12: "If the action is barred in the country where the cause of action arose, it is barred here as between any parties." See Piggott, pp. 524-530.

must allow the creditor a reasonable time for the prosecution of his action.²⁰

The result, then, at which we arrive is that to some extent we must recognise the law of the contract and the law of the domicile concurrently, according as action is raised in foro contractus or in foro domicilii. By this means we shall, as it seems, be just to the kernels that lie within each of the leading theories, in each of which there is a relative truth; and we shall also do justice to the circumstance, that the matter with which we are concerned is a prescription of actions and not of rights, and that, on the other hand, the rules of actions and the rights of parties, as known to the law of the court in which the suit depends, are in very close connection the one with the other. This intermediate theory may also seem to reconcile what is comparatively the largest number of judicial decisions upon the point, since, as a general rule, the action is brought in foro domicilii, and the law of the debtor's domicile will besides be the law of this contract. Taken in connection with the principles, which we shall expound below, as to the extension of the forum contractus in an international sense, it seems to answer to all the requirements of commerce and trade.

RESULT IN THE CASE OF A CHANGE OF DOMICILE BY THE DEBTOR.

§ 281. But what shall we say, if the debtor changes his domicile, while the period of prescription has not yet run out?²¹ In my former edition I laid it down that in such a case there would require to be a proportional calculation of the different periods.²² In this way, if, for example, the period of prescription had run half its course according to the law of the earlier domicile, it would be held to be half run by the law of the subsequent domicile.²³ The creditor would thus still have one-half of the period of prescription recognised by the law of the debtor's new domicile

²¹ The expiration of the period of prescription in accordance with the law of the earlier domicile gives the debtor, of course, a jus quæsitum.

²² Brocher, ii. p. 415.

²³ It would be utterly illogical to hold that the period of prescription must be tested by the law of the subsequent domicile with reference to the time during which the debtor was subject to the law of the earlier domicile. But yet, Savigny (§ 374, Guthrie, pp. 249, 250) and others urge this objection with the purpose of confuting the theory which pronounces in favour of the law of the debtor's domicile. If this mistaken view were correct, it is said the debtor would have it in his power, by changing his domicile, to acquire any prescriptive term he pleased. The judgment, reported in J. viii. p. 230, of the Trib. Civ. Seine of 2nd June 1881, is therefore right in its result. A Frenchwoman, domiciled in St Petersburg, who had contracted debt there, could not effectually appeal to the French law immediately after she had transferred her domicile to France. But in order to arrive at this result it is not in the least necessary to have recourse for grounds of judgment to the exclusive validity of the lex loci obligationis.

available to him. But, apart from the practical difficulties of such a calculation, the sounder doctrine seems to me to be that the protection of the law of prescription should be extended to the debtor from the moment at which the new domicile is acquired, while, on the other hand, no good reason can be given for putting the creditor at any advantage in the prosecution of his suit, simply because the debtor has changed his domicile. We thus reach the simple solution of the question, which Grawein has defended (p. 202): the debtor may appeal to the law of prescription of his former domicile, or to that of his subsequent domicile, according as the one or the other is more to his advantage.^{24 25} But prescription, in accordance with the law of the subsequent domicile, cannot be made to run from any date further back than the moment at which that new domicile was acquired.

A crowd of difficulties, which would arise from a partial application of the law of the old domicile and a partial application of that of the new, is avoided by a consideration of either the one or the other as alternatives.²⁶ Systems of law may differ not merely as regards the period of prescription, but as regards other conditions necessary to prescription.

DOMICILE, AND NOT NATIONALITY, THE TEST. THE AUTHOR'S FORMER VIEW. DISTINCTION BETWEEN EXTINCTION OF AN OBLIGATION BY LAPSE OF TIME, AND LIMITATION OF ACTION.

§ 282. Another question still may be raised, viz.: Is it the law of the debtor's domicile or of his nationality which should rule in cases in which regard is to be had to the debtor's personal law? We must hold that it is the law of his domicile. Actions on contracts which do not belong to the law of the family, the law of succession, or the law of things, must be referred to the court of the domicile and not to that of the native State, which may possibly be at a great distance. The prescription of actions inclines therefore in its nature to the law of the domicile. In the law of obligations in general, putting aside questions of capacity to act, nationality is postponed to domicile, and any appeal to the law of nationality, which may be quite unknown to the party who contracts with him who now desires to make this appeal, will be rejected as being at variance with the expectations of parties, and therefore with bona fides. Still less can any such appeal be listened to in the matter of limitation of actions. This consideration must prevail even with the legislature of the native State. No one denies, of course, that a State, by establishing prescriptions of a fixed and a shorter duration, has in view the protection of its own citizens. But it cannot carry through that purpose without paying any heed to the disadvantages entailed upon foreign creditors, if the debt was contracted, as it happens, at a foreign domicile. Lastly, since the domicile of a person who owns a trading or manufacturing establishment is completely cast into the background, when contrasted with the place where that establishment actually exists, we must necessarily, in the case of all debts that are contracted with reference to some particular trading or manufacturing house, fix our attention, in so far as prescription is concerned, not on the law of the domicile of the proprietor or occupier, but solely on the law of the place in which the house is set up, in so far, that is to say, as the law of the domicile would, if we were dealing with individual persons, be regarded as regulative.

In my former edition (§ 79) I declared too absolutely for the application of the law of the debtor's domicile; subsequently ²⁷ I had to recognise the force of the reasoning, which recommends the application of the law that governs the obligation in other respects; and I have now persuaded myself that no one of the three leading theories can claim an exclusive sway. The theory I now adopt is an intermediate theory. I hope it will not be said against it that it is devoid of principle; for, although it takes up an intermediate position, it points out quite sharply what the different considerations and possible states of fact are. It has this advantage, that it can cite in its own support most of the decisions which have actually been given by the courts, and in the most recent French jurisprudence we may see an inclination to some such intermediate view. Again, it is particularly likely that the requirements of trade and commerce, and men's instinctive feelings of justice, should find themselves at variance, in the first place, with the theory which indiscriminately applies the lex fori, and, in the next place, with the theory which makes the lex obligationis decisive, but makes this lex obligationis dependent solely upon a place of performance, which may, possibly, be quite arbitrarily chosen. This latter view, which, as we have noticed, may be said to be very nearly supreme in Germany, may again very easily come into conflict with the lex fori and the lex domicilii. We must, however, take a distinction between the extinction of an obligation by the lapse of a particular period of time and the limitation of action upon a claim within a certain period.²⁸ The period at which an obligation is to terminate is, of course, regulated by the lex obligationis. Thus, for instance, the period of ten years, during which an architect's responsibility lasts by § 1792 of the Code Civil, is to be treated as a period at the end of which all obligation ceases,²⁹ whereas, on the other hand, it would not be right to set up exceptional rules for the regulation of all cases of limitation of actions which require shorter periods.³⁰

²⁸ See Grawein, p. 22, on the distinction between these two things. Although the general theoretical distinction is simple enough, its application to many particular cases and enactments is difficult enough.

The same territorial law which regulates prescription generally, must also be applied in questions of interruption of prescription and of privileges allowed to particular persons.³¹ But, of course, the question whether the action in any particular instance has been, in so far as form is concerned, well raised, must be decided by another law.

The question whether a period of prescription, which has begun, has been interrupted, is identical with the question, whether the time, which elapsed up to the occurrence of the event which created the interruption, is to be counted; and the question whether a particular person has a privilege with reference to prescription, falls to be considered and determined along with the question whether a longer time will be required for the expiration of the prescription in the case of some exceptional kind of claim or demand.

NOTE U ON §§ 279-282. PRESCRIPTION.

[The main conflict on questions of prescription or limitation of action has been between the law of the forum and the law of the place to which the contract concerned properly belongs. The latter—the lex loci contractus—has been sanctioned by some French writers, such as Fœlix and Demangeat. The former says (i. p. 241, § 100): "This opinion" (that the law of the place where the action had its origin—i.e. where the contract was made—should rule) "is perhaps the best established in theory, and has been adopted by the courts of Douai and Paris;" and the commentator, Demangeat, at the same place, after enumerating the various possible rules, selects this as the prevailing rule, and fortifies his selection by the citation of a series of French decisions. To these cases may be added a decision of the German Imperial Court at Leipsic on 5th March 1877, in the case of Hervey v. Engelbert (J. v. p. 627), and a decision of the Tribunal of Commerce of Moscow, 1877, in the case of Bloumberg v. Wahlberg (J. viii. p. 189). In the latter case the drawer of a bill payable to order, the bill being drawn in Poland and accepted there, sued the acceptor, a domiciled Russian, in the courts of Russia. The period of prescription on such an obligation is in Russia ten years—in Poland thirty. The Russian pleaded his prescription, but the court held the period of prescription to be determined by the lex loci contractus—viz. Polish law. This, too, was the doctrine sanctioned in Scotland by an unanimous judgment of the Court of Session in the case of Don v. Lippmann, 1836, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st. ser. xiv. p. 241. We shall see that that judgment was reversed by the House of Lords upon appeal, on the authority of the Institutional Writers as well as on general principles; but the decision lays down the rule so clearly that it is worth while, since the opinions of jurists on the subject are so much divided, to quote a few sentences from the opinion of Lord Corehouse, well known to Scottish lawyers as a most learned and accomplished judge. He says: "To decide the question of prescription, as applicable to the bills," for the contents of which the action was raised, "it is necessary to enquire whether the debt sued for is a French or a Scotch debt, and that depends in this case on the point whether Scotland or France was the place where the bills were payable. If they constituted a Scotch debt, it is plain they are subject, not to the French quinquennial, but to the Scotch sexennial prescription. . . . On the other hand, if France was the place of payment, and if the bills in consequence constituted a French debt, the case must be viewed in a different light. Our decisions have not been uniform on this point, but it seems the better opinion, that if a debt be payable in a foreign country, the law of that country must apply, in so far as its extinction is concerned, although the debtor resides and must be sued in Scotland." This, we repeat, is not now law in Scotland, although it may be taken as a statement by an eminent jurist of the principle on which he held that such questions should be determined. That the law of the place of the obligation to some extent influences the application of prescription is admitted by the very authorities who have established the lex fori as the rule for England and America. The American courts have held that a defender who is free by the lex loci contractus, and has resided in the territory of that law during the whole of the period necessary for his release, cannot be afterwards sued in the court of a foreign country to which he has proceeded, if the prescriptive period there is longer (Walworth v. Routh, 14, A. 205; Story, § 582; Wharton, § 538); and Lord Brougham, in giving judgment in the case of Don v. Lippmann, 26th May 1837, 2 Shaw and Maclean, p. 730, 5 C. and F. p. 1, adopting this view, said: "There is no occasion, with a view to the decision in this case, to question the doctrine laid down by Dr Story in his able work on the conflict of laws, and approved of by the Court of Common Pleas in Huber v. Steiner (2 Bing, N.C. 202), that if the lex loci contractus makes the obligation wholly void after a certain time, and if the parties have resided within the jurisdiction during the whole of that period, it may be taken as the guide of the court where the action is brought."

²⁹ Cf. Brocher, ii. p. 422.

³⁰ Laurent (viii. § 256) is of a different opinion: the judgment of the Cour de Chambéry of 12th Feb. 1869, which he cites, is to the same effect.

³¹ So, too, judgment of the Sup. Ct. at Berlin, 15th Jan. 1845. Cf. Koch on 33rd section of Pruss. All. L. R. i. 1, p. 45. It is worth notice that the forty-fifth article of the draft made at Berne in 1886, for an international agreement as to the law of railway freights, while in other respects it lays down a uniform rule for actions arising out of the treaties for transport with which it deals, provides at the close, "L'interruption de la prescription est régie par les lois du pays où l'action est intentée."

The law of the place of the contract is also, by the law of countries which as a rule adopt the lex fori, allowed to affect the period of prescription upon a debt in this way, that if a debtor, during the subsistence of his debt, removes to another country where a shorter prescription than that of his own country avails to extinguish the debt, although he cannot be sued in the courts of that foreign country, he will, on returning to the locus contractus, be liable to action during the period of prescription there recognised. In the case of Richardson v. Countess of Haddington, 16th June 1824, 2 Shaw's App. 406, the House of Lords held that a person who had contracted debts in this country, and had afterwards gone to Russia, where a decennial prescription prevails, and remained there for upwards of ten years, was yet liable to be sued on returning to Scotland throughout the years of the long prescription. In that case the lex fori and the lex loci contractus were the same, but it is upon the applicability of the latter to the prescription that the judgment to a considerable extent proceeded.

But although there is thus a considerable body of authority in favour of the lex loci contractus as the rule, later decisions on the continent have tended to establish, and in England have beyond question established, both for that country and Scotland, the lex fori as the rule. In England the courts have made the lex fori so exclusively the rule, that they have thrown aside the qualification admitted by Lord Brougham ut supra, and have established both for themselves and Scotland, that so long as a claim is admissible by the lex fori, it matters not that the law of the contract has extinguished it (Westlake, p. 279, and cases there cited). The law of America follows the same rule as it is laid down by Story (Wharton, § 535); the supreme courts of Berlin and Warsaw have taken the same course; and so, too, have the later French decisions. The authorities on the law of England are collected by Westlake, pp. 278, 279. The leading authority on Scotch law is the case of Don v. Lippmann, cited supra. Lord Brougham says, at page 724: "Limitation of action belongs to the head of remedy, ad decisionem litis, as some jurists term it, or ad tempus et modum actionis, as others express themselves," and is, therefore, subject to the law of the court to which appeal is made. This decision has settled the law in Scotland, and this law has, like that of England, taken a further step, and, as is laid down by Mr Dickson (On Evidence, § 530), "the Scotch court is not bound or entitled to give effect to a prescription of either of those natures"—i.e. limiting the mode of proof or the right of action—"prevailing in the lex loci contractus." It is worth while to note that Lord Brougham rejects the authority of the lex loci contractus on grounds similar to those urged by the author. Limitation or prescription of action, he argues, is no part of the contract, and cannot have been in the contemplation of parties: "nothing can be more violent than the supposition that the breach of the contract is in the contemplation of parties, and, indeed, nothing more contrary to good faith. It is supposing that when men bind themselves to do a certain thing they are contemplating not doing it, and considering how the law will help them in the non-performance of a duty."

Acting on the principles of this decision, the Scots courts have held that where a limitation, such as the limitation of the liability of a cautioner in a bond under the Act 1695, c. 5, for seven years, is truly a condition of the contract, then the lex loci contractus will apply; it is part of the contract, and not a regulation of the method of enforcing a remedy (Alexander v. Badenach, 1843, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. vi. p. 326). This distinction accords with that taken in the text between a limitation of actions and an extinction of all obligation. The same distinction is recognised in America (Wharton, §§ 536, 537).

With reference to the period from which prescription runs in the event of a change of domicile, a case decided by the Supreme Court of Posen (Wiernzowski v. Cegielka, 1875, J. iv. p. 243) may be cited: there a defender, who had, since incurring an obligation, become a Prussian, was sued by another Prussian upon that obligation; he pleaded the Prussian prescription of two years, and that as the rule of the lex fori was sustained; but it was only allowed to run from the time at which he first became amenable by domicile to the jurisdiction of the Prussian court.]

15. TRANSMISSION TO HEIRS.

§ 283. The following principles appear to determine the question whether a contract obligation descends to heirs.

The local law, in conformity with which the heir enters upon the succession, will in the first instance determine what obligations¹ must be taken over by him as a condition of taking up the succession. But before the obligations in question can bind the heir, this effect must be also attributed to them by the law to which the obligation is in itself subject.

Thus, the heir of a person domiciled in a country where the common Roman law is in force,² would not be bound to carry on a partnership in which his predecessor had been engaged in France, although the contract of partnership by the force of special statutory provision does in French law pass to heirs.³

[The law of Scotland, however, holds that the question whether a foreign obligation, a promissory note, will affect the heir of the debtor, must be determined, not by the foreign law, which frees the heir, but by the law of Scotland, the place in which the inheritance is situated, and by the laws of which it must be taken up. Kinloch v. Fullerton, 1739; Morison's Dict. p. 4456; House of Lords, 1 Pat. App. 265.]

³ Code Civil. art. 1868.

That the obligation should on its other side pass to the heirs of the creditor, it is necessary that the law to which it is in its origin subject, and the law which regulates the succession, should both provide for this.

C. PARTICULAR CONTRACTS.

1. SALE. LETTING AND HIRING. MANDATE. LOAN. CAUTION.

§ 284. We now propose to touch upon some contracts of special importance. We have already touched upon the contract of sale from more than one point of view.¹ The principal points for consideration are:—

(a) The passing of the property. In accordance with what has already been set out at length, the question whether parties intended the property to pass is, failing a special declaration on that head, to be determined by the law which generally rules the obligation; but the further questions—viz. whether this intention is sufficient, whether any particular forms are necessary for the passing of the property, and what these forms are—are to be determined by the lex rei sitæ.

(b) The passing of the risk. In the case of a concluded contract of sale, the law of the domicile of each of the parties will rule as regards his obligation; and if their provisions are irreconcilable on the question as to whether the buyer or the seller is to bear the loss of the subject if it should perish, then the law which favours the defender is to prevail. For instance, by Roman law the risk passes to the buyer when the contract is complete: by Prussian law, A. L. R. I. 2, § 100, the sale is held to be broken off, if the subject of it is by any accident entirely destroyed.² Now, in the case of a contract by letters, the buyer [of some article that has perished after the conclusion of the contract] who is domiciled in Berlin cannot be required to pay the price at the instance of the seller who is domiciled in Hanover; but conversely, the seller, if domiciled in Berlin, cannot demand the price from the buyer domiciled in Hanover, while it is always incompetent to claim repetition of a price which has once been paid.

(c) Claims of warrandice are to be settled by the rules which determine in other respects the local law of the contract:³ the same law will settle all questions as to rejection or restitution or abatement of price, and as to the obligation of one or the other of the parties to make good to the other in whole or in part the costs of the deeds and the stamp duties.

Contracts of hiring and lease of immoveables are, almost without exception, to be determined by the law of the place where the subject of the contract is. There is still less reason to suppose that there should be exceptions to this rule in such cases rather than in the case of sale, since the contract of lease is bound up with the permanent use, and, as a rule, with the permanent presence of the lessee at the place where the subject of his lease lies. The lex rei sitæ determines, then, the conditions of tacit relocation, of abatements of rent, and questions as to rent and warning.⁴

² For an exception, however, see i. 2, § 340.

³ Boullenois, ii. p. 460; Molinæus, ad L. i. C. de S. Trin.; Fœlix, i. p. 230. Laurent, viii. § 154, takes the view that the autonomy of practice alone can give the rule.

All that need be said as to the contract of partnership has been said already in treating of agency.

The law of mandate is of special importance for the completion of contracts by letter. We have already dealt with this matter. As a general rule, the law which prevails at the domicile of the mandatary, as being the place in which the mandate is to be executed, will indirectly decide the question of the extent of the mandatary's responsibility. For, if he has executed his mandate duly, he must be kept scatheless, and in many cases this can only be effected by the mandant taking over from the mandatary the contracts, as they have been concluded, and indemnifying him for them. On the other hand, if the transactions are forbidden, and give, therefore, no right of action at the place where the transactions are to be carried out, the mandatary has no such claim for indemnity, even although the law of the mandant's domicile knows nothing of the prohibition.⁵ This is the simple and direct consequence of the fact that the transaction, which the mandate has in view, is forbidden at the place in which it is proposed that it shall be carried out. It is this local prohibition which makes the whole bargain null, even although in other respects the mandant's responsibility is determined by the law of his own domicile.

As regards loan, reference may be made to what has already been said upon interest, the plea non numeratæ pecuniæ, and the Exceptio SCi Macedoniani. We must dispose of all provisions of particular systems of law, by virtue of which particular persons are declared incompetent to bind themselves by acknowledgment of loan, in the same way as we dealt with the Senatus Consultum Macedonianum.⁶ We need only note that by the very nature of the contract of loan, the lender is entitled to recover the full amount of the capital he has lent. The result of this is that, if it is arranged that payment shall be made at some other place, or if payment actually takes place there, the debtor may no doubt pay in the currency recognised there, but the amount of the debt will be determined by the currency of the place where the loan was made:⁷ further, the debtor has to bear the cost of transmission, and if he pays in bills he must make good to the creditor the difference in the rate of exchange between his own domicile and that of the creditor.⁸

⁵ See judgment of the Imp. Ct. (i.) of 10th May 1884 (Entsch. xii. § 8, p. 34), which arrives at the same result. The question dealt with here was a commission sent from Berlin for a speculation in differences on the Parisian Exchange. By § 421 of the Code pénal such transactions are visited with a penalty, and by § 1965 of the Code Civil give no right of action.

⁸ Cf. Grant v. Healey, cited by Story, § 284a.

We have already (p. 315) considered the limitations which some systems of law place upon the undertaking of cautionary obligations by women. As regards the Senatus Consultum Velleianum, the lex domicilii will as a rule be applied for this reason, that the application of that law, which is the general canon in the law of contracts, is in this connection less restricted by exceptions: the requirements of bona fides do not so often in the case of cautionary obligations call upon us to observe the lex loci contractus. Although, for instance, the traffic at fairs and markets makes it absolutely necessary to apply the law of the place to the contracts usually concluded there, the like need not necessarily be true of a contract of guarantee connected with some contract of the former kind: it must also be shown to be usual to undertake such contracts of guarantee at that place.⁹ The import of the principal contract will regulate the extent of the obligations undertaken by the surety, and therefore to a certain extent the law applicable to them.¹⁰ On the other hand, the conditions under which the surety is bound or is free, although the principal obligation continues, do not depend upon the law that rules it. In this way, too, must the question, whether the surety can plead the exceptiones excussionis and divisionis, and whether he has the beneficium cedendarum actionum, be decided.¹¹

2. DONATION IN PARTICULAR.

§ 285. Donation, strictly speaking, only belongs in part to this division of the subject: it is only the promise of donation, and the obligations which he who receives the donation incurs towards the donor by acceptance, that we can deal with: the donation, on the other hand, in so far as its object is to confer or to transmit real rights, must be assigned to the law of things. Systems of law, however, generally lay down the same leading principles to regulate donations constituted by a direct creation of a real right (i.e. delivery of the thing), and donations constituted by undertaking an obligation (i.e. promises to give). These principles have their origin in the special protection which the law desires to extend to a person, who is given to liberality, against his own hasty resolutions or the abuse of his good-nature by others, and to extend also to his family or his heirs. From the former point of view we may at once lay down that the personal law of the giver will desire to rule the matter, in so far as it is possible for it to do so with reference to the actual sphere of operation of some other territorial law. The second point of view leads also to the same result, in so far as the personal law of the person who leaves a succession regulates matters connected with that succession. The result we reach, then, is this: we must look for the special rules, by which the validity of donations is to be determined, in the personal law of the donor. It is only in so far as there may be some enactment of a restrictive character, the object of which obviously is to protect the donee against obligations, to which the acceptance of the donation may give rise—quite a possible state of the law—that we must observe all the requirements of the donee's personal law as well, if it is intended that the donation shall set up some obligation on the part of the donee. The obligation, however, to repay to the donor the amount by which the donee has been enriched must be recognised, if the law of the donor permits it. It is simply a withdrawal of the donation in so far as it is still, as a matter of fact, to be found in the donee's estate.

⁹ Kritz, p. 117, who no doubt justifies it by the consideration that suretyship never gives rise to more than an actio nascitura.

¹⁰ Bouhier, chap. 21, No. 197.

¹¹ To the same effect, Imp. Ct. (i.) 23rd May 1883 (Entsch. ix. § 46, p. 185); Imp. Ct. (iv.) 17th Jan. 1887 (Bolze, Praxis, iv. § 20, p. 6). We do not mean to say that circumstances may not force us to determine such an obligation by the law that rules the principal contract — e.g. if one becomes surety for an officer of the State, and the obligation can only be undertaken in conformity with the law of the government which he serves (Story, § 290). The surety in this case knows, or ought to know, that he can only become surety in the way prescribed by these laws.

In this matter of donation,¹ it comes out very plainly how sound a course it is to hold that, as a matter of principle, the law of obligatory contracts must be determined by the personal law of the parties; in the case of donation this will obviously and almost in every case mean the personal law of the donor, because the donee undertakes no obligations, if we put out of view his obligation to refund the donation in certain cases in so far as he is lucratus thereby, and the case also of a donation sub modo. The logical result of the theories which would apply to the law of contracts any other law, c.g. that of the place of performance, would be to land us in hopeless opposition to the considerations which are undoubtedly germane in questions of donation, viz. the protection of the person who makes the donation and his heirs. If the law, for instance, makes certain provisions for the validity of a donation, is it to be said that the parties can withdraw themselves from the necessity of observing these directions

of the law, by choosing at their own pleasure some foreign place of performance or payment, where there are no such provisions?²

The contract of donation, properly so called, is, however, to be distinguished from the contract by which, in carrying out the intention of donation, a real right in something is constituted. Even if the donation as such were invalid by the personal law of the debtor, it would not by any means unconditionally follow that the transference of the real right was also invalid, or that the right of third parties in possession would be affected thereby. It is only the lex rei sitæ that can determine to what extent the real right is effected by the contract to which it is originally traceable.

1st, The rule "locus regit actum" prescribes the form of the donation. It may be, however, on the one hand, that the personal law of the donor displaces this rule, although there is no presumption that that will be so; and on the other hand it may be—if e.g. the donor's own law requires some special form for a binding donation, the effect of which is to hinder donations generally, while the lex loci actus has no such forms—that if the forms prescribed by the personal law of the donor are not observed by him, it will be left in doubt whether he intended to make a binding contract.³

If the lex loci actus lays down some form, which throws difficulty in the way of donations, and if the donor in the particular case fails to observe this form, the donation might be valid in accordance with the personal law of the donor, if he had the intention of putting himself under an obligation, because the rule "locus regit actum" has no more than a permissive force.

A distinction must also be taken between the form of the donation itself and the form of the transference of real rights in particular things. The latter will always be regulated by the lex rei sitæ. It may, therefore, be indispensable, in order to create a real right by way of donation, to observe the lex rei sitæ as well as the personal law of the donor.

2nd, But, apart from the rule "locus regit actum," there is no reason for submitting donation to any other local law than the personal law of the donor; for donation, even if it is considered as a contract obligation, does not belong to the ordinary obligations of commerce, in which bona fides demands the application of the lex loci actus.⁴ We must, however, make a distinction between the form of the donation and the form of the transference of the real or other right, which constitutes the subject of the donation. For instance, although the lex rei sitæ might be satisfied in this respect, the donation as an obligation might still be null in accordance with the personal law of the donor, and in this way might indirectly be invalid for the transference of the real right.⁵

² This is in part the source of the difficulty with which Laurent contends in his detailed and interesting discussion (vi. § 281). No doubt Laurent's confusion is in part due to his erroneous terminology, to which we have called attention more than once. As we have pointed out, he often gives the title of statut réel to all law of a coercive character, which are not amenable to the intentions of the parties; but, of course, a personal statute, e.g. the lex domicilii, may have that character. But yet Laurent contrasts these statuts réels with personal statutes.

⁴ Cf. Imp. Ct. (i.) 6th October 1886 (Bolze, Praxis, iii. § 19).

3rd, Grounds for recall of a donation are to be tested in the same way by the lex domicilii of the donor. We must look at the matter just as if the donor had made, and the donee had accepted, the donation under the express condition of recall. But, of course, we cannot without special cause hold the donee responsible to any further extent than the extent to which at the time when the recall is intimated to him he is lucratus.⁶ For the recall can do no more than recover from the estate of the donee so much of the donation as is still to be found there. Any further obligation upon the donee would only be possible if his own personal law allowed it.

4th, The restrictions imposed upon the donor by the existence of heirs, or of persons having claim to legitim out of his estate, or claims of a similar kind, are all consequences of the rights which these claimants may have upon the estate of the deceased, and are conditional upon the state of his property at the time of his death. They are, therefore, subject to the law under which the succession falls (the lex domicilii of the deceased, or the lex rei sitæ).⁷ If the person whose estate is thus subjected to a claim changes his domicile, then, if the question should turn at all upon the lex domicilii, the donation can only be challenged by these claimants in so far as that is competent by the law of his last domicile, and also by that of his earlier domicile at the date of his donation; for, on the one hand, assets of the estate, once validly given away, do not afterwards form part of the estate; and, on the other, the heirs can ask no more than what the law that regulates the succession, and pronounces them to be heirs, bestows.⁸

In the matter of donation the personal law must be understood to be the national law of the donor, and not that of his domicile, in so far as we are concerned with rules of law, the object of which is the protection of the donor. The reasons which we advanced (§ 252) for the application of the law of the domicile in the sphere of the law of obligations are not applicable here, and these coercitive rules of law, on the other hand, stand in close connection with the law of succession and with the law of the family.⁹

⁵ See the interesting, and, as I think, perfectly sound decision cited in the foregoing note.

II. OBLIGATIONS BY FORCE OF LAW. (OBLIGATIONS quasi ex contractu AND ex delicto.)

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

§ 286. Obligations, which do not rest upon any intention of parties directed to the creation of an obligation, are either consequences of other legal relations, e.g. consequences arising from family law, or from the law of things, and must therefore be regulated by the law of this leading relation;¹ or they are consequences of the general obligations which every one owes to every one else within a certain territory. Obligations of the latter kind are obligations ex delicto, and those obligations which are usually described as being quasi ex delicto and quasi ex contractu. It is obvious that the territorial law must desire, in so far as obligations ex delicto, and obligations of an analogous character, obligationes quasi ex delicto, are concerned, to subject foreigners as well as its own subjects to those general regulations. In the interests of public order, the law necessarily assumes a coercitive character. Foreigners, if they were to be exempted from its operation, would enjoy a privilege which would offend the public sentiment of justice and general legal security.

But the question arises whether other States are also bound to recognise these obligations, and the legal consequences attached to the breach of them by the law of the place of residence. Older authorities answered this question in the affirmative without any investigation, as much in questions of delict² as in questions of quasi contractual relations.³ The same theory was as a rule inclined to submit all obligations directly ¹ Brocher, ii. p. 144, and Nouv. Tr. § 127, declares in favour of this doctrine. For instance, obligations specially affecting the owners of land, such as those which refer to the actio aquæ pluvie arcendæ of Roman law, are, in accordance with this rule, to be determined by the lex rei sitæ. Indeed the nature of the subject will always forbid any other law than that of the real estate, against which the action is directed, to rule. A foreign sovereign cannot in such cases impose any obligations. Thus no one can raise an action in State A, because some one in State B has polluted a stream, or has executed some operation in the stream that is prejudicial to him. The law of State B, and as a rule its courts, can alone deal with such matters. If the law of B is inequitable, then the only remedy is by diplomatic representation. In the opposite sense, Imp. Ct. (v.) 27th October 1886, according to Bolze's report (Praxis, iii. § 31), no doubt rather a brief report.

Mühlenbruch, Pandects, i. § 73, proposes that obligations ex lege should be determined by the law of the domicile of the person under obligation. As to assignation, transmission to heirs, and discharge of the obligations dealt with in this paragraph, see infra, § 289.

created by the law to the lex loci actus, making a tacit exception in those cases only which were an accessory of some other legal relation, such as e.g. is the duty of aliment intra familiam. More modern theories, or at least a certain number of them, on the other hand (in Germany substantially under the influence of Wächter and Savigny), will recognise nothing but the *lex fori*⁴ in cases of delict and claims of that class, while obligations quasi ex contractu are in the case of many authors not dealt with at all.

The reason assigned by Savigny (§ 374, Guthrie, p. 253) is simple, viz. that the matters here in question are coercitive, strictly positive laws. We have already several times remarked that we cannot recognise this ground in this shape. But in truth it seems as if the law could only sanction claims of this kind if it thinks that to do so would coincide with its own ideas of morality and equity, and if it did, would give effect to them unconditionally. It seems thus that no legal system of law could take as its guide the standard set up by any other system.

This reasoning, however, overlooks the fact that a State can make no claim to rule men's conduct and behaviour except within its own boundaries, and that a rule of conduct, which may be quite proper within our territory, may possibly be unsuitable for any other. The result is:—

First, That in any case conduct which does not give a right to damages or penalty by the law of the place where the act is committed, cannot have this effect if the action be raised in another country.⁵ The opposite view plainly implies an invasion of the sovereign power of the State within whose territory the act in question has taken place. If, for instance, we should allow one of our subjects, who thinks that during his stay abroad he has been wronged by some act of a foreigner abroad, to claim damages in conformity with our law—supposing that by some chance he could raise an action in this country—we are simply claiming for our citizen a privilege in a foreign country over the citizens of that country, and attempting to make foreigners in their own country conform to a law of which they may very well know nothing.⁶ This is the extreme injustice, which the adherents of Wächter and Savigny's theories propose to put in force under the guise of absolute justice, a thing which, in their definition of it, does not exist at all. One might perhaps appeal to the protective theory, which is so often applied in criminal law, which gives our State the duty of protecting our citizens abroad in conformity with our law, which is calculated for a particular territory only. But be it observed that a man who acts perfectly lawfully in so far as the lex loci actus is concerned, cannot well imagine that a foreign State will quarrel this act with reference to a subject of its own, who is a party to the transaction, but whose citizenship is not written upon his face.⁷

⁵ See Foote (p. 476), and the English cases which he cites on this point. It is possible that the act or conduct should be begun in a country in which it is permissible, and completed in a country in which it is forbidden, and in which it gives rise to a claim for damages. Damages are in that case due (see Foote).

To determine the matter by the lex fori, where the lex loci actus gives no claim, or one that does not go so far, is utterly unjust, and all the more that it rests on the good pleasure of the pursuer in many cases whether the action shall be raised at this or at that place.

Secondly, It follows that a claim for damages, even if it is not well founded in the circumstances of the particular case according to the lex fori, must be allowed, if it is sanctioned by the lex loci actus. It is quite untrue to say that legal systems only recognise claims of damages, if and in so far as they are in accordance with their conception of absolute justice. On the contrary, there are many cases in which, on grounds of expediency, the law casts responsibility for claims of damages arising ex quasi delictis upon persons, who, on strict investigation, would be shown to be entirely blameless, or whose fault could at least be very questionable. We need only recall, for instance, the Roman actions de effusis et dejectis and de pauperie, or the provisions of French law as to the liability of parents or employers for acts of their children or servants, which have caused injury, or the provisions of the German statute of liability of 7th June 1871. It is therefore inadmissible to apply the test of absolute justice according to our law to a claim of damages for some act or course of conduct in another country. We must rather recognise everywhere claims of damages which have validly arisen according to the law of the place where the act was done. It is only by holding fast to this principle that we shall achieve a real equality of natives and foreigners in relations of private law in all civilised States, and it is only in this way that a man, who lives in this or that territory, can know on what guarantees for his legal rights he may rely, since foreigners cannot withdraw themselves from their obligations to pay damages, by betaking themselves to their own country.

In any event, the injustice which is involved in the non-recognition by the lex fori of a claim which has arisen by the lex loci actus, is much less than the injustice of the theory which allows the lex fori, dependent, as it is, upon the choice of the pursuer, to give rise to a claim. In cases which are plainly concerned, not with damages, but with penalties, a limitation of this kind must be conceded.⁸ For a State can only punish in so far as it can itself declare the punishment to be just; it cannot recognise the foreign sentence as one that may possibly be just, nor can any principle of distinction be found in the circumstance that the produce of the penalty goes not to the fisc, but to the private person who sues for it.

⁷ It is therefore impracticable, and it leads to strange results to apply, as Eccius applies (Förster-Eccius, i. § 11, No. 5) the law of the parties' own country, where they both belong to one and the same country, for the reason that a man even abroad cannot withdraw himself from the law of his own country and from the obligations which it involves, and that on the other hand the State has to protect its citizens even abroad. Both of these propositions are irrelevant petitiones principii. The protection of citizens abroad is not a matter of criminal law, but of public law, and if we allow our citizens to put themselves under a foreign system of law, we must as a rule allow them all that that system allows them.

Brocher (Nouv. Tr. § 127) is right in calling attention to the intolerable insecurity, which would necessarily result from the application of the lex fori. An act, which was completely legal in the country where it was done, might found a claim for damages, if the one party succeeded in entangling the other, against whom he alleges a claim of the kind, in a lawsuit in some other country, the law of which took a different view of the transaction.⁹

The great balance of opinion at the present time on the continent of Europe is in favour of determining obligations ex delictis by the lex loci actus, at least in so far as the question of damages is concerned.¹⁰ Whereas the law of England and that of the United States seem only to sanction claims upon delicts or quasi delicts, in so far as these claims are good both by the lex fori and the lex loci actus.¹¹

⁹ It may be, however, that a law which fastens responsibility e.g. on the State or on some public undertaking, should operate beyond the limits of the territory e.g. as regards injuries suffered by officials of the State or the company, on duty. This law may have the effect of a contract, and may operate accordingly outside the territory. On this ground we can justify the decision of the Imperial Court (ii.) of 13th February 1886 (reported by Bolze, Praxis, ii. § 27, p. 6), which held that the direction of the Prussian East Railway was liable for the injuries of one of their servants which had been inflicted upon Russian territory, but upon the system of the East Railway Company.

SPECIAL QUESTIONS CONNECTED WITH OBLIGATIONS ex delicto.

§ 287. In the law of delicts the following special questions have still to be answered:—

First, What is the place of the act in the legal sense which must rule in such matters, if we suppose that the act itself in the narrowest sense (the manifestation of the will), and its result, on the other hand, fall under different territorial laws?

The question, in so far as civil obligations are concerned, must be answered, for the same reasons as prevail in criminal law, in favour of the place of the act itself.¹² On the one hand, the results of any act may be lost in uncertainty, in a certain sense show themselves everywhere and nowhere, so that an attempt to decide such questions by the law of the place of the result would lead to the utmost uncertainty as to men's rights. Besides, the conception of an "act," which is derived from some positive system of law, cannot be taken as a means of defining international jurisdiction. In that matter we must start from the local situation of a thing or of a person, i.e. his domicile or his nationality, as the case may be. In truth, so soon as we allow that the question is not to be ruled by the place where the act was done, or, to speak more exactly, by the place of the person who is alleged to be liable, at the moment at which he is alleged to have made himself liable, but regard the place where the act has its results, its operation, as decisive, we take away the decision of the question from the lex loci actus, and commit it to that of the domicile of the person who is said to have been injured, or to that of the place in which

The decision of the Germ. Imp. Ct. (ii.) of 23rd September 1887 (Bolze, v. No. 13) seems to proceed on the theory that in the case of an act, constituting a good ground for an action of damages committed by means of a letter sent through the post, the place where the letter is received must rule. But it is just in such a case as this, e.g. where a merchant has unjustifiably recommended his goods, that the danger of this view comes out. The man who writes the letter knows not what obligations he is incurring.

he happens to be for the time. The law of this place is to chalk out the proper line of conduct for persons who reside in some other country !

In the second place, What is the law if the act which is complained of is done in a country belonging to some savage race, or on a desert island, and not within the territory of any civilised State ? As there is no territorial law in such a case to guide us, or at least none to which the subjects of civilised powers can be made subject, the only plan left is to have recourse to the personal law.¹³ The person against whom the claim is made is thus liable only to the extent allowed by his personal law, but, as reciprocity in such cases is an irresistible requirement of justice, he is only liable in so far as the pursuer would in pari casu be liable to him. Besides, the application of the personal law is in accordance—with perhaps some modifications—with the recognised usage in the case of Europeans living in the non-Christian States of the East.¹⁴ On the other hand, the application of the lex fori, which many¹⁵ recommend in this case, is simply a dangerous mode of avoiding the difficulty. We shall have occasion to deal with this question again in connection with the subject of maritime law.

In the third place, If the question is one of liability for damage done by beasts, or by other persons, such as children, servants, etc., it is obvious that the liability can never be broader or go further than the law of the place, where the damage takes place, permits.¹⁶ But just as little can it go beyond what is sanctioned by the law of the nationality or domicile of the person against whom the claim is made. For the law of the domicile of the person or the beast that actually does the injury cannot have any power to affect others beyond that territory. We should not ascribe this effect as a matter of course to the law of a domicile that was accidental and merely temporary ; but again, on the other hand, the circumstance that the guilty person or the vicious beast was staying at the place where the accident happened, with the consent of the head of the family or the owner, may be taken into account in testing his liability.¹⁷ If, however, the rule of law prevailing at the place where the damage was done passes the property of the thing that does the damage to the person who suffers it, or to the fisk, we should adhere to the general rule in respect of the lex rei

¹⁴ Judgment of the Appeal Court at the Hague, 19th March 1878 (J. xi. p. 211).

¹⁶ Cf. judgment of the Appeal Court in England quoted by Westlake, Rev. x. p. 541. [The Moxham, 1876, L. R. 1, P. D. p. 107.]

sita which would then come into play.¹⁸ On the other hand, in such cases as these we cannot refuse to give a certain amount of weight to the lex fori. If the lex fori should be such as to make the judge who is dealing with the case think that it would be altogether unreasonable to fix liability on the defender,¹⁹ he could not well find him liable even according to the lex loci actus. To this extent, in accordance with what we have already (p. 96) said, the theory of the so-called coercitive law is, no doubt, sound.

NOTE W ON §§ 286, 287. OBLIGATIONS ex delicto.

[The law of England is as it is stated in note 11, and the author, in the concluding sentences of the immediately preceding paragraph, reaches very nearly the same position. The law of Scotland apparently coincides with that of England, but there are not many illustrations of it in the books, so far as civil liability is concerned. In the case of M'Larty against Steele, however (1881, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. viii. p. 435), the court held that, in an action of damages by one Scotsman against another for slander uttered in Penang and Singapore, it was not necessary for the defender to aver or prove any special damage suffered, although by the law of Burmah that would have been necessary. But it would seem that this decision was not intended to touch the general doctrine, for it was said that the question decided was merely one as to the evidence by which injury might be shown to have been done to the pursuer, and that, although by the foreign law redress could not be given without proof of special damage, that did not import that by that law verbal slander was lawful.

In the case of Horn v. N. B. Ry. Co. 1878 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. v. p. 1055), a person sued a railway company for damages in respect of the death of his son. The company sued was Scots, but the accident happened while the deceased, upon a through ticket, was travelling in England. In defence it was pleaded that the law of England must rule the liability, and that as it, unlike the law of Scotland, gives no remedy by way of solatium, the claim must fail. The court, without very distinctly pronouncing whether the basis of the action was contract or delict, held that the question stated above was a question of the remedy rather than of the right, and must be determined by the lex fori. It is proper to notice that an application of the law of the place of contract, viz. Scotland, would have given the same result, and would, it is thought, have been more in agreement with the authorities. Lord Gifford seems inclined to put the judgment on that ground. It has, however, been held in a recent case, Rosses v. Thakor Sahib of Gondal, 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xix. p. 31, that a person who sues for damages in respect of an act done abroad, must show that that act is, by the law of the country where it is done, a wrong carrying with it a claim of damages in reparation, before a claim can be allowed in Scotland. The lex fori will not rule such a question, but the lex loci actus. Savigny's authority was considered in this case and deliberately rejected. It did not, however, raise the question whether the lex fori must concur in holding the act to be a wrong before a remedy would be given.

In the case of Waygood & Co. v. Bennie (1885, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xii. 651), it was recognised that a court has jurisdiction to prevent a wrong being done to its own subjects by the circulation of printed matter (a printed trade-circular) within its own territory, but sent from a foreign country.

On the question whether the place where the act was done, or where its results came to light, is to be regarded in such matters, there is no body of authority in Scotland in civil matters. As regards criminal responsibility, the law of Scotland undoubtedly gives jurisdiction to the courts of the country where the crime was completed by taking effect where, as it is said, the engine exploded. "If one compose and print a libel in England, and circulate it here, or if one forge a deed abroad and utter it here, certainly the proper courts for the trial of such a case are those of this country, since it is here that the main act is done which completes the crime. . . . Nay, more, it may be plausibly argued that he shall be subjected to the same course of trial who shall write an incendiary letter in England, and put it into a course of conveyance thence, by means of which it is received in Scotland" (Baron Hume on Crimes, i. 173). This principle has been applied in the leading cases of Bradbury, 1872, 2 Couper, 311; Witherington, 1881, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. viii. (J.C.) p. 41. The decisions in these cases are all the more forcible, as the crime charged was in both cases the obtaining of goods under false pretences, the species facti alleged constituting no criminal offence in England, by the law of which country the prisoners in both cases claimed that they should be tried.

Where the crime is one recognised in all countries, there is probably, as is suggested by Lord Neaves in Bradbury's case, a concurrent jurisdiction in the two countries: the difficulties of adopting the law of the place where the result is produced as determining the quality of the offence are forcibly stated by Lord Young in the case of Hall tried at Perth, 1881, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. viii. (J.C.) 28.

In England it is determined by the cases of the Queen v. Keyn (1876, L. R. 2 Ex. D. 63) and re Smith (1876, L. R. 1 P. D. 300), that in the case of offences or torts, committed by means of the collision of one ship with another, it is not sufficient to give the English court jurisdiction that the ship suffering damage, or on board of which the offence—in Keyn's case manslaughter—take place, is an English ship. The point for consideration is not in what place the act was completed, but in what place the actor was.]

OBLIGATIONS quasi ex contractu.

§ 288. Although most authors treat quasi contracts in the same way as delicts and quasi delicts, Laurent (viii. § 1)²⁰ sets up a different rule for the treatment of quasi contracts. He proposes to treat them more after the analogy of real contracts, because he thinks that the obligation quasi ex contractu rests upon the will of the parties, as that is presumed to be by the law, whereas the obligation ex delicto operates against the will of the parties. Thus the law of the place where the act is done is only to decide, if the parties are of different nationalities, while the personal law gives the rule, if both parties belong to the same nationality.

This argument goes too far. As the authors of the new draft of a code for Belgium notice, it is not applicable to the obligation quasi ex contractu, which arises by the payment to any one of an indebitum, and again, with the help of presumptions as to the intention of parties, one can prove everything or nothing in private international law. Again, to determine the application of the law, according as the persons concerned belong to the same or to different nationalities, will by no means in every case satisfy men's sentiments of justice. At the same time, we must not overlook the fact that there is something sound at the root of Laurent's theory. If the law treats an obligation, which arises directly ex lege, and is not dependent upon the intention of any one for its existence, in spite of that as a quasi contract, and not as a delict, that is an indication, in so far as private international law is concerned, that it may be that, instead of the place in which the obligation arose, some other place, possibly the domicile of the parties, should rule. Such an obligation, which, to a certain extent, is to be treated on the analogy of a contract right, may, in this matter, be treated as if it really were such a right.²¹ We may thus under certain circumstances disregard the place of the actual factum from which the obligation springs, holding it to be a mere unimportant accident, substantially for the same reasons as frequently induce us to regard the place where a true contract is concluded—apart from the application of the rule "locus regit actum" in matters of form—as immaterial. In this way it may often be that, if both parties belong to the same State, the law of this State will rule, although we need not, as Laurent does, deduce from this a hard and fast rule. If²² A and B belong to the same State and know each other to be citizens of the same State X, and A pays B an indebitum, while they are travelling together in State Y, it would not be equitable to test the obligation to repay the indebitum by the law of State Y, but rather by the law which prevails in the country in which both parties have their home.²³ Again, in the case of negotiorum gestio without authority, which is not confined to one State, as may very well be the case, it would be absurd to apply a different law to each of the acts of this gestio which may stand in close connection one with another. In such cases, as Laurent, too, points out, the application of the law of the parties' domicile may very often be proper, because negotiorum gestio in fact stands in close connection with mandate. But if a man takes possession of a deserted house or an abandoned article of any kind, without knowing who the owner is, it would, on the other hand, be absurd to have regard to the parties' personal law, even if they should both belong to the same State.

LIABILITY OF THIRD PARTIES. FINAL OBSERVATIONS.

§ 289. In any case, however, an obligation quasi ex contractu in accordance with the lex loci actus, can only attach to a person who is subject to that law, be he so subject by reason of residence within its territory, or because that law is his personal law. Thus a negotiorum gestor by his actings may bind himself according to the rules of the lex loci actus, whereas it may well be that the law of the domicile of the principal will be the only rule for determining what is all that is necessary to found the Actio negotiorum gestororum contraria. Accordingly the decision of the Court at Celle on 28th Nov. 1871, in a very interesting matter, was in our opinion entirely sound.²⁴

²² Rev. xviii. p. 483.

²³ Laurent (viii. p. 11) would treat the receipt of an indebitum, where there is mala fides, as a delict, and would accordingly deal with it in quite another way. But mala fides can very often not be proved, and accordingly a treatment so radically different, according as the receipt is in bona fide or in mala fide, is unpractical. The German Imp. Ct. (iii.) on the 14th June 1887 (Entsch. xxii. p. 296), in the case of a condictio on the head of recompense, held the law of the domicile of the person, who was said to have benefited, as regulative. This was no doubt in respect of § 705 of the Saxon Code, which makes the domicile of the obligant the place for the performance of the obligation, in default of any provision to the contrary or of any distinct implication from the nature of thing to be done. Seuffert, Comm. i. p. 256, says: "The law of the place where the thing was given will rule a claim for its return, but, when the question is raised whether what was given was an indebitum, or was given without any legal right to demand it, regard must be had to the law which regulates the relation, which gave occasion to the payment." See, too, Fœlix, i. p. 239, and, on the necessity of taking two systems of law into account in some cases, see Brocher, ii. p. 142.

²⁴ Seuffert, xxvi. § 217.

On the transference, extinction, and prescription of claims founded originally on delicts²⁵ or on quasi contracts, we have nothing special to say.

We have already shown that the obligation of one who has been compelled to pay aliment to the mother of an illegitimate child cannot be called an obligation ex delicto; whereas, on the other hand, the obligation to make payment to one who has been seduced, by way of compensation for the loss of a respectable marriage, has the character of a true obligation ex delicto, and is therefore subject to the lex loci actus.²⁶

²⁶ See Wächter, ii. p. 396; Stobbe, § 33, note 34; Beseler, § 39, note 28; Sup. Ct. at Berlin, 27th September 1875 (Seuffert, xxi. § 196); Laurent, viii. § 16, with special reference to the distinction taken in the text and supra, § 205. It is obvious that an action must be thrown out if the law of the court before which it comes holds it to be indecent or immoral. This is no peculiarity of actions on delict (cf. i. § 36), although it occurs most frequently with them. As regards the law of France, in particular, we may say again that it does not by any means give the maxim "la recherche de la paternité est interdite" the same absolute force as German authors attribute to it. See Laurent ut cit.

Of course, all those who apply the lex fori exclusively in all cases of delict, do so here also. E.g. Schmid, p. 76. See, on the contrary, the practice in Prussia. Eccius-Forster, § 11; note 35.

COMMERCIAL LAW.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

A. COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS. CHARACTER OF A PERSON AS A TRADER.

§ 290. 1st, The question whether a legal problem is to be treated as a commercial matter, or as a matter belonging to ordinary municipal law, may arise in various aspects.

(a.) The law may prescribe that commercial matters shall be disposed of according to rules that are in substance different from the ordinary rules of municipal law. To that extent the answer to the question, whether a transaction is a commercial transaction, and must therefore be disposed of according to the provisions of a commercial code or not, depends upon the question to what territorial law the transaction generally is to be referred. For commercial law is simply an aggregate of legal rules belonging to this territorial law, and of course the law that regulates the matter must say which of its own rules is to be applied to the case. The presumption, which some systems of law attach to certain kinds of transactions, that they belong to the sphere of commercial law (cf. e.g. German Comm. Code, § 274), must be recognised by foreign tribunals in accordance with the deliverance of the lex loci obligationis upon it.

(b.) The law may provide that commercial matters shall be dealt with by particular courts. The definition of a commercial matter must be taken from the lex fori. If the courts of a State are competent to entertain a process, it is the law of this State that must settle all questions of competency between this court and that court; the subsumption of an action under the head of a commercial action is, in so far as matters of process are concerned, simply a deliverance of this kind in an abbreviated form.¹

(c.) The law may provide that in commercial matters certain particular kinds of proof shall be recognised, which would not be admitted, if the subject matter of the action were not a commercial matter. Thus, e.g. by the 109th article of the French Commercial Code, proof by witnesses is admitted to a larger extent in commercial sales than in the case of other contracts. Here the question may be raised, does the law, by which the substance of the contract is ruled, determine this question, or does the lex fori? This question must be answered when we come to deal with the law of process.

As regards question (a) it is possible in other respects, as we have shown before, that a legal transaction should for some purposes require to be dealt with by the law of place A, and for other purposes by the law of place B. An instance of that is the matter of the rate of interest to be allowed. If, then, an obligation, which has arisen in A, must be tested by the law of B, in so far as questions of interest are concerned, and the law of B allows a higher rate of interest in commercial transactions than in other transactions, it is a simple application of the proposition stated under head (a) to hold that the question, whether the creditor can claim the higher interest attached to a commercial transaction, is a question that must be dealt with by the law of B.

Secondly, The question whether a person is a merchant or trader in the eye of the law, may be a question prejudicial,²

(a.) For the decision of the further question, whether any particular transaction is or is not a commercial matter, supposing the law to say that a transaction is only to be regarded as a commercial transaction if it is arranged by a merchant or trader. In that event the case is precisely the same as if the law, in place of using the shorthand expression "merchant" or "trader," had repeated in detail its description of the persons, whose participation in any contract makes it a commercial contract. The law which regulates the transaction itself must therefore rule in this matter, and the law of the domicile of the person has nothing to say in the matter.³

(b.) It may also be a prejudicial question with reference to certain obligations that have to be performed in the public interest: e.g. the obligation to keep business books, to enroll oneself as a merchant in some commercial register; or to ensure certain special privileges, such as the special rights of a trading firm. In respect that such obligations can only be discharged at the seat of the trading establishment, and such privileges are simply an appurtenance of that trading establishment, the law of the domicile or of the trading establishment, as the case may be, is the only law that can be applied.

² This comes out specially clearly in the provision of § 272 of the German Code of Commerce ad fin. When it is said that the transactions described in § 272 are to be regarded as commercial transactions, even "where they are done as an isolated matter by one who is a merchant in the course of his business, which, as a rule, is directed to different objects," it is plain that by the term "merchant" we are to understand a merchant in the sense of that German Code, and not a merchant according to the definition of some other code.

If the law makes the character of merchant dependent on majority or a venia ætatis (the emancipation of the French law), this fact is a fact to be determined exclusively by the personal law.⁴ The same law, i.e. the personal law, must decide whether a wife needs the consent of her husband before she can become a trader,⁵ and whether this consent can be obtained by judicial procedure, if the husband himself unreasonably refuses to give it, and whether a consent, once given, can be recalled. For the matter in question in all such cases is a true incapacity of acting, which is prescribed in the case of a wife in the interest of married life in general, but may be waived if the husband consents. The consequences of a consent are, of course, excepting the legality of a recall, to be determined by the law of the place in which the trading establishment or firm is carried on. For it is there that the whole legal relation, for the constitution of which this consent is one element, is to be realised, and the bona fides of commercial intercourse demands that the matter shall be so treated.

We shall deal with the questions of the weight of business books as evidence, and of the obligation to exhibit them, when we deal with the law of process.

As to the law of the firm name, see supra, § 98, and infra on the law of trademark.

B. MANAGERS AND ASSISTANTS AND TRADING PARTNERSHIPS.

§ 291. The legal questions, which arise from the employment of managers or assistants in commercial law, are to be determined on the same principles as regulate agency and mandate.

In this way the person who holds an authority or procuration will represent the principal with all the powers with which the law of the place, in which the principal is domiciled, or in which his trading establishment is situated, as the case may be, invests the agent.¹ But this person holding this authority has these powers only. Although the law of the country, in which the representative of a foreign trading house makes contracts, should invest such representation in general with more extensive powers, that is no reason for saying that the bona fides of trade requires the application of the lex loci actus to determine the extent of the authority of the foreign representative. In the case of a foreign minor, it may be that his character as a foreigner is not visible, and that there is, therefore, no occasion for enquiring what his personal law is, and the bargain itself may not by reason of its subject-matter give rise to any such enquiry. But a transaction with a foreign commercial agent, who gives himself out as such, always gives rise, to a sufficient extent, to the suspicion that there may be some divergence between his law and that of the country in which he is. Again, on the other hand, the principal has no means at all of protecting himself, if the commercial agent can extend his powers at pleasure by crossing the frontier just as he chooses. Further, what is to be the result, if the various territories concerned lay down different conditions for the competency of placing restrictions upon such authority, or of recalling it? The provisions of the German Commercial Code, and nowadays of the Swiss Code also, as to the necessity of registering procurations and alterations upon them in the commercial register, afford an excellent illustration of the soundness of these propositions. It is simply impossible that foreign firms and foreign establishments should make such entries in the German Empire or in Switzerland.

⁴ In such cases it is nationality that must rule. For here the question is the fundamental question, whether a man is a merchant; if this is once established, then, in accordance with what we have said supra, § 252, the lex domicilii and not the law of nationality is the law that is to be considered with a view to the determination of the particular problems of commercial law in so far as they touch this person.

⁵ E.g. a wife separated from her husband, her personal law not admitting true divorce.

2nd, The same principles must of course regulate the liability of the partners in a commercial partnership.² In fact, this liability may be traced to the recognition of one partner as an authorised agent of the other partners, or to the fact that a third person as authorised agent performs his office for several persons simultaneously; and in respect that some kinds of trading partnerships are invested with something of the character of juridical persons—a subject which we are not to investigate at present—the same result may be obtained on principles already laid down (i. § 139).

That foreigners, except in the case of uncivilised countries, noticed in note 2 ad fin., cannot set up a trading establishment to be carried on in another country except in the forms recognised by that country,³ needs hardly to be said. The rule "locus regit actum" acquires a coercitive character from the fact that in commercial matters the country where the business is carried on takes the place which the personal law holds in other departments of law, except in so far as personal capacity to act is concerned.

If a person enters a joint-stock company, as one of the original shareholders or holders of stock, he subjects himself to the law of the place where the company has its seat, or to any proviso on this subject, which the conditions of the company may lay down, to a certain extent.⁴ He does so, e.g. in so far as his obligation for further contributions is concerned, and he submits himself to special forms of citation in any process connected with the liquidation of the company, or the enforcement of calls.⁵ But there is no good ground for maintaining that the transferee from an original shareholder is bound in every case, in a question with that original shareholder, to make good in his room payments that fall due upon the transference, although the law of the seat of the company may provide to that effect.⁶ In such cases it is rather the law which regulates the transference itself that must rule, unless the transferee is referred to some other law, by a note upon his share certificate.⁷

² See judgment of Appeal Court at Celle, 31st May 1876 (Seuffert, xxxi. § 303). The liability of the partner of a trading establishment in Peru, who lives in Prussia, is to be primarily determined by the law of Peru. See, too, Imperial Court of Commerce 17th February 1871 (Seuffert, xxvi. § 101). Imperial Court (i.) 5th November 1884 (Bolze, Praxis, i. No. 41, p. 10), any question as to the necessity of suing the company is to be settled by the law of the seat of the company. A special difficulty may arise if the company is established in a country (e.g. in the East) in which the local law does not bind Europeans, while the partners are citizens of various European States. A case of this kind is determined by the judgment of the Imperial Court of 2nd July 1884, to the effect that for a commercial partnership the law of the country in which it proposes to carry on its business may furnish the rule.

The law which prevails at the seat of the company will be applied to the relations of the shareholders inter se. It will not be the law recognised at the place where any piece of business, e.g. the conduct of a mine carried on account of the company, has its seat (see Imp. Ct. (i.) 15th November 1885, in Bolze, Praxis, ii. § 31, p. 8).

II. NEGOTIABLE NOTES OR BONDS PAYABLE TO BEARER.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

§ 292. Notes or bonds payable to bearer present substantial difficulties in matters of private international law. It will not, however, be necessary to go very deeply into the highly debatable theory of the construction of the obligations embodied in written documents. This much we must hold to be beyond all doubt. The debtor, who issues the note, will become debtor to the person who acquires right in the note with the intention of becoming creditor.¹ The debtor, too, will, may, and must, without further enquiry, accept any one who is actually in possession of the note as invested with these rights, putting out of view special cases in which an exception must be made, e.g. the case of a stoppage of payment duly intimated or judicially laid on, where notes of the kind have been stolen or gone amissing. It is self-evident that no law but the law of the debtor's domicile can regulate this obligation of the debtor² in itself. To escape this the debtor would require, by issuing the notes in another place and

⁶ Belgian Statute of 18th May 1875, art. 42.

¹ Some one may get possession with the intention of acquiring right in the note and the claim it represents for some one else.

² Accordingly, as a rule, the law of the debtor's domicile will decide the question, whether he can issue notes payable to bearer, of particular descriptions, without the express permission of the Government.

promising to pay them at that other place, to have thus submitted his liability by anticipation to some other law. But the debtor has made the fate of his liability, in so far as the person of his creditor is concerned, dependent on the right which any unknown third party may acquire in the note, which is a corporeal moveable. This right is subject to the lex rei sitæ, i.e. more exactly to the law of the place where the note happens to be at the time of the transaction by which it is transferred.³ If, then, a holder is compelled, be it by the law and by the courts of the country of his domicile or residence, to make over his right in the note to some one else, the debtor must recognise this right the moment there is a right in the note, i.e. a right according to the law of the place where the delivery of the note, following on the judgment, took place. All that preceded the possession of the note by this person, before any claim was made against the debtor, is no concern of his, or at least only concerns him in so far as the law, by which the obligation of the debtor himself is ruled, i.e. generally the lex domicilii of the debtor, requires some investigation to be made.⁴ The result is that the legislature may facilitate or impede the vindication of all notes circulating in its territory. But, in so far as foreign notes, notes issued in another territory, are concerned, the effect of such provisions may, on the one hand, cease⁵ so soon as the note is brought outside the State in which they are enacted, a result arising from the principles of the law of things. On the other hand, no law except that which regulates the liability of the debtor can say to what person he shall or may pay.

THE FRENCH STATUTE OF 15TH JUNE 1872.

§ 293. The questions just discussed have acquired special importance in France, and, indirectly, in all those countries that are closely connected with transactions on the French Exchange, since the French statute of 15th June 1872 anent Titres au porteur.⁶ That statute contains:—

³ The necessity of obtaining the license of the sovereign power for notes that are to be put into circulation will in doubt be restricted to notes which have been issued within the country, and will not extend to notes issued beyond it, although by citizens belonging to it. Imp. Ct. of Comm. (iii.) 8th October 1874 (Entsch. xii. § 101).

⁴ This is in consonance with the principles already laid down for assignments. The debtor is discharged if he pays to the person who is authorised, by the law that regulates the debt, to receive payment. In the case of notes payable to bearer, no exception to this can be recognised. The debtor will also have the advantage, which may also indirectly be an advantage to the creditor, of not being required to investigate the title of the holder who claims to be his creditor any further than the lex domicilii of the debtor requires that to be done, e.g. where payment of such notes is by some exceptional measure stopped for a time.

First, Provisions as to payments which a person who has lost notes or bonds payable to bearer may, notwithstanding that loss, demand under certain conditions from the establishment that issued them. All are agreed that these provisions affect none but French debtors.

Second, Provisions to the effect that notes or bonds payable to bearer, the loss of which has been advertised in a particular way, in a sheet appointed for that purpose, and published by the committee of the Exchange at Paris, cannot thereafter be validly transferred as against the former holder who makes the advertisement. In other words, these are provisions which give the person who has lost the documents a right to vindicate them against all holders who acquire them subsequently to this advertisement, and cannot connect themselves with any holder who held them before this advertisement. The extent to which these provisions should be recognised in international relations is much debated.⁷

One view is that the law should be restricted altogether to French scrip.⁸ This theory, however, is very scantily supported; practice, and in particular the opinion of the Court of Cassation, are against it. The conclusion that, because one part of the enactment is, as we have seen, applicable only to French documents of debt, so the other part also should be applied exclusively to the same class of documents, is erroneous. The course of the law has, however, gradually extended the claim of vindication given by French law beyond the case in which foreign scrip has been stolen in France and negotiated there. It has upheld that claim where this latter condition was absent, and where the scrip had become the subject of commercial dealings in a foreign country among foreigners. It is, of course, a condition of the application of the law of France, that the action should be capable of being raised as a real action cum effectu in France. It must therefore be directed against a person who is domiciled there, and, as it would seem according to some decisions and the theory of Vincent, which I shall again notice, the scrip must be within French territory at the time when the claim is made. The reasons on which this doctrine, which, as Clunet trenchantly and truly says, leads us in the end to a "statut universal," i.e. a kind of universal supremacy of the law of France, are extremely feeble. On the one hand, it is maintained that we have here to do with a provision of protective police, which should on that account be applied indiscriminately to all dealers in scrip within France. On the other hand, it is further asserted that all the statute does is to set up a kind of presumption of mala fides against any one who acquires such scrip after notice has been given in France, in the way we have mentioned, that it has been lost. But it is impossible that the former argument should avail to upset all other rules of private international law in commercial matters, and enable us to assert that the measures adopted in France can impress upon such scrip the character indelebilis of non-negotiability, even where it afterwards is found in a foreign country. The second argument implies the absolute claim—a most unjust one—that the advertisements of the sheet published by the French Exchange should be read all the world over by every man who buys such notes. This demand is all the more inequitable that the regulations for dealing in stocks in France, on which the French law proceeds, are not recognised by the whole world.

We may suggest the following as the sound theory. The law is undoubtedly to be applied to scrip stolen in France, although issued abroad. The non-negotiability of such scrip, however, will operate so long only as it actually is within the territory of France, in any case only so long as no transference of it takes place in a foreign country, the effects of which transference operate in accordance with the law of that foreign country.⁹ If this transference gives the person who acquires the note an unassailable right as against the person from whom it has been stolen, a Frenchman who comes after him in the chain of transmissions must, of course, have the same unassailable right. It seems, therefore, to be specially unsound to apply the law, irrespective of any intermediate transmissions in a foreign country, to a subsequent French holder.¹⁰ Even in the case of French scrip or notes, the French law could not exercise any extensive effect in international intercourse,¹¹ without thereby damaging the character of all such paper. For their distinctive character lies in the fact that, whatever may be the accidents attendant on the property or the possession of them, the claim of debt will always be instructed by them. Of course, the answer will be made that the whole object of the French law will fail of attainment, at least in great measure, since persons who have stolen or embezzled such documents, will easily manage by some means to convey them into a foreign country.¹² That may be quite true, but it is not sufficient to justify an application of the law of France to an extent far beyond what is authorised by any precedent. We shall be all the less warranted in proceeding upon it, since the acceptance of notes or bonds of this nature beyond French territory would be seriously prejudiced, unless sufficient provision were made for advertising the loss of them beyond French territory as well as in France. It is, besides, quite conceivable that the vast development of the traffic in such negotiable securities makes it impossible for any single State to hit upon any protective measures which shall be of real efficacy even within its own territory, and that the only means for devising adequate security is by international agreement, the difficulties of which cannot be overlooked. In spite of all, however, the French law has in point of fact an influence even in other countries which is not to be underestimated, just as private advertisements of the loss of such documents may have. In such circumstances, there may be ground for suspicions of mala fides in the holder, even where the negotiation has taken place in a foreign territory. But if the law of France should attempt to set itself up still further in the direction which we have indicated—a 'direction which seems to us to be erroneous, and to many eminent French jurists highly debatable—the result may perhaps be to produce undesirable effects upon the business of the French Exchange. At the same time, we can see what important consequences a general agreement for the execution of foreign judgment might have, since the law of a single country shows itself to be so desirous of claiming extra-territorial effect for its provisions.

TAKING NOTES OUT OF CIRCULATION. JUDICIAL PROCEDURE FOR THIS PURPOSE.

§ 294. The same is to be said of the case where by statutory enactment the holder of a note for value, which is payable to the bearer, has the power of taking the same out of the circle, either by noting it for himself,

¹² Vincent (J. xiii. pp. 676-683, especially p. 679) defends this proposition, which undoubtedly raises this hardship or difficulty, viz. that the ruling law should be the law of the place where the holder is when the action is raised. The intermediate transmissions of the scrip abroad might then simply be ignored, which would result in giving the former French holder an advantage. Vincent's opinion is that this proposition is in conformity with the principles of private international law, and appeals to the operation of the rule "possession vaut titre." That rule, however, on the contrary, protects a new acquisition in conformity with the law of the territory into which the thing has passed. It never recalls any older right to life, even although that older right may at one time have existed in the very same territory. See the rule recognised in the more modern Belgian bill (§ 216, p. 499, note), and Durand, p. 411. Vincent brings "ordre public" into the field, by which any conclusion you please can be reached. In the continuation of Vincent's paper in the Journal (xv. p. 343), it is still more evident that the whole theory is based upon an erroneous conception of the rules that regulate the law of things in its international bearings.

or by the process of having it noted by some Government officer.¹³ Such a process only binds the debtor in so far as his lex domicilii provides that it shall do so.¹⁴ On the other hand, in so far as a claim for recovery of the note is to be ruled by the law of the land in which the operation of noting has taken place, the legal import of this operation will determine the relations of the pursuer and defender in any such action for recovery. Any noting by which the scrip is again put into circulation, i.e. again made negotiable, is, as regards its form and its effect, to be ruled by the law of the place where this noting takes place. Any such operation plainly makes the position of the debtor more favourable, for it relieves him from all inquiry into the title of the bearer. There is, therefore, no reason for referring to the lex domicilii of the debtor, a result which is in accordance with the rules that prevail in the law of things.¹⁵

The debtor is always free from any claim at the instance of the holder, if he is free according to the law which originally regulates the performance of the contract. But he cannot be discharged by any other law. From this it follows that a decree of discharge or cancellation of such a note, if it has been lost, can only be obtained under the conditions and before the court¹⁶

¹⁶ The German Civilprozessordn. § 839, provides: "The courts of the country which the document itself indicates as the place of performance, are competent for the declaratory process. If the document gives no such indication, then the court to which the person who issues the document is generally subject is competent. . . . If the claim upon which the document proceeds is recorded in any register of real rights or securities, the court rei sitæ is the only competent court." These provisions are not quite correct from an international point of view; they are influenced by Savigny's erroneous theory of the place of performance. Foreign financial houses and foreign States, which set up in our country offices for payment of their obligations, certainly do not thereby intend to recognise that our courts have jurisdiction to declare these obligations invalid, and thus declare the debtors to be bound to issue new obligations. (See C. de Paris, 31st Dec. 1877, J. v. p. 165, to the contrary: the objection taken to payment sanctioned by the law of the debtor's domicile.¹⁷ It is, however, quite a different question whether or not the person who has lost such a negotiable note, by neglect of some obligation incumbent on him by the law of his domicile—e.g. by neglect of some necessary advertisement—is bound to give up the document, which he has received from the court in place of that which was held to be discharged or cancelled to the holder of that document itself. See note 16 ad fin.

NOTE X ON §§ 292-294. NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS IN ENGLAND.

[The question has arisen in the courts of England whether certain papers were or were not "negotiable instruments," so as to pass from hand to hand, and to confer on a bona fide holder a good title from the mere fact of possession in bona fide, without the necessity of a formal transfer or assignation. In the case on hand the bonds were Prussian bonds, which had been stolen from the plaintiff, the sheet of coupons remaining, however, in his possession, and had come into the possession of the defendants in bona fide. There appeared to be a conflict of evidence as to whether the bonds without the coupons were, even by Prussian law, negotiable, but the court assumed that they were. The decision was that, unless the documents were known to English law and English trade as negotiable, they could not be allowed to pass by mere delivery in England, and that as there was no evidence to show that the custom of English traders was to hold such bonds to be negotiable, the plaintiff must succeed, since the defendants had no good title. Lord Justice Bowen likens the character of negotiable documents to that of the currency of a country: the fact that being made, the validity of interdict must, in so far as regards Italian notes, be determined exclusively by the law of Italy, although the obligations themselves and their coupons are paid through a French bank, and although it may be held to be competent for French debtors, although not for foreign debtors, to rely upon the law and the courts rei sitæ as the only competent law and tribunals to determine their personal liability.) It may be, however, that the person who asks for a sentence of cancellation will have to observe some of the provisions of the law recognised at his domicile or place of business, as well as the rules of that law to which the foreign paper itself is subject, if he desires not to expose himself to claims which may be urged against him on the ground that he acquired the scrip at the former place. See Vogt in the Neue Archiv. des Handelsrechts, by Vogt and Heinichen, i. p. 31; and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, reported there, of date 20th October 1856.

¹⁷ If, however, the document itself does not indicate any particular place of performance within the German Empire, and the debtor has no domicile within that empire, it is impossible, according to the statute for the regulation of procedure in Germany, that there should be any decree of cancellation there at all. This is at least the view which is adopted by the great majority of commentators. Cf. Struckmann and Koch, Civilprozessordn. on § 839, note 1. Seuffert, Comm. § 839, note 2. The Hannoverian ordinance of 28th January 1826, § 4, and the statutes of the Hannoverian Landescreditanstalt, § 49 ad fin. promulgated by ordinance of 18th June 1842, proceed on the principle that the judex domicilii of the debtor is competent. The Hessian ordinance, too, of 18th Dec. 1823, tacitly assumes that a decree of discharge of inland notes payable to bearer is all that the courts of any country can pronounce; and the like, too, is enacted by the ordinance of the free town of Frankfurt, 8th July 1817, art. 4 (Schumm, p. 234).

certain things, be they coins, cowries, or documents, are part of the currency of A, will not make them part of the currency of B. Picker v. London and County Banking Co. (1887, L.R. 18, Q.B.D. 515).

Again, it was held that the validity of a transaction in share certificates, the shares being shares of American railroads, but the transaction having taken place in England, must be ruled by the law of England, and unless the holder were validly in possession by that law he could have no claim to the certificates or right to them. If, however, he were validly in possession by that law, the import of the possession, the character of his right and its extent must be determined by the law of the document, i.e. American law. Williams v. Colonial Bank (1888, L.R. 38, Ch. D. 388).]

III. FREIGHT.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES. FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

§ 295. According to the theory which is most widely prevalent, and which in our opinion is the sound theory, a contract of carriage or freight by land, and on board vessels on inland waters, must be ruled by the law of the place where it is made,¹ or more exactly by the law of the place in which the carrier's business is carried on.²

It is this law, and not that of the place of performance (which on this important point is altogether set out of view in practice), that will regulate the obligation of the carrier for timeous delivery, and for damage or loss of the goods in transit, and his obligation to follow the directions of the person who sends the goods. It will also regulate the obligation of the sender to pay the freight, and to make compensation for anything in the condition or in the packing of the goods that is illegal or in breach of contract, and is thus productive of damage. On the other hand, the law of the place of delivery will determine the shape which the transference of the property to the consignee should take, and his obligation to pay freight, unless it should hold that he has already validly bound himself in accordance with the tenor of the bill of lading; it will also determine whether there is to be implied any waiver on the part of the consignee of claims of damage for injury to the goods,³ and whether the carrier has any right of retention over the goods.⁴ The same doctrine holds good of all conditions affecting

² Wharton calls attention to this. In the United States, agents of carrying companies canvass for contracts of carriage in States with which they have no connection.

delivery,⁵ in so far as these are either subject to imperative laws or usages of the place of delivery, or cannot at least be disturbed without the consent of the consignee or special expense or trouble to the carrier which cannot in reason be imposed upon him. There are circumstances in which to a certain extent we may say, without drawing any exact line, that parties must be held to have submitted themselves to all the usages of the place of delivery.

But the legal problems may present themselves in a complicated form, if the first carrier hands over the goods to another carrier for further carriage, or is compelled to do so by force of circumstances, while the second carrier is subject to a different law from that which bound the former. The general theory on this subject, which is in correspondence with the rules for inland carriage,⁶ holds that each carrier in turn, by taking over the bill of lading and the goods themselves, makes himself a party to the contract of the first carrier, and takes over his obligations;⁷ on the other hand, the first carrier is responsible to the measure of his own contract for the diligence of all the carriers that are to come after him. The result, of course, is that the last carrier can be sued directly by the consigner and by the consignee, and for faults which are to be imputed not to himself, but to some one who comes before him in the chain. Thus the provisions of the contract concluded between the first carrier and the consigner, and the law applicable to that contract, rule at the same time the contract of the last carrier.⁸ But this simple state of legal relations is, in so far as practical consequences are concerned, as a general rule apparent only, at least in all questions connected with great carrying agencies, particularly railways. The carrier who is a party to the first contract, or to one of the earlier contracts, where there are several, may, by reason of the freedom of contract that belongs to him, stipulate that he becomes a party to the contract only on the conditions of his own law, i.e. the law that is recognised in the country where he carries on business, or in which his line of railway runs, or on the conditions of some special bargain which he tables. Then, if the original bill of lading, embodying the contract of carriage, contains such a stipulation, the result is that very various laws will as a UNIFORM INTERNATIONAL CODE FOR CARRIAGE ON RAILWAYS.

THE CONVENTION AT BERNE IN 1886.

§ 296. One result of the evils thus associated with the law of carriage has been the voluntary association and agreement of railway companies to regulate their through carriage on the same principles. Another result has been the project of setting up one international code of railway law for traffic between different countries. The association of German¹⁰ railway companies, established in 1846, had in 1879 an extent of upwards of 34,000 miles of railway conducted on the same principles as regards carriage, a common system of carriers' law. Again, in 1873, on the suggestion of Switzerland,¹¹ an international congress met for the purpose of working out a common international code of carriers' law, while again in 1881, and lastly in 1886, more international congresses were held on this subject. It is probable that the scheme drawn up in 1886 will be adopted and sanctioned by statute in a majority of the States of Europe; it is possible that all Continental States may so adopt it.

We may quite properly pass over the provisions of this scheme.¹² It is a codification of the most generally recognised rules for railway traffic in the different States concerned, and an attempt to bring these rules into harmony. In countries in which these new rules may in time to come be recognised, there will no longer be any opportunity for the application of the principles of international law, just because the law of every State will be identical. This or that provision may, however, exercise some influence upon rules of private international law which are recognised independently of this new code, or upon the usages which the individual States adopt in carrying out their theories of international law, particularly upon the usages which they adopt in matters of process.

⁹ See Sup. Ct. of the Emp. (ii.) 11th Oct. 1876 (Entsch. xxi. p. 57), and the judgments of various German courts cited by Eger ut supra, pp. 48, 49. Goldschmidt's Zeitschr. für Handelsr. xii. p. 597; see, too, the interesting report presented in July 1878 to the International Congress for the development of means of carriage. Paris 1878.

Private international law would not, however, lose all its importance in the law of carriage even if the Convention of Berne were generally adopted. That convention, in any case, only covers railway carriage; it does not touch carriage by water, and in many doubtful cases, which must inevitably occur, we shall perforce have recourse to general principles for assistance.

SPECIAL LEGAL QUESTIONS. RESPONSIBILITY OF RAILWAY COMPANIES
BEYOND THEIR CONTRACTS.

§ 297. We desire, therefore, to call attention to the following special problem, which may easily come to be of importance, and which has been discussed more particularly among French jurists. The exclusion of liability in certain events by contract provisions is no doubt in general to be determined by the law of the place where the contract is made, i.e. the place where the goods are entrusted to the carrier,¹³ and this proposition holds good even if a subsequent carrier, and in particular the carrier who has to deliver the goods, would, as a general rule, by the provisions of his own law, incur a larger responsibility. But this rule suffers an exception, if by the law prevailing in the country in which the later stages of the carriage take place (i.e. as a general rule, by the law of the domicile of the railway or carrying company that takes charge of these later stages), so extensive an exclusion of liability by contract is looked upon as inadmissible, as being contra bonos mores, or at variance with ordre public.¹⁴ Thus, in France, a clause importing a general freedom from responsibility in favour of some carrying agency cannot be pleaded to meet the consequences of negligence that has taken place during the transit in France, even although it would be valid in the country in which the contract was made, it may be in consequence of some special privilege of the company or the State that is in possession of the railway. But, by a judgment of the Court of Cassation, it is held to be quite possible to allow a clause in a passenger's ticket, issued abroad, by which the company is not liable for the simple loss of unregistered luggage, the custody of which is undertaken by the traveller himself, to take effect in France.

¹³ Thus, for instance, there is a rule of law at the starting-point, that a cargo of coal is to be accepted as complete, if the whitewash covering remains intact: this rule will be recognised as authoritative in France to this extent, that it will relieve the French carrier of the presumption, which would otherwise obtain, that it was through his fault or that of the other carrier that there was a shortcoming (see French Ct. of Cass. 28th Nov. 1876, J. iii. p. 454).

¹⁴ Cf. Laurent, viii. § 174, and the judgment of the Court of Paris, of 4th Dec. 1877, there criticised. It was not held in this judgment that any violence had been done to ordre public, although the compensation to which the consignee was entitled to by the rules of the railway on which the transit began was so small as to be illusory. But the judgment would have been the other way, but for the fact that the sender had it in his power, on payment of an extra rate, to declare what the whole amount of his interest in punctual delivery was, and, if he had done so, to recover it (see Ct. of Cass. 19th July 1876, J. iv. p. 351).

The opinion, however, expressed both by Laurent and the Court of Cassation, that a clause of relief from responsibility, which, taken absolutely, will be treated by the law of the country, and perhaps by the law of every country, as invalid, may yet have the effect of shifting the onus of proof, is an opinion which we cannot completely share. Our notions of law may well detect a disadvantage, or an actual denial of justice to one of the parties, in deducing even a presumption from such an invalid stipulation.

If a railway company is asked to pay damages on the ground of some liability outside their contract, as, e.g. may be the case in connection with the German law of liability of 7th June 1871, then, as we are concerned with an obligation quasi ex delicto, the law of the place in which the fact said to infer liability occurred must be applied; and that will be so even although, in virtue of some public treaty, a foreign company had the management of the traffic in its hands.

NOTE Y ON §§ 295-297. CARRIERS' LIABILITY.

[The law of Scotland and England on this subject is the same. In the first place, "it is quite fixed," to use Lord Gifford's words in Horn v. N. B. Railway Co. 1878, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. v. 1055, "that a railway company who issues a through ticket undertakes the whole contract of carriage, although the journey involves passing over lines or even journeying in steamships which do not belong to the company issuing the ticket. . . . If 'goods' are lost or injured, the loss or damage must be made good by the company who undertook the through transit, wherever the actual loss or injury may have taken place." For the law of England, see Hodges on Railways, p. 620 et seq. This rule is the same as that applied in the case of two inland railway companies (Metzenburg v. Highland Railway Co. 1869, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. vii. 919). The rule as to the conveyance of passengers is the same as that as to goods (Lord Gifford, ut supra).

It may often be of importance to determine what is the law of the contract in such cases, with a view to determine, e.g. questions as to the legality of certain stipulations contained in the contract, these being lawful in country A, but forbidden in country B. This is quite a distinct question from that stated in the last paragraph. The law of the place of the contract, i.e. the place in which the contract was made, was at one time supposed to give the rule (Shand v. P. & O. Co. 1865, 3 Moore, P.C.N.S. 290, as explained by the Lord Justice Clerk Moncrieff (who had been of counsel for the pursuer in that case), in Horn v. N. B. Railway Co. cited supra). The doctrine established by more modern decisions (e.g. Cohen v. S. E. Railway Co. 1877, L. R. 2, Ex. D. 253, and Re Missouri S.S. Co. 1889, L. R. 42, Ch. Div. 321) seems to be that while, prima facie, the lex loci contractus will prevail, it is not always to rule, and preference will be given to the country with which the contract has a substantial connection, performance, like the execution of the documents and the domicile of parties, being an element for consideration. If there be anything, however, in the contract plainly immoral, and forbidden by positive law, effect will not be given to its provisions. Westlake, while approving of the results arrived at in these judgments, is of opinion that too much weight has been attached to the intention of parties, § 212.]

IV. CONTRACT OF INSURANCE.

§ 298. In this subject an application of the general principles which regulate the law of contracts gives as the following result: First, the contract is, in so far as the obligation of the insurer is concerned, subject to the law which prevails at the place where the insurance office is established, provided this office makes its contracts on general principles, published once for all, and does not work through agents established in a foreign country, who in making their contracts avail themselves of the language of that country, and never direct the attention of the policyholder distinctly to the law which prevails at the place where the company is established. No particular notice need be taken of contracts of insurance occasionally made by individuals as insurers or underwriters. The practice of England and that of the United States lay weight exclusively upon the consideration of the place in which the contract becomes binding in form, and it is therefore of importance to consider whether the contract becomes binding for the company by the agent's subscription, or only comes into force when it has been transmitted to the company's head office, and subscribed by the directors.¹ This is not in harmony with the requirements of bona fides in commercial intercourse.² A foreign insurance company, which retained agents in the German Empire, and issued its policies to German holders in the German language, without making any reference to its own law, which was different from that of Germany, could not, in my opinion, successfully appeal to any provisions of its own law which might be more favourable to it.³

³ Emérigon, Traité des Assur. i. c. 4, § 8, par. 2, says as to the local law of policies of insurance: "Contracts concluded abroad by one Frenchman with other Frenchmen will, in France, be judged by the law of France: for the law of their country will follow the parties all over the world. The law which prevails at the place in which the contract is made will, however, rule contracts of insurance made by a Frenchman with foreigners abroad. The same rule holds, if a Frenchman carries on the business of insurance on his own account abroad." These rules, however, are not universally applicable. If a man carries on the business of insurance, as generally happens, as his livelihood at some particular place, the lex loci contractus will be applied without any regard to the law of the insured's domicile. Voigt and Heinichen, Archiv. für Handelsrecht (1858), i. p. 210. If, on the other hand, two subjects of the same country conclude a contract of insurance by accident in a foreign country, the first rule laid down by Emérigon is sound.

Should the contract be null by the law of the insured, the insurer cannot for all that appeal to that law, since the law of his own domicile will, in accordance with what has been said, determine his liability.⁴ He may do so, however, so long as the first premium is not paid, since he has in that case the exceptio non adimpleti contractus. If the transaction is forbidden by the law of the policy-holder's domicile, and is also according to that law—although this does not necessarily in every case follow—null, of course no action for a premium can be raised in the courts of the country to which the insured belongs.⁵

In the second place, the contract can only be validly executed in point of form by satisfying the conditions of the lex loci actus, in cases in which the insured and the insurer are not both subject to the same law.

If any system of law forbids or declares to be null insurances in particular circumstances upon considerations of police, as, for example, the French commercial law does, in the case of insurance of maritime freight not yet earned, that does not necessarily import that such a contract of insurance will never receive effect or found action in a country where that prohibition is the law of the land. If the contract in the circumstances in which it was made truly belongs to another territory where it is permissible, and if some subsequent accident brings it to pass that it comes to be pleaded in a country where it is illegal, it must still remain effectual in this latter country, unless it can be maintained that according to the legal ideas which prevail there some positive violence would be done to the rules of morality or decency. That, as a rule, will not be the case. This distinction, which is quite in accord with the general principles we have already laid down, is of special importance in the law of insurance, and Lyon-Caen and Renault are right in calling attention to it (Dr. ch. ii. §§ 2090, 2091).⁶

NOTE Z ON § 298. INSURANCE CONTRACTS.

[To determine the question whether a contract of insurance is of one country or another, the policy having actually been taken out in one country through the hands of an agent of the company residing and trading there, and the company having its seat in another country, the cardinal point in Scotland has been held to be whether the agent had himself power to bind the company, or acted merely as its hand. If he had such power, then the contract belongs to the country in which he lived and traded; if not, the contract belongs to the country in which the company carries on business and has its head office. In Parken v. Royal Exchange Ass. Co. (1846, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. viii. p. 365), "the agent of the company in Edinburgh had no power to take and accept risks without reference to the head office," which was in London, and the company "determined on and accepted the same, the proposals being only transmitted by him with his own opinion as to the propriety of acceptance. On the other hand . . . the policy, when completed, was sent by the office in London to their agent here," i.e. in Edinburgh, "was delivered by him to the insured, and the premium paid simul ac semel" (Lord Justice Clerk). "The agent . . . had no power to complete insurances. He was a mere hand to transmit and to receive and deliver policies. What was delivered? An English contract, a policy granted by a company having its place of business in London, executed according to the forms of the law of England, and bearing no reference to any foreign locus solutionis, either of the premium or of the sum insured" (Lord Cockburn). The contract was accordingly held to be English.

On the other hand, in the case of St. Patrick Ass. Co. v. Brebner (1829, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. viii. p. 51), the company, an Irish company, employed agents in Scotland, advertising that their contracts commenced so soon as an order of insurance was accepted by one of their agents, and that all claims under the contract would be settled on the spot. This was held to make a contract concluded with an agent in Scotland, by a Scotsman, a Scots contract. To the same effect is the decision in the case of Albion Fire and Life Insurance Co. v. Mills (1828, 3 W. and S. 218), by the House of Lords. The insurance company then was established in England, but as Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst says: "Here is a contract entered into, not in London but in Glasgow, written in Glasgow, dated in Glasgow, and subscribed in Glasgow; the consideration paid in Glasgow at the office established, and for a long time established, in Glasgow. Why is it, then, to be said that that contract . . . was not a contract in Glasgow? If I send an agent to reside in Scotland, and he, in my name, enters into a contract in Scotland, the contract is to be considered as mine where it is actually made. It is not an English contract, because I actually reside in England." Accordingly the contract was held to be a Scots contract.

Again, in a case in which a foreign ship belonging to Nova Scotia was insured by her agents, who were domiciled Scots traders, with a Scots insurance company, for trade between Glasgow and Havanna, it was held that the standard of seaworthiness which was required by the policy was the Glasgow standard, and not that of Nova Scotia. The forum, the locus actus, and the domicile of both parties were here in Scotland. Cook v. Greenock Marine Insurance Company (1843, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. v. p. 1379). See below on maritime insurance.

The law of England seems to be that the contract of insurance is to be governed by the law of the place where its execution was completed, and it became a binding and operative contract, and not necessarily by the law of the place where it is dated. The case of the Albion Fire and Life Assurance Company, as a decision by the House of Lords, not depending on any special principles of Scots law, is of authority in England as well as in Scotland.]

V. LAW OF BILLS.

INTRODUCTORY. CAPACITY TO DRAW BILLS.

§ 299. The object of all traffic in bills is that the creditor shall receive a certain sum of money at a certain time, and generally at a certain place. But since the creditor may find it more profitable to receive this sum, or more correctly speaking, its equivalent, at some other place or some other time, he has the privilege given him of transferring his right in the bill absolutely to some other party, and getting his equivalent out of the consideration paid him. To attain these objects, which are not identical with those of a true paper currency, although they resemble them, the obligation in a bill consists of an accurately framed undertaking to pay a particular sum; and this undertaking, in contrast to the other legal relations which arise between the holder of a bill and the debtor, is visibly expressed in a written declaration of intention, and is governed by this expression of intention alone; but at the same time, just because the obligation of the debtor is so exactly defined, there is laid upon the holder, in order to preserve his privileges and to prevent them being lost, a series of obligations as to the diligence which he must use.¹ And lastly, to ensure prompt payment, a specially summary process is allowed against the debtor in the bill, and at one time there was even introduced a special kind of execution against his person.²

From all this we may deduce, with the help of the general principles which rule the law of obligations, the proper international theory of the law of bills.³

In the first place, we need not trouble ourselves further to investigate the proposition that capacity to undertake obligations by bill, must depend solely on the personal law of the person who is said to be under obligation, except in so far as it may be necessary to make an exception (as we noted supra, p. 314) in favour of a person contracting in bona fide, and of those who succeed him in his rights.⁴ The law of England, however, and

the law of the United States apply,⁵ on grounds we can well understand, the lex loci actus,⁶ but in addition modern legislation, following in this as well as in many other questions the model of the German statute on bills,⁷ exhibits an inclination to hold that a foreigner who binds himself in any country by a bill must submit to have his capacity to do so effectively determined by the law of the country where the obligation takes place.⁸ There is, no doubt, much to be said for a thoroughgoing application of the lex loci actus to rule capacity to undertake these obligations, such as prevails in the jurisprudence of England and in that of the United States, although it does not suit the circumstances of the Continent of Europe, and may, as intercourse goes on increasing, soon bring obvious disadvantages even to England and to the United States. On the one hand, however, the distinctions which fall to be made according to the 84th article of the German statute on bills, have an artificial character,⁹ and on the other hand, few people remember that this exceptional rule was only adopted at the well-known conference at Leipsic, the result of whose labours was this statute, after animated opposition, by ten votes against nine,¹⁰ i.e. by a bare majority. It would therefore need very serious consideration whether so debatable a paragraph could be generally introduced as an international rule without very thorough trial. The strict rule, the expediency of which is doubtful, will in truth, in general, be found to be of importance in the case of bills which are used to cover transactions which do not themselves court the light. All conceivable requirements are satisfied by the provision suggested by Norsa in his bill (art. 2 and 3) of public law, cannot have any operation beyond the frontiers of their own country. Lyon-Caen and Renault also say that no regard should be paid in France to incapacities, which are at variance with the droit public of France, e.g. to privileges de caste. That, however, is going too far, if the obligation is entered into in that person's own country.

⁷ Art. 84. "The capacity of a foreigner to undertake obligations by bill, will be determined by the law of the State to which he himself belongs. But a foreigner who by the law of his own country has not that capacity, will be bound by undertaking such obligations in this country, if by the law of this country he has capacity to do so.

⁸ See Hungarian Statute, 1876, § 95, Swedish Statute, § 84; Swiss Statute of Obligations, § 822; Servian Comm. Code, § 168 (J. xi. p. 168). See, too, Association for Reform and Codification (1877, at Antwerp), Rev. ix. p. 411; Institute for International Law (1885, Brussels), Annuaire, viii. p. 97; lastly, the Congress on commercial matters summoned in 1885 by the Belgian Government at Antwerp; see their proposals in § 2 of the actes du Congrès; all these authorities adopt this proposition.

⁹ Cf. judgment of the Supreme Court of Austria of 23rd February 1881 (Seuffert, xxxviii. § 92). It is there held, and we concur in the judgment, that the 84th article of the German Statute, which is law in Cis-Leithanian Austria, does not apply to bills undertaken by foreigners in a foreign country, which is not their native country. In such cases the personal law is the proper law to apply. It would thus appear that there is not to be a thoroughgoing application of the lex loci actus.

¹⁰ Protocols of the Conference, ed. by Thöl, p. 156.

proposed, with concurrence of the present author, at the conference of the Institute of International Law in 1883, viz.:—

“Art. 2. *A l'égard de ceux qui sont étrangers à la présente loi*¹¹ la capacité de s'engager par lettre de change ou billet à ordre est déterminée par la loi du pays auquel ils appartiennent.

“Art. 3. *Néanmoins, un étranger incapable de s'obliger par lettre de change ou billet à ordre d'après la loi de son pays, mais capable d'après la présente loi, peut,*¹² en ce qui concerne les actes de change passés dans le pays où cette loi est en vigueur, être considéré comme valablement obligé à l'égard du contractant bona fide et de ses cessionnaires.”¹³

§ 300. It was, of course, primarily intended, in drawing the 84th article of the German statute, to strike at all the special incapacities which many systems of legislation had set up in connection with obligations constituted by bill, although, in all other matters save bills, there was the most complete capacity.¹⁴

This was the only reason which could justify the restriction of the exceptional provision by which capacity for incurring obligations by bill is to be regulated by the lex loci actus—the rule of the 84th article of the German ordinance on bills—to subjects of States in which that ordinance was not recognised. In States in which it was recognised, the provisions of the first article, by which every one who can bind himself by any sort of contract, has capacity to do so by bill, must also be recognised, and all special incapacities are thus swept away. But the conception of the 84th article goes beyond this, probably because the distinction was not quite clearly apprehended. On the one hand, in the case of the subjects of those countries which have adopted the German statute, any incapacity for bills which exists by their personal law will be absolutely recognised in spite of the non-recognition of it by the lex loci actus, this incapacity being shown to rest upon some general, or, at least, more extensive incapacity for legal action, such as minority, or dependence on the head of the family,¹⁵ and in such matters there was no unanimity within the territory affected by the German statute, and, indeed, there is not even yet complete unanimity.¹⁶ But then, by this 84th article, a person who does not belong to these States, although by his own personal law he or she may be generally incapable of

¹² It would be better to say “doit,” or simply “est considéré.”

¹³ We find arts. 1 and 2 of the bill laid before the Antwerp Congress of 1885, by the Belgian Commission, in substantial conformity with this.

legal action (e.g. because by that law the age of majority is deferred, or because of the incapacity attaching to a married woman), will yet be treated as capable of undertaking obligations by bill, if this would be so by the lex loci actus.¹⁷ Such a provision as that is only tolerable in international intercourse—unless we are to recognise the doubtful principle, now specially adopted in the United States, that questions of capacity to act are to be determined solely by the lex loci actus—because the recognition and execution of foreign judgments have serious difficulties to encounter, or will in many cases be refused without a previous investigation of the judgment which it is proposed to carry into execution. In these circumstances the creditor, as a matter of fact, will generally be forced to bring his action in the forum domicilii of the alleged obligant, and the judge of the domicile will assuredly refuse to apply the foreign debatable rule of law, which is in flat contradiction to the rules of his own law, on this question of capacity. But, if we assume that judicial sentences will be capable of being executed in the countries in question, even if they have been pronounced against absent defenders in foro contractus, we should inevitably find ourselves in an intolerable position, where the rule as to the period of majority was different in those States, or where their law as to the obligations of married women or of children in family was different from our own. An extravagant ward, who was in want of money, would only need to sign bills to a usurer from a spot just over the frontier. The rule that none but the bona fide creditor and those who take from him should be protected, gives some security against such contemptuous evasion of the law. The conception of the German law, which, as is so often the case, has frequently been copied, simply because it contains some excellent provisions, is, however, faulty in another respect. In all reason, it is quite immaterial to consider whether the whole German statute on bills has been adopted in the State of the debtor; the question should be whether in that State the capacity to contract obligations by bills is simply a result of general incapacity to act, whether, that is to say, the special incapacities in the matter of bills have been removed, or have never been recognised there. But by the German statute the capacity of a Cis-Leithanian Austrian subject to bind himself by a bill will be determined by his lex domicilii, while the capacity of an Hungarian to do the same thing will on the contrary be determined by the lex loci actus, if the bill is drawn within the German Empire, although the Hungarian law of bills has precisely the same principle as to capacity, and, generally speaking, does not differ much from the German statute.¹⁸ Such a

¹⁸ The 1st and 2nd articles of the scheme laid before the Congress at Antwerp contained a sounder interpretation :—

“1. Toute personne appartenant à un pays soumis à la présente loi est capable de s'obliger par lettre de change ou billet à ordre lorsque, d'après sa loi nationale elle a la capacité ordinaire de s'obliger.

“2. La capacité des personnes n'appartenant pas à un des pays où la présente loi est en vigueur distinction will be altogether absurd, where there is a common statute on the law of bills covering a much larger territory, made up of different States, while within this territory the most diverse rules as to general capacity to act are recognised. The very fact that the State, to which the person who is alleged to have bound himself belongs, has entered such an union for the purposes of the law of bills, would be likely to lead any person not fully versed in law to the belief that all the material provisions as to capacity within the whole territory would be in substance identical. The fact, however, would be, that if, e.g. Spain should join the union, while Norway and Portugal held aloof, a Spaniard, undertaking the obligations of a bill within the territory of the union, might appeal to the fact that by the law of Spain he was still a minor, while Portuguese or Norwegians, who, as much as a Spaniard, are still minors at 24, could not do so. There would thus be a peculiar kind of statutory premium put upon adhesion to the union, if it should adopt the law of bills which prevails in the German Empire or in Austria. We should almost be reminded of the war of statutory tariffs which is so popular at the present day.

If, on the other hand, the theory adopted by the Institute for International Law, and by the Congress at Antwerp in 1885,¹⁹ is to be held to mean—as it seems to mean when read literally²⁰—that, even within the union of States with a common law of bills, capacity to bind oneself by bill in the way there described is to be held to be present or absent according to the deliverance of the lex loci actus; every one of the States that joins the union will open the door to an invasion of its own laws in a way hitherto unfamiliar upon the Continent of Europe. The upshot would be, that even the State to which a person incapable of contracting obligations by bill belonged, would be forced to regard him as possessed of that capacity so far as concerned any obligation undertaken by him in a foreign country, i.e. in some other State of the union, if he were so by the law of the place where he signed the bill. Up to this time, that is not the law either in the German Empire or in Austria. Art. 84 of the German est régie par leur loi nationale. Toutefois si elles contractent dans un de ces pays, elles peuvent être considérées comme valablement obligées à des tiers de bonne foi lorsque d'après leur loi nationale elles ont la capacité ordinaire de s'obliger."

This impractical hard and fast rule was adopted by only 24 votes against 20 at Antwerp. I would propose the following, viz.—

"Every one who can bind himself by any contract can do so by bill. It is immaterial whether or not a person had capacity to bind himself by bill, be that incapacity a result of a general incapacity to contract or not, if by the law of the place where the bill is issued the debtor had this capacity, and the person who sues on the bill or some predecessor of his in title was in good faith when he acquired the bill. Good faith is presumed."

²⁰ This question, so important in itself, and specially important for any union for the purposes of the law of bills yet to be created, was never stirred either in the Institute or at Antwerp. And yet it must have been made perfectly clear that the recognition of the lex loci actus, as a general principle for determining capacity which should receive reciprocal recognition, had a meaning entirely different from that which art. 84 of the German statute had for Germany.

statute was, so far as I am aware, recognised in so far as it was unfavourable to foreigners, but not so as to prejudice German subjects also. Nor can it be supposed that the consequences of such a doctrine in the law of bills will be trifling. By signing bills in an adjoining country while upon a journey, a married woman, a ward, or a child, could make themselves independent of husband, guardian, or father, in money matters, with very prejudicial results.

The theory, however, which is embodied in a judgment of the Supreme Court of Austria,²¹ whereby performance within the territory is placed in the same category as the undertaking of an obligation within the territory, is certainly mistaken. The validity of the lex loci actus rests simply upon the view that the other party to the contract, or one who subsequently acquires the bill, shall not incur loss by the existence of any incapacity in the debtor which may easily remain unknown. It does not rest on any theory that the person who proposes to become bound may subject himself to any foreign law he pleases, by stipulating at his pleasure for this or that place of performance. The resolutions of the Institute and of the Antwerp Congress are both opposed to this latter idea.²²

§ 301. The security of any one who acquires the bill is besides, in spite of the rule adopted by the Institute and by the Congress of Antwerp, by no means so great as might at first sight be supposed, unless this further rule is recognised, viz. that the place, from which the obligant in the bill dates his obligation, shall be recognised as his domicile, and that the place so specified shall determine what local law is to be applied, unless of course some declaration to the contrary is appended to the bill. Judgments of the old Supreme Court of Prussia, and of the Supreme Commercial Court of the Empire,²³ have rejected this rule, partly on special grounds which are applicable only to the German statute, but partly from the consideration that provisions as to capacity to act, and particularly as to capacity to contract, are absolute provisions, which cannot be excluded by the intention of parties, or be restricted as parties may arrange. This latter ground must be recognised, if the rule is to be regarded as unconditional, and not dependent upon the bona fides of the creditor in the bill.

It would in truth be absurd if a person, who by his personal law had ²¹ Judgment of the 24th Jan. 1866. See, Borchardt on art. 84. On the other hand, see the Austrian judgments of 1875, reported in J. v. p. 287.

“Art. 1. Est capable de s'obliger par lettre de change ou par billet à ordre quiconque est capable de s'obliger par contrat.”

“Art. 2. L'étranger incapable de s'obliger par lettre de change ou par billet à ordre, en vertu de la loi de son pays, mais capable d'après la loi du pays où il appose sa signature sur la lettre de change ou le billet à ordre, ne peut pas invoquer son incapacité pour se soustraire à ses obligations.”

The words “civilement ou commercialement” are inserted at the end of art. 1, instead of “par contrat” in the last edition of the proposal.

²³ See Supreme Ct. of Comm. 3rd May 1878 (Seuffert, xxxiv. § 238).

no capacity so to bind himself, could withdraw himself from the operation of this incapacity by simply choosing some other place as the place for the issue of the bill. But it is far from absurd to hold that the litera scripta shall have this effect in favour of a bona fide holder of the bill and the rights contained in it.²⁴ The principle of regarding nothing but the bona fides of the person who acquires the bill guarantees a wider security, whereas the principle of accepting rules of capacity absolutely according to the lex loci actus makes it impossible to have any such security, which is so essential to the despatch of commercial dealings.

In so far, however, as the personal law of the obligant is to determine the capacity of that person to undertake obligations by bill, we must hold it to be quite immaterial on what grounds the personal law rests the incapacity. It is purely arbitrary, for instance, to distinguish between incapacity which is based on political considerations, and incapacity which is based on non-political considerations, and leads to further doubts and uncertainties.²⁵ In such cases we shall, again, be much more likely to arrive at an equitable result by holding that no such incapacities can be pleaded against a bona fide holder if the obligation has been undertaken in a foreign country.

This principle of *bona fides*²⁶ is all the more to be recommended because it may be admitted, even by that State by whose laws the obligant would be incapable of contracting such obligations, without giving too much countenance to evasions of its own law, that, if bona fides is taken as the guiding principle, there will be all the less risk of divergence in the judgments of the courts on questions as to the various obligations involved in bills, a divergence which may have very serious consequences for the parties interested (see supra, § 142, p. 314).

²⁴ By far the greater part of the obligations in a bill are undertaken at the debtor's domicile, and this the endorsee may assume to be the case. But Brackenhöfft goes too far when he maintains (p. 139) that the place which the bill states to be the place where its obligations are to be undertaken is really to be so considered in all circumstances. The parties cannot by the terms of their contract withdraw themselves from the operation of the local law. The following cases may be noticed here: A merchant sends to his correspondent in London blank bill forms, merely signed by him, and dated from Ireland, that the correspondent may fill in the name of the drawee, the sum, the place of payment, and the date of issue: these bills will be held to have been drawn in Ireland (Story, § 289). Again, a bill was drawn in Manchester upon a firm established in Boston, and was accepted by a member of the firm then in Manchester in name of his firm. The court held, without any question as to the capacity of the person to draw bills or accept them being raised, that the bill must be treated as if accepted in Boston, and that the diligence done upon the bill in accordance with the law of that place was in order (Story, § 319). [Snaith v. Mingay, 1 Maule v. Selwyn, 87; and Grimshaw v. Bender, 6 Mass. 157.]

²⁶ The principle of bona fides came, however, with something like a shock on Herr Jitta from Amsterdam. The simple question, "Pourquoi le législateur, en posant des règles, tiendrait-il compte de la bonne ou mauvaise foi des contractants?" was sufficient to induce him, and apparently the majority of the Congress at Antwerp, to reject the principle of bona fides. The debates of a congress do not always tend to improve the proposal originally laid before it.

FORM OF BILLS.

§ 302. There is no question that, as far as the form of the bill and its transmissions are concerned, the rule "locus regit actum" must be recognised. The obligation contained in the bill is validly undertaken if it is in conformity with the law recognised at the place where the declaration of liability is made.²⁷

But in this connection, again, the rule "locus regit actum" has no more than a permissive force.²⁸ Thus, for instance, in the German statute, art. 85, subsec. 3, it is expressly recognised that bills, used by a German as a means of putting himself under obligation to another German in a foreign country, have legal effect as bills, although they satisfy the requirements of German law only.²⁹ But we may go still further. Since the obligation incurred by a bill is an unilateral obligation, it can never be of any consequence to enquire what is the nationality of the creditor, or of the indorsee,³⁰ and it is obvious that the security of commercial dealings in bills takes nothing but advantage from this circumstance being left out of account. Doubts, however, may very easily arise as to the intention of a person to bind himself by a bill, if the obligation is according to the requirements of his personal law, and that law requires fewer forms than the lex loci actus. Again, just as there may be cases in other departments of law, in which the personal law of the parties has nothing to say to the regulation of the obligation (except in so far as questions of capacity to act may be involved), so in the law of bills there must also be cases of that description, and there, as much as in other cases, it will be quite out of the question to submit the form of the obligation to the test of the personal

²⁷ Story, § 360; Massé, p. 143; Fiore, § 345; Esperson, § 13; Wharton, § 448; Weiss, p. 816; Lyon-Caen et Renault, Dr. c. i. § 1313. For instance, a bill drawn in the German Empire, which does not bear to be for value received, is nevertheless valid in France [where such a declaration is necessary]. It is the same with regard to "remise de place en place." Conversely, a bill drawn in the German Empire, which does not contain the word "bill," will not be regarded as a bill in France, in respect of the provisions of German law [which require the use of this word]. The following are important divergences in the rules as to bills: According to the Code de Commerce, art. 110, 137, 138, the original bill and all indorsements must bear to be for value: that is not necessary by the Deutsche Wechselordnung (cf. Hoffmann, p. 179). By English law bills may be made payable to bearer, but not so by German law: and again, the law of England does not require the specification of any date or of the place of issue or of payment. German, Scandinavian, and Swiss law make the use of the word "bill" [or an equivalent, Imp. Ct. at Colmar, 14th June 1881, J. ix. p. 332] absolutely essential to the validity of the document: by French, Belgian, English, and American law it is not indispensable. (See Weiss, ut cit.)

²⁸ Cf. Fiore, Esperson, Weiss, etc.

²⁹ See the general provision in the preliminary article 9 of the Italian Code. That the rule "locus regit actum" should have no more than a permissive force is, as Esperson rightly notices, of practical advantage in commercial intercourse. A man who desires to undertake such an obligation will not always have time to inform himself as to the "lex loci actus."

³⁰ In this sense, see Esperson, § 17.

law of the obligant.³¹ Accordingly,³² it is a safe rule for creditors in bills always to require that the lex loci actus should be observed.³³ But if there is to be legislation on the subject, we might recommend this simple formula, which puts all subtleties aside, viz. :—

“It is enough for the validity of any obligation contained in a bill, in so far as form is concerned, that the law of the place where the declaration of obligation under the bill is given should be observed.”

But it is immaterial to the international recognition of the form of a bill to consider what the grounds are on which the legislature of any country has prescribed this or that particular form. If a system of law, as the English does, makes the want of a stamp operate as a nullity, this defect, like any other defect of form, must be respected abroad.³⁴ It is not enough to justify a disregard of any such rule that its object is purely fiscal, as we have already demonstrated on principles of much more general application. It is another matter altogether, whether the system adopted by a number of other legislatures, e.g. that of Germany, by which the only result of the want of a stamp is a penalty, is or is not preferable. The Congress at Antwerp in 1885 very properly held that it was.

LEGAL RELATION OF THE DIFFERENT OBLIGATIONS ON A BILL UNDERTAKEN IN DIFFERENT TERRITORIES, IN SO FAR AS FORM IS CONCERNED.

§ 303. If we test each separate obligation connected with the bill by the lex loci actus, it follows that an acceptance, or an indorsement,³⁵ may be validly appended in this country to a bill which by the law of this

³² In the case of bill obligations, issued by a trading firm or trading establishment through its manager, the law of the place of the firm or establishment must be recognised as the law that may, if the party so chooses, be used.

country would be bad from some defect of form (e.g. because it does not contain the words, "bill of exchange" [wechsel], which are required by the (German statute), if only it is valid by the law of the place where it was issued. But again, on the other hand, the acceptance or the indorsement of a bill made in this country is valid, so far as form is concerned, although the bill itself does not satisfy the forms required by the law of the place of issue, if only it does satisfy the conditions required by the law of this country.³⁶ For the acceptor binds himself unconditionally for payment of the sum in the bill, and the indorser binds himself in the event of the acceptor's failure to pay: that being so, we cannot, on the one hand, take into account the fact that the debtor may or may not have a right of recourse or of indemnity, nor can we take into account the reason why the prior obligant does not pay, and that reason may be that the principal debtor in the bill has not validly bound himself.³⁷

SUBSTANTIVE IMPORT OF THE DIFFERENT OBLIGATIONS ON BILLS. EXTENT OF THESE OBLIGATIONS. CONDITIONS OF RECOURSE (PROTEST. NOTICE OF DISHONOUR).

§ 304. In considering the substantive import of the different obligations

³⁶ D. W. O. art. 85, par. 2: "If, however, the foreign bill, or its transmissions made abroad, satisfy the requirements of our law, no plea can be taken against indorsements subsequently made upon the bill in this country on the ground that the original bill, or previous indorsements, were defective by foreign law." Judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 17th June 1858 (Striethorst, 28, p. 361; Borchardt, p. 241): "A foreign bill, in conformity with foreign laws, is to be treated like a good inland bill; and all further operations upon it, such as indorsation done in this country, are to be ruled by the law of this country." See, too, the other judgments of German courts given by Borchardt.

The Bills of Exchange Act [45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 72, (1) (b.): "Where a bill issued out of the United Kingdom conforms, as regards requisites in form, to the law of the United Kingdom it may, for the purpose of enforcing payment thereof, be treated as valid as between all persons who negotiate, hold, or become parties to it in the United Kingdom."

³⁷ The rules laid down with reference to assignation will apply so as to regulate the liabilities of the obligant in a bill to pay upon an indorsement that has been made abroad, and conversely, his release by paying upon such an indorsement. Thus the obligant must pay if the indorsement is valid by the law of the place to which it, as a separate legal transaction, is subject; and in such a case we have no concern with the law of the place of payment (cf. Borchardt on art. 85 of the German statute, and Imperial Court of Commerce, 11th May 1872, Dec. vi. p. 125). But the debtor is also discharged if he pays in bona fide upon an indorsement which would transmit to the indorsee the right to the bill according to the law that regulates his (the debtor's) obligations under the bill. Cf. too, Story, §§ 316*a* 353*c*. If a bill is issued and is payable in a country in which, as is the case in England and Germany, blank indorsements are good, but the bill is afterwards blank indorsed in some other country in which a blank indorsement does not operate as an indorsement, the person to whom the bill is directly transferred by that blank indorsement cannot sue the acceptor or the drawer: but a person who can plead a subsequent blank indorsement valid by the lex loci actus, can so sue, for the person who has bona fide acquired the bill by this subsequent indorsement, is creditor in it, and there may have been quite a valid assignation of the bill in spite of the intervention of the invalid indorsement in blank (see Fiore, § 349). Different indorsations made in the same form may have the effect of a mere assignation in the one case, but of a real indorsation in the other.

on a bill, we may for simplicity's sake assume the case to be, as it generally is, one in which the place in which the obligation is undertaken is also the domicile of the obligant. We shall, before concluding, deal with the case of these being two different places.

Although the older jurists³⁸ held the view that the obligations on a bill are subject to the law of the place of performance, i.e. the place of payment provided in the bill, we may now regard this view as abandoned. The prevailing theory now is that the law of the place at which each obligation is undertaken will regulate it.³⁹

The law of the place of payment will regulate no more than the particular fashion in which payment is to be made, just as in other contracts the usage and therefore the law of the place of payment must always ex necessitate rei have this effect. It is obvious that no man of business can be compelled to pay outside his ordinary local business hours or upon a local holiday. It is part of the same rule that one cannot compel payment forthwith, if that be contrary to the law of the place of payment, but must allow the ordinary days of grace which are recognised there.⁴⁰ In the same way we must hold that, if a particular day in the calendar is appointed for payment, that day must be ascertained by the calendar which is recognised at the place of payment,⁴¹ and that where there are different coinages, going by the same name, those which are current at the place of payment are those that are intended, in the absence of express provision to the contrary.⁴² In so far as the question of coinage is concerned, our

⁴² See Massé, § 610. If at the place of payment there is no legal or customary currency such as is specified, then in doubt the currency of the drawer's domicile is held to be intended. If there is no special provision made for payment in coinage of a particular denomination (e.g. sovereigns), the debtor can always discharge his obligation if he pays the value of the foreign coinage in his own currency. But, if there is such a special provision, the creditor can, according to the sound view, demand payment in that currency, although it be foreign. He may have a special interest to do so, e.g. if he is on a journey, and the acceptor on the other hand should consider before he accepts whether he is in a position to furnish that kind of money. No difference is made on this rule by a law giving a forced currency to paper money conclusion is the result of the history of the law of bills, for the holder of the bill was originally a person who desired to be supplied with the money which was in circulation at the place of payment. As regards the calendar, we must start with this consideration, that the person who issues the bill imposes its conditions, and these he must express in the way in which they will be most easily understood at the place of payment. That is effected by fixing the day of payment according to the calendar that is in use at the place of payment.⁴³ The matter stands otherwise if the day of payment is fixed at the expiration of a particular period from the date of the bill. The date is the day on which the bill is truly completed, not the day, which is described by the same title in another calendar, but is, of course, a different day altogether.⁴⁴

§ 305. For the rest, we must remember that the person who draws the bill is its author. His law must therefore be the primary rule in determining the extent and the conditions of the obligation. Just as he may make express provision, that, e.g. a bill drawn on sight must be presented for payment within a certain time, he may effect the same thing by the simple fact of drawing it in accordance with his own law.⁴⁵ The acceptor cannot in any case assume the obligation which has been formulated by the drawer to any greater extent or under any other conditions than those which are already prescribed for it by the law of the drawer himself. But it is just as impossible to hold that the drawer, the principal obligant, or bank notes within any particular country, unless it expressly limits the freedom of contract in this matter (so Esperson, p. 104, and Italian practice, J. ix. p. 284. To the opposite effect Borchardt). Even in the event of such a limitation on the freedom of contract it is not held to apply, unless something more is said, to foreign currency or to bill drawn in another country, which speak of a foreign currency. [Thus it was held by the Trib. comm. de Marseilles, 7th Nov. 1871, that the holder of a bill payable in France was bound to accept payment in notes of the Bank of France, having at the time a forced currency, and that although the bill bore that payment is to be in gold, there being no separate and special agreement to that effect.]

⁴³ German practice hitherto has followed this rule. See Borchardt on art. 34 of the German statute.

⁴⁴ See art. 34 of the German statute.

⁴⁵ The provision of the 31st article of the German statute, viz. "A bill drawn on sight is due on presentation. To avoid the loss of the right of summary recourse against the indorsees and the drawer, a bill of this kind must be presented according to any directions that the bill itself may contain, and in the absence of such directions within two years after its issue," is applicable only to inland bills, and not to bills drawn on this country from some place abroad. Cf. Thöl, Protokolle, pp. 44-47, and Esperson, § 27. The law of France makes provision for the converse case as well (see Code de Comm. § 160, law of 3rd May 1862). The limitation of the German law, however, seems to be more sound. A conflict may arise where two systems of law, that of the drawer and that of the place of payment, both make provisions to meet the case of bills drawn from this country on some place abroad, and those drawn on this country from abroad. Such a conflict finds its solution in this—that the drawer can only appeal to his own law, as can also the indorser, who lives in the country to which the drawer belongs; whereas an indorser who lives in the country where payment is to be made can always claim the shorter of the two periods provided by the two systems of law; and an indorser who lives in a third country, again, can only plead the law of the place of issue, unless his own system of law gives him more favourable terms.

desired to bind himself to any greater extent or on any other conditions than those which are known to his own law.⁴⁶ The acceptor can always, therefore, plead either the law of the drawer or his own law to show that the conditions necessary to his being bound are not present. But he cannot plead that the obligation of the drawer is not good; for although the drawer formulates generally the extent and the conditions of the obligation, the shape into which he has thrown the obligation is not adopted by the other obligants on the bill on the footing only that the drawer has validly bound himself. On the other hand, the important matter for the person, to whom the drawer hands the bill, is not the obligation of the drawee—(and indeed most systems of law do not require any antecedent presentation for acceptance, except in the case of bills payable at a certain date after sight)—but the fact of payment. Thus considerations which entitle the acceptor to discharge are not, apart from the fact of payment itself, available for the discharge of the drawer also, in so far as the drawer by delivery of the bill has guaranteed payment of it.

§ 306. Those who take part in the further circulation of the bill transfer⁴⁷ (a) the claim against the acceptor, to the extent to which this exists by his own law and by that of the drawer: (b) the cautionary obligation of the drawer which we have described: and (c) every person taking part in the circulation adds a further cautionary obligation in terms of his own law,⁴⁸ but in terms of that law only. (The effects of indorsation after the bill is due, and the effects of indorsation upon dishonoured bills, are in the same way to be determined by the law of the place where each such obligation is incurred, as Pöhls has well remarked.) Such indorsement has always the effect of an assignation, but, it may be, only of an assignation of a claim under the bill against the acceptor (see German statute, art. 16); and if the indorsation, e.g. as being a blank indorsation, should happen not to bind the indorser by the usual bill obligations, according to the law of the country where the indorsation takes place, still it is not permissible for the acceptor or the drawer, as the case may be, to appeal to any such invalidity in a question with the indorsee, or any one who follows him; the claims against these persons, the acceptor and the drawer, follow their own laws. A further result of this principle is that the conditions of recourse against each debtor on the bill are to be determined by his own law, and thus, as a general rule, by the law of the place where each obligation is undertaken. This is in truth the theory which now prevails,⁴⁹ and it must by logical necessity be extended to questions of the necessity of taking a protest on the bill (e.g. against particular contingent obligants).⁵⁰ The same law must determine the question whether several obligants can be sued at once, whether recourse can be had only according to the order of the indorsations, or may be followed out in any order,⁵¹ and must also settle what is timeous notice of dishonour.⁵² There

⁴⁷ If, by the law of the place where the paper is issued, it is transferable by indorsation, it can be validly so transferred in a country, by the laws of which it would not be so indorsable. See Phillimore, § 850, and the decisions reported there.

Code for Württemberg, § 1003; Rehbein, p. 6, on art. 86 of the German statute; Thöl, Wechselr. 4th ed. § 16, iv.; Imp. Ct. (i.) 28th February 1882 (Dec. ix. p. 438). See Asser-Rivier, § 106; Weiss, p. 821. But yet it is not made quite clear by many authors, whether in their view it is sufficient, if the holder of the bill observes the law of the place of issue, as Fiore, § 359, thinks. Esperson, § 33, expressly declares this to be so. But this is illogical, if, with Fiore and Esperson, we are to hold that the law of each one who takes part in the circulation of a bill will determine questions as to the prescription of his right of recourse. The true view is adopted by the Supreme Court of Commerce, 1st February 1876 (Dec. xix. p. 203); and the Supreme Court of Berlin, 9th May 1857 (Striethorst, Archiv. xxiv. p. 294); and in a particularly precise form by Story ut cit.

⁵² Theories are perhaps most divided on the subject of notification. See the various decisions in Borchardt. Many authorities are inclined, since the holder of the bill may often be unable to inform himself quickly enough as to the law which rules at the domicile of the person who is liable to recourse, to allow the law of the domicile of the person who takes recourse against him to rule. See Thesis v. § 2, of the Institute for International Law: "Les avis à donner aux garants pour la conservation des droits de recours dans le cas de défaut d'acceptation ou de paiement et les délais pour les notifier, sont régis par la loi du lieu d'on ces avis doivent être envoyés." This is, however, illogical, and, if there is to be legislation on the subject, it would be better that the law of the place of issue should be declared to be regulative of this matter also. If a foreigner who claims recourse has redeemed the bill from some posterior indorsee, although he might have successfully maintained against him in accordance with foreign law that there had been no sufficient notice of dishonour, an indorser in this country may appeal to that transaction to establish that in law there is no recourse against him. Cf. Rehbein, on art. 86 of the German statute. The distinction taken by Salpius (Zeitschrift für das gesamte Handelsr. xix. p. 60), in reliance on the English practice, which on the subject of bills is not specially clear or logical, can scarcely be considered tenable. He thinks that the necessity of notice of dishonour should in itself be determined by the law of the person to whom the notice should be given, while the form should be regulated by the law of the place from which the notice proceeds; to the head of "form" he thinks that the period of notice belongs. This is, however, an erroneous application of the rule "locus regit actum." As the point in question relates to bringing something to the knowledge of a person, in is no need to refute over again the opposite view, by which the law of the court is to decide; this can only be justified on the principle that the lex fori must always be applicable unless that law itself expressly provides that some other law shall apply.⁵³ We need only notice that, since the place of the court and the domicile of the person against whom the claim is made generally coincide, this theory will in its results as a rule harmonise with our own theory.

The theory which holds that the law of the place of payment must regulate the obligations of all who are liable on the bill has more to say for itself.⁵⁴ Against the assumption of an universal subjection of all the obligants on the bill to the law of the place of payment, an assumption which we have already combatted, we must plead that the importance of the solemnities required to found a right of recourse lies in reality in this, that the person against whom recourse is to be had need only pay, if he is provided with summary evidence and immediate intimation of the fact that the contents of the bill have been demanded in vain from the principal debtor, and that, therefore, the solemnities in discussion here are of no importance with reference to the obligation against the drawee (or, as it may be in some bills, the maker), and can consequently have no connection with the law of his domicile. It may be said with some force, however, that the different obligants on a bill are in a manner tied up together,⁵⁵ and that the later obligant would not take the bill and hand it on with his guarantee on it, unless he had the right of recourse against certain specified prior obligants. This natural expectation may be deceived if this right of recourse is already excluded by the law which governs the obligation of the prior obligant, while he himself must be content to incur that liability according to the law of his obligation. Of course, this danger is materially diminished by the leading principle that as regards the form, the place,⁵⁶ the eye of the law the notice is given, not at the place where he who gives the notice is, but where he who is to receive it is. The rule "locus regit actum" leads to the same result as the simple proposition that notice, in so far as it is necessary, is a condition precedent of the obligation of the obligant under the bill. For this strict rule see in particular Fick, Ueber Intern. Wechselr. pp. 28 and 86.

Cf. Renaud, Wechselrecht, p. 72, note 5; Günther, pp. 742, 743; Heise's Handelsrecht (Frankfurt, A. M. 1858), p. 222. Judgment of the Supreme Court at Kiel, 5th February 1848 (Seuffert, 6, pp. 161, 162).

The French theory (art. 160 of the Code of Commerce) is quite untenable. In its present form it subjects bills payable in France, as well as bills drawn in France on a foreign country, to French law. See, against this, Lyon-Caen et Renault, Dr. c. 1, § 1319.

⁵⁶ By "place," of course, we mean the particular locality, i.e. the dwelling-house or place of business of the debtor.

and the time of making a protest, the rule "locus regit actum" is applicable: and that thus the form, the place, and the time of taking a protest are regulated by the law of the place in which that act must be done, i.e. by the law of the place of payment.⁵⁷

FORM AND PERIOD FOR TAKING A PROTEST.

§ 307. It follows from the fact that a protest upon a bill is a public instrument, and that this instrument obtains faith with the public by being executed by some official or notary under the rules of his own law exclusively, as the rule "locus regit actum" requires, that the form of the protest must be determined by the law of the place where it is taken. As the protest shows that payment has been demanded at the proper place from the principal obligant—that is, the acceptor, or in certain circumstances the maker, of a bill—it follows that the law of the country in which the protest must be made, determines the particular locality where it is to be made. But that law by which parties intended that payment should be regulated is the only law that can determine whether application for payment was made to the principal debtor opportuno loco.⁵⁸ Lastly, the period within which a protest must be taken is dependent upon the law recognised at the place where it is taken, because the real question here is one as to whether the demand is made opportuno tempore. For instance, a very short period for protest indirectly forces the holder of the bill to more abrupt procedure against the drawee. An extraordinarily long period of protest may, as we shall see, involve a prolongation of the guarantee of the intermediate obligants.

If the conditions of recourse against the different beneficiaries are different, the hardship remains that this or that obligant is made liable, although he may be denied to a greater or less extent recourse against prior obligants, the alternative to this hardship being that the holder of the bill should in such a case be denied recourse. The former alternative seems to be more in accordance with positive law and with the historical development of the law of bills, and it is probably predominant in practice. Still, in regarding the matter from the point of view of positive legislative regulation, there is much to recommend the subjection of all the obligants to a common law, but that law should be the law of the drawer, and not, as older theories put it, the law of the place of payment. Accordingly, the provision of the 4th Thesis of the Institute of International Law is:—

⁵⁸ The right and title to demand payment from the obligant, and therefore to take a protest, are determined by this law, i.e. by the law of the place of protest. Imperial Court (ii.) 20th February 1885. Bolze, Praxis, i. § 38, p. 9.

“Les obligations du porteur au point de vue de la présentation pour l'acceptation et pour le paiement sont fixées par la loi du pays où a été émis la lettre de change ou le billet à ordre.”

PREScriptions OF ACTIONS ON BILLS.

§ 308. Another logical result, and one that is in accordance with prevailing theories, is that the prescription of the right of action⁵⁹ against each obligant shall be determined, not by the law of the place of payment, but exclusively by the law which in other respects regulates each separate obligation;⁶⁰ and thus, if we shall assume that the domicile of the obligant and the place where each separate obligation is undertaken are identical, the ruling law will be the law of each particular declaration of liability. Here too, of course, we stumble again upon the hardship that sometimes a posterior obligant will have to meet the bill, although he has already lost all further right of recourse against those who have preceded him by the operation of their law. This hardship will no doubt occur less frequently than in the case where different systems of law applicable to the necessity of protests and notices of dishonour give different deliverances on the subject. To avoid these hardships, Thesis vii. of the Institute of International Law, after providing in subsec. 1:—

proceeds to provide in subsec. 2:—

Toutefois, à l'égard des endorseurs et des autres garants, ces délais ne peuvent jamais dépasser celui qui est établi pour l'exercice de l'action en recours contre le tireur.”

Thus an indorser, against whom a claim of recourse is made, may take ⁵⁹ Of course, those authorities, who subject all cases of prescription to the lex fori, apply that rule to the present case also. See, on the other hand, in particular, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, 26th February 1861 (Seuffert, xiv. § 108).

⁶⁰ Renaud, Wechselr. § 8, note 29; O. Wächter, Wechselr. des deutschen Reichs, § 9, note 25; Supreme Court at Stuttgart, 1st July 1852 (Seuffert, vi. No. 1); Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck 31st January 1857 (Seuffert, xiii. § 5); again, 26th February 1861 (Seuffert, xiv. § 108); Nürnberg, 30th December 1868 (Borchardt, p. 842); Imperial Court (iii.) 17th January 1882 (Seuffert, xxxviii. § 53 and Dec. Imperial Court (vi.) § 5, p. 25). “Prescription of bills is, like prescriptions generally, not a matter of the law of process, but a substantive ground for discharge of the obligation. The consequence is that it is to be regulated by the local law which governs the obligation generally.” The court draws from this proposition the inference, based on Savigny's theory of performance, which in our view is very debatable, that in the case of a domiciled bill the law of prescription in a question with the acceptor is to be supplied by the law of the place of payment.

the objection that the action, which ought properly to be open to him against all prior obligants, has become useless or incompetent against the drawer, by reason of prescription. But that is only a half measure, and illogical in its logicity: for it will frequently be the case that the motive for acquiring and for passing on the bill will be found⁶¹ to be the credit of some prior indorser, e.g. a bank, rather than the credit of the drawer, who may be quite unknown to the obligant farther on in the circle. Perhaps the better course would be to refuse all right of recourse on the objection of the person who is called to account, if the holder is not in a position to bring a similar action against all the prior obligants, but to apply this rule only in cases in which some blame can be imputed to him in the matter.

INTEREST IN RESPECT OF DELAY. RE-EXCHANGE. RE-DRAFTS OR CROSS-BILLS.

§ 309. By logical necessity it follows that the law of the place of payment should alone be held to regulate⁶² the rate of interest for delay, which the holder of the bill can demand from the acceptor and from all those who have guaranteed the payment. That the law of the place of payment must decide, follows from the consideration that it is at this place that the creditor is being kept out of his money (see supra, § 264). The opposite theory⁶³ adopted, for instance, by Fiore, § 353, rests on the consideration that each of the obligants concludes a bargain for himself which is to be implemented by him at his domicile, leaving out of view the fact that this bargain is simply a guarantee for the due performance of another obligation, viz. that of the drawee. It would better support this view to urge that the holder of a bill, by drawing a cross-bill or re-draft on the prior obligant, can at once supply himself with the money at the place of payment, or the place at which he himself, as liable in course, makes his payment. For, in this case, the true question would be a question of exchange as on bills drawn from the place in which the person claiming recourse is, upon the place in which the person liable in recourse is to be found. Such a determination on the question of interest, including too the expenses of brokerage or commission, as these are ascertained by the law of the person liable in recourse, makes the matter much simpler for the court in which the matter comes up for decision. It will be found to be quite natural that, in defiance of strict logic, the German statute, for instance, should propose to regulate the law on this matter, for all persons liable in recourse, who are found within its own territory, but should not interfere with questions of recourse against foreign localities.

⁶¹ See Fiore, § 360; Norsa, Rev. viii. pp. 466, 467. One cannot agree with Esperson, § 35 ad fin. that the right of action against a guarantor of the bill is subject to the law which regulates prescription in so far as the principal debtor is concerned: all the less can this be the case that in truth a completely independent obligation is undertaken by the new signature. Thöl, Handelsrecht, ii. § 144.

⁶² So Pardessus, § 1560; Esperson, § 42 (p. 75).

The law of each obligant must determine whether or not it is competent to accumulate re-exchanges against him. It would, however, be going too far to hold that one of the subsidiary obligants e.g. must have intended to subject himself to this enlargement of his responsibility, which in certain circumstances may be serious, because the drawer is subject to it according to his law.

EXTRA-TERRITORIAL EFFECT OF LETTERS OF GRACE (Moratorien). THE FRENCH LAWS AND DECREES DURING THE WAR OF 1870-71.

§ 310. What are we to say of the obligation of foreign debtors in bills, when the law of the place of payment gives a period of grace (moratorium), with immediate operation upon current bills, to such debtors, and in particular to acceptors, the bills in which they are concerned being issued and in the circle?

This question gave rise to a considerable number of interesting writings,⁶⁴ on the occasion of the enactment by the French Government, during the war of 1870-71, of letters and decrees of grace applicable to commercial and negotiable securities and paper. These enactments either gave the debtors in bills a longer period for payment, or (for opinions differ on the effect of them) delayed the date of protestation, so that a protest could not be taken before the specified periods had run out. If we suppose, in accordance with an authoritative judgment of the Supreme Commercial Court of the German Bund, of 21st February 1871,⁶⁵ that these periods thus provided by French law are periods for payment, still there can be no doubt that they had no power to prolong the endurance of the liability of subsidiary obligants, drawers, or indorsers, who were not subject to the law of France.

That decision, which is perfectly sound, proceeds thus: "The bill provides that it shall fall due at a specified time. The obligation is that ⁶⁴ See Goldschmidt's careful review of the literature of the subject in his treatise on commercial law, vol. xvii. pp. 294-309, and xviii. pp. 625-643. Specially worthy of perusal, too, are Norsa's Sul conflitto internazionale delle leggi cambiarie, Milan 1871, and Rev. viii. p. 470. Henir. payment shall be made at that very period. The guarantee undertaken by the other obligants is for a day certain; it binds them to see that payment is made upon the day fixed in the bill. Neither drawer nor indorser undertakes any obligation as to payment after this time. They are not responsible for possible changes in the position of the acceptor after the bill is due." A just inference is drawn from the mutual independence of each obligation in the bill as regards legal validity, to the effect that, as time granted voluntarily by some indorsers to an acceptor does not affect other indorsers, so the compulsory prorogation prescribed by the statute will not affect any one save the indorsers who are subject to that statute.⁶⁶

The question was not, of course, one as to the usual days of grace or periods for protestation, which are beyond all doubt to be ruled by the law of the place of payment.⁶⁷ The extent of the periods allowed by the French Government put them on quite another footing.⁶⁸ In the ordinary case the periods, which are to be ruled by the law of the place of payment, exist, as Jaques (p. 17) appositely remarks, merely to provide a convenient means of disposing of formal delays and impediments. The line between these cases and a postponement of the time at which a bill shall fall due obtrudes itself beyond all possibility of mistake, when the purpose is not merely to smooth away formal difficulties, but really to give the acceptor time for payment. It is merely playing with words to say that days of grace may just as well last for seven or eleven months as for two to ten days.⁶⁹ If, lastly, we say that the French measures import a prohibition

⁶⁶ See Norsa, Conflitto, p. 111; Jaques, p. 19. The judgment of the Commercial Court of Zürich of 22nd May 1871 (especially p. 121) stands on the same footing as that of the court of the German Bund. Munzinger, Niggeler, Ladenburg, Cambon, van Raalte, etc., have pronounced opinions substantially different from the view taken by that court; on the other hand, Kist, Rolin-Jacquemyns, Buscemi, etc., agree with it.

⁶⁷ Cf. O. Wächter, Wechselr. § 9, note 14.

⁶⁸ If the question had really been merely one as to days of grace, of course foreign parties to bills must have recognised, in so far as their obligation in recourse were concerned, any change of the law taking place at the spot where payment was to be made in a matter of this kind, just as they must have recognised the effect of a holiday which had been proclaimed at the place of payment for the first time, or had been introduced on account of some extraordinary event. (See in this sense the judgment of the Court of Zürich, reported by Fick, p. 118.) Fick himself takes a different view.

of protest, the question is reduced to this shape, viz.: Does the obligation on the bill continue to subsist, if protestation, which in other circumstances is necessary for its continued subsistence, is made impossible by a vis major, which is the character of the prohibition by a foreign government? The decisive consideration, in so far at least as obligations undertaken under authority of the German statute are concerned, is, in a sound view, that a protest is not so much an obligation incumbent on the creditor in the bill, but rather a condition of his right. If, then, accident or vis major makes it impossible for this condition to come into being, the loss falls, not upon the debtor, but upon the person whose right is qualified by this condition.⁷⁰ Of course, legislation may, by a fiction, hold that the condition has been satisfied, i.e. that the protest was taken in due time, and in that case the holder has his right of recourse. He has this right, however, only as against an obligant in the bill, by whose own law an obligant's obligation continues even where protests are hindered or forbidden by a vis major.⁷¹ he has no such right as against obligants whose own law proceeds on the opposite footing.⁷² Now, since the German statute does not depart from its requirement of a protest, even in the case of a vis major, the decision of the court of the German Bund can be upheld, even if we hold that the effect of the French measures or any similar measures was to forbid protests being taken; it rests, of course, on stronger ground still, if we hold that the effect of these measures was merely to refuse effect in certain respects to the protest as against the acceptor, and that in spite of them it was still possible to take protests in France against German obligants. There is no doubt that by the laws of France, Italy, England, and the United States,⁷³ the decision must be against subsidiary obligants belonging to these countries. For in these countries, where a party has omitted to protest, the excuse of vis major is admitted, and this is the explanation of the decisions of the higher courts in these countries, with reference to the operation of these French measures,⁷⁴ although in these decisions there comes to the front the view, which in our opinion is ⁷⁰ See Jaques, p. 12; Story, § 360; and Lyon-Caen et Renault, Dr. c. i. § 1320.

unsound, that the matter dealt with in the French measures was a mere prolongation of the period of protest in the true sense of that expression.

Norsa has presented in an excellent shape the result of this conflict upon the whole, but we must decline to go with him to the full extent to which he sets up the law of the place of issue as regulative of conflicts like this. This view is presented by Norsa himself, and by the proposal of the Institute of International Law (Thesis vi.) adopted on his motion, viz.:—

*“L'excuse tirée des cas fortuits ou de force majeure n'est admise que si elle est reconnue par la loi du lieu d'émission du titre”*⁷⁵

If that is intended to mean that an appeal to the veto by the Supreme Power is to be admitted in every case, if only the law of the place of issue allows such an appeal, then a responsibility is laid upon the indorser, who has interposed under a different law from that of the place of issue, which is not in conformity with the other principles of the international law of bills, since the leading principle is that each obligation as regards its binding force is independent of the other obligations on the bill. But, if the meaning is intended to be—and the words read literally would seem to bear this meaning—that the holder can only appeal to that veto or impediment in a question with the indorser, if the law of the place of issue, and the law of the indorser in question both allow this, then the fact is overlooked that the person who takes the bill, in acquiring it, often really has his eye on an intermediate indorsement, and a discharge is implied in favour of that person which is logically inadmissible in face of the principle of the mutual independence of the different obligations.

PROCEDURE AND EXECUTION IN THE MATTER OF BILLS.

§ 311. The competency of a special kind of procedure upon a bill is primarily dependent on whether the obligation, on which the suit arises, is to be viewed as an obligation of the nature of a bill by the law of the place where it is undertaken. It is not also necessary, in a sound view, that it should satisfy the form of an obligation by bill as that is understood by the law of the court. But, in so far as matters of proof are concerned, the lex fori must also be satisfied. A special form of personal diligence, as a means of doing execution upon the bill, is only permissible, if it is recognised by the law of the place where the obligation is undertaken,⁷⁶ and also by the lex fori, i.e. by the law of the court in which the process of execution depends.⁷⁷ For, on the one hand, in cases in which personal diligence is only competent in exceptional circumstances, and obligations on bills are regarded as involving such circumstances, that diligence is, as we see, a result of the obligation; and on the other hand, again, the forms of execution can never be carried beyond the absolute lines laid down by the lex fori. But as in most States personal diligence on bills is no longer competent, the question can hardly be regarded as of any practical importance.⁷⁸

⁷⁶ The Appeal Court at Genoa on 23rd March 1874 (Norsa, Rev. viii. p. 438) held, that if there was no such thing as personal diligence on bills known at the place where the bill issued, it could never be used in any other country. But this cannot be said to be free from doubt.

OBLIGATIONS BY BILL, DATED FROM A PLACE OTHER THAN THE DOMICILE OF THE OBLIGANT.

§ 312. Up to this point we have for simplicity's sake generally assumed that the place where a bill is issued is also the domicile of the obligant. What of the law, if a man subscribes a bill at some other place? So far as form is concerned, the decision, thanks to the rule "locus regit actum," is, as we have seen, easy. The person who takes the bill can, in such a case, run no risk; he has rather a double security, since it is possible for him to appeal to the law of the obligant's domicile as well as to that of the place of the obligation, if the requirements of this latter law are not satisfied. But the case is different as regards the substantive effects of the

⁷⁸ Decrees of discharge of bills that have been lost, or obligations to pay in spite of the fact that the person alleging himself to have right to the bill is not in a position to produce it and deliver it up, are matters that create no doubt in international relations. In questions with the acceptor, they can only come into play according to the law which regulates his obligation. See Renaud, Wechselr. § 100, notes 22, 23; Borchardt, art. 73. Art. 98 of the proposal by the Institute of International Law (Ann. viii. p. 118). The competency of the court and of the procedure are also settled by the law which regulates the acceptance. Art. 98 of the proposal of the Institute says, not quite correctly: "Les formes et vérés d'action sont déterminées par la loi du lieu du paiement de la lettre de change." obligation, and the conditions of recourse founded upon it. A conflict may well arise, and the holder of a bill may be misled, if we shall allow the obligant to appeal to the law of his domicile, as, for instance, if the lex loci actus does not require a special protest in the case of recourse against a subsidiary obligant, whereas the law of the domicile of the person against whom recourse is taken in the particular case does. Asser (§ 105) is quite decided in holding that the lex loci actus can alone decide; but Esperson (§ 21), in accord with the general rule given by the 9th prefatory article of the Italian Code, proposes that the general rule shall apply in this matter.⁷⁹ The obligation in a bill is undertaken, as Asser remarks, not merely with reference to one particular individual and his assignees, but with reference to any lawful holder of the bill. That is quite a just remark in the case of bills payable to order, although it does not apply to bills directed only to a particular person—which are not so familiar in practice—and it is accordingly quite just to say, with regard to the former class of bills, that it is of no consequence to what country the first holder of them may belong. But, considering that the character of an obligation by bill is essentially unilateral, no such questions need be raised. It is in our view immaterial whether the holder of a bill belongs to the same country as the drawer. Even if the acceptor belonged to another country still, in accordance with the general principles which we have already laid down, the law of the drawer's domicile must give the rule for determining the substance of his obligation. This result is by no means so unsatisfactory as it may seem to be at the first glance. Or is it to be held, if a person on a journey draws a bill at A, on behalf of his firm, established in B, with a statement that it is drawn on behalf of that firm, that the bill as regards its material effect is subject to the law of A, and not to the law of B?⁸⁰ If we leave the matter simply to be determined by the general principles of the law of obligations, which we have already laid down, those cases in which the law that is to be applied is the personal law of the obligant, and not the law of a place in which he is found by accident for a temporary purpose, will be ascertained without difficulty. Again, as we must assume, in cases of doubt, that the obligant in a bill has intended to undertake the material obligations of the lex loci actus, and to hold that this is the law that shall regulate his obligation, so, too, on the other hand, the trust that is necessarily reposed in the littera scripta of the bill demands that all posterior obligants, who know nothing of the circumstances under which the obligation is undertaken, should regard the lex loci actus as regulative, and should regulate their conduct, e.g. as regards the necessity of a protest, according to it. Thus, so soon as the ⁷⁹ I.e. that the decision shall be by the law of the domicile, if both parties belong to the same country.

⁸⁰ See the decision of the Court of Massachusetts to the opposite effect in Story, § 319, and Fiore, § 354. Story asks hesitatingly whether there is any distinction to be taken between the acceptance of a firm and that of an individual.

bill has been endorsed, we come in the vast majority of cases simply to the application of the lex loci actus, but without having found it necessary to attribute to that rule any exceptional meaning which it cannot be shown to have in positive law.⁸¹

We must, however, give a still wider effect to the principle of bona fides. One who acquires a bill in the circle may very well be unable to find out, in many cases, whether the place at which the bill bears to have been issued is really the place where it was issued. In favour of such a person, and in favour of all who acquired the bill from him, it must be assumed to have been so.⁸²

THE FUNDS IN THE HANDS OF THE DRAWEE.

§ 313. We remarked in our introductory observations that the obligation under the bill is to be strictly distinguished from the other obligations of a civil nature which may exist among the parties to it. This distinction is less completely carried out in the law of bills in France, and in the countries in which French law substantially prevails, than in countries where English law rules, and in those which have attached themselves to the principles of the German statute.

The French law of bills (Code de Comm. § 115) [like the law of Scotland, see p. 691] establishes a connection between the obligation constituted by the bill and the fund, which must necessarily exist in the hands of the drawee for behoof of the drawer. The bill is held to be an assignation of this fund, even before acceptance takes place. Very important practical differences between the two sets of systems are based on this distinction, which found special expression at the Congress held at Antwerp,⁸³ although it may fairly be said that the distinction is a part of the law of bankruptcy rather than of the law of bills. Up to this time this question appears not to have given rise to many disputes in international law. The rule must be that the obligation of the acceptor shall be determined exclusively by his own law, but that there can be no assignation of the cover, i.e. of the debt of the drawee to the drawer, unless the law of the drawer as well as that of the drawee holds the bill to be an assignation of it.⁸⁴

⁸¹ That one should be tied down to a consideration of the nationality of the other party to the bill, as is provided by § 85 of the German statute, by the Swiss law, and by various other systems (see O. Wächter, Wechselr. § 9, note 11), seems impracticable, and out of keeping with the truth of the facts. What is to be the result if some mistake is made as to his nationality? Again, if, for instance, two Switzers have lived for a long time abroad, and carried on business there, and the one gives a bill to the other, would it be right in such a case to apply the Swiss law of bills and to exclude the lex loci actus?

⁸² See Wharton, § 457.

⁸³ See Actes du Congrès, i. p. 369, and Speiser, Zeitschrift für Handelsrecht, vol. xxxii. p. 120.

⁸⁴ The case put by Speiser, at p. 124, should have been decided on this ground. The practical result of the French system is to give a kind of preference in the bankruptcy of the drawee, and at the same time to prevent the mandate given to the drawee in the bill to pay being revocable. This possibility of revocation, which may be put in force by the trustee of the drawer, who has fallen bankrupt, is certainly, as Speiser notices, a defect in the German system, which in itself is sounder.

PROOF OF FOREIGN LAW IN PROCESSES UPON BILLS.

§ 314. The general principles already laid down (pp. 104, 105) will apply to questions as to the proof of foreign law.⁸⁵ The requirement of proof that can be instantly verified,⁸⁶ liquid proof, is as imperative in establishing the fact as to the foreign law, as it is for the grounds upon which the suit or the defence is founded. But in matters connected with bills, just as in other suits, the judge may, if there is nothing to the contrary, proceed upon the assumption that the foreign law is identical with his own.⁸⁷

AN UNIFORM INTERNATIONAL LAW OF BILLS?

§ 315. The divergences of the laws regulating bills in different States are, as we see from what has already been said, apt to raise unpleasant difficulties in international dealings. The peculiar independence of the various obligations on a bill, and on the other hand their conjunction one with the other, make it difficult to find a solution of the conflicts that arise, which shall at once satisfy the practical necessities of life and the claims of justice. Indeed, in many cases such a solution is impossible, while in the law of bills above all other departments of law it is desirable that the public should have a full measure of security, and full information as to the rules that are to be observed by them, while at the same time the differences between the laws of the different countries rest upon no theories of morality, but on considerations of expediency. There is therefore in the sphere of the law of bills a specially good prospect of working out a scheme for securing substantial uniformity in the legislation of civilised States; and, after different authorities had expressed themselves to this effect, the Institute of International Law in 1885 propounded the scheme of a general system of bill law,⁸⁸ resting on a scheme of Norsa,⁸⁹ an example which was immediately followed by the Antwerp Congress.⁹⁰ It may, however, be a long time still before a general adoption of a uniform system of law on the subject takes place. It may be, too, that this union for the purposes of the law of bills will not be extended so as to cover the whole ground, but will be limited to certain important principles which are of the highest practical value.⁹¹ Again, it is always possible, as we see from the letters of grace published in France during the war of 1870-1871, that the uniform principles of the law may for a time, owing to extraordinary circumstances, be suspended in this country or in that. Still further, any legislative regulation of values in a country may produce a certain indirect influence on the law of bills, and lastly, a divergent practice may in many respects amount to a divergent law so far as practical results are concerned. For these reasons, and there may be others, in spite of the possibility of reaching an uniformity in the law of bills all over the civilised world, there will still be a certain importance in establishing the general principles on which in international questions the law of bills is to be treated.

⁸⁵ See Pöhls, in Asher's Rechtsfällen, p. 37.

⁸⁶ See judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, on 31st May 1858 (Archiv. für D. Wechselrecht, 7, p. 374). The Supreme Court at Rostock did not require instant proof of foreign law where the document founded upon complies with the provisions of the D.W.O. (1853, Borchardt, p. 239; cf., too, Hoffmann, pp. 597, 598). The tribunal at Darmstadt, on the other hand, rightly required a summary proof where in the document the word "bill" (wechsel) was wanting (Archiv. für Praktische Rechtswissenschaft von Schäffner, 1852, part 2, p. 64). In my opinion, it is at variance with the principles of action upon bills to hold, with Hoffmann, that in such cases a contentious proof of the foreign law will be allowed as a preliminary. The document must appear to be a bill, otherwise the defender cannot be called upon to answer in the form of action appropriate to bills, or to allow any preliminary enquiry in the ordinary form. Hoffmann's view was not recognised in either of the two latter cases cited.

OTHER DOCUMENTS PAYABLE TO ORDER. BARGAINS PRELIMINARY TO BILLS.

§ 316. It needs no special exposition to show that documents of any other kind payable to order are in international law to be dealt with either on the analogy of bills, or on the analogy of assignments of other debts constituted by writing, or on the analogy of bonds payable to bearer; in many cases one may have to apply the one set of rules to a certain extent, and the other set in other respects. But it is not difficult to make this application, since the rules of law are either less strict than they are in the domain of the law of bills, or bear more or less resemblance to the provisions of that law. On the other hand, there is a very large variety of paper of this description, and it is not unlikely that commerce will go on to discover more. We need not, therefore, spend any time on an enquiry into these documents. The proposals made by the Institute of International Law and the Congress of Antwerp design to place billets à ordre and bills, in so far as the conflict of legal systems is concerned, under the regulation of the same principles.⁹²

A bargain, the object of which is that an obligation by bill shall be incurred, e.g. that a bill drawn by the other party to the bargain shall be accepted, must simply be tested by the general principles of the law of obligations. In this matter the law of England has, as we think rightly, distinctly repudiated the doctrine that the transaction should be regulated solely by the law of the place of payment, in so far as this is a different place from that in which the obligation was undertaken.⁹³

⁹¹ Speiser, p. 123, expresses himself to this effect. As Speiser shows, the difficulties of a completely uniform law of bills are considerable, and it may be that the jurisprudence of this or that country might in no small degree be damaged by such a measure.

NOTE 44 ON §§ 290-316. LAW OF BILLS.

[The laws of England and Scotland as to bills are now for the most part expressed in the enactments of 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61 (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882). The principal sections of that Act bearing on international questions are these, viz.:—

"§ 22. (1) Capacity to incur liability as a party to a bill is coextensive with capacity to contract.

"Provided that nothing in this section shall enable a corporation to make itself liable as drawer, acceptor, or indorser of a bill unless it is competent to it so to do under the law for the time being in force relating to corporations.

"(2) Where a bill is drawn or indorsed by an infant, minor, or corporation having no capacity or power to incur liability on a bill, the drawing or indorsement entitles the holder to receive payment of the bill, and to enforce it against any other party thereto.

"§ 53. (1) A bill, of itself, does not operate as an assignment of funds in the hands of the drawee available for the payment thereof, and the drawee of a bill who does not accept as required by this Act is not liable on the instrument. This sub-section shall not extend to Scotland.

"(2) In Scotland, where the drawee of a bill has in his hands funds available for the payment thereof, the bill operates as an assignment of the sum for which it is drawn in favour of the holder, from the time when the bill is presented to the drawee.

"§ 57. Where a bill is dishonoured, the measure of damages, which shall be deemed to be liquidated damages, shall be as follows . . . (2) in the case of a bill which has been dishonoured abroad, in lieu of the above damages, the holder may recover from the drawer or an indorser, and the drawer or an indorser who has been compelled to pay the bill may recover from any party liable to him, the amount of the re-exchange, with interest thereon until the time of payment.

"(3) Where by this Act interest may be recovered as damages, such interest may, if justice require it, be withheld wholly or in part, and where a bill is expressed to be payable with interest at a given rate, interest as damages may or may not be given at the same rate as interest proper.

"§ 72. Where a bill drawn in one country is negotiated, accepted, or payable in another, the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties thereto are determined as follows:—

"(1) The validity of a bill as regards requisites in form is determined by the law of the place of issue, and the validity as regards requisites in form of the supervening contracts, such as acceptance, or indorsement, or acceptance supra protest, is determined by the law of the place where such contract was made:

"Provided that—

"(a) Where a bill is issued out of the United Kingdom, it is not invalid by reason only that it is not stamped in accordance with the law of the place of issue :

"(b) Where a bill, issued out of the United Kingdom, conforms, as regards requisites in form, to the law of the United Kingdom, it may, for the purpose of enforcing payment thereof, be treated as valid as between all persons who negotiate, hold, or become parties to it in the United Kingdom.

"(2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the interpretation of the drawing, indorsement, acceptance, or acceptance supra protest of a bill, is determined by the law of the place where such contract is made.

"Provided that where an inland bill is indorsed in a foreign country the indorsement shall, as regards the payer, be interpreted according to the law of the United Kingdom.

"(3) The duties of the holder with respect to presentment for acceptance or payment, and the necessity for or sufficiency of a protest or notice of dishonour, or otherwise, are determined by the law of the place where the act is done or the bill is dishonoured.

"(4) Where a bill is drawn out of, but payable in the United Kingdom, and the sum payable is not expressed in the currency of the United Kingdom, the amount shall, in the absence of some express stipulation, be calculated according to the rate of exchange for sight drafts at the place of payment on the day the bill is payable.

"(5) Where a bill is drawn in one country and is payable in another, the due date thereof is determined according to the law of the place where it is payable."

It will be observed that the 72nd section does not expressly deal with the question of capacity, and it can hardly be said to be implied in the word "interpretation" in § 72 (2). If that be so, the question of capacity is left to be determined by § 22 (1), which provides that capacity to incur liability as a party to a bill shall be held to be "coextensive with capacity to contract." This seems to mean that the English and Scottish courts will not recognise any special incapacities enacted by foreign systems with reference to bill obligations only, but will hold that a person who may enter into valid contracts of other descriptions will not be protected by any exceptional measures for his benefit, allowed to him by his personal law on account of some special, e.g. family relation.

This will make the law that is regulative of a person's capacity generally the measure of his capacity for bill contracts also. In Scotland the tendency seems to be to take the law of the place of contract as the rule, while the law of England rather inclines to that of the domicile. The exigencies of commerce, on which so much of the law of bills proceeds, will tend to favour the law of the place of the contract. See supra, p. 310.

The enactments of the statute have not yet been illustrated by cases, but in so far as they conflict with the principles formerly established by decisions, the enactments must, of course, prevail. By the old law in England, the lex loci solutionis regulated the import and extent of the obligation itself, the necessity or sufficiency of a demand for payment or of a protest, and the amount of interest in case of failure to pay. The validity of an indorsement to transfer the obligation in the bill was determined by the law of the place where the indorsement took place. The drawer and indorsers were regarded as sureties for the payment of the debt contained in the bill, according to the conditions and at the time fixed by the law of the place of payment.

In Scotland, on the other hand, it was held that the place of payment would determine the law that should regulate the bill, and that, for example, a foreigner drawing upon a Scot, the bill to be payable in Scotland, had entered upon a contract, the validity and import of which must be determined by the law of the place of payment—viz. Scotland, and that although no acceptance was ever given in Scotland. In the same way, if the question concerned the validity of an indorsation, the law of the place of payment was appealed to; nor was it merely the validity of the contract constituted by drawing or indorsation that was so regulated, but all that related to the nature and essence of the contract contained in the bill or indorsations thereof. The law of Scotland viewed the drawing, acceptance, and indorsation, all as dealing with one and the same contract—viz. the assignation of the fund lying in the hands of the drawee at the place of payment, and all therefore as regulated by the law of the place of payment, thus running counter to the doctrine of the text, and adopting that of Story, § 317.

Since the date of the statute a case has arisen (re Marseilles Extension Ry. and Land Co. 1885, L.R. 30, Ch. D. 598) which might have given rise to discussion as to the extent of the application of § 72 (1) (b), if the statute had been applicable. The bills in question were, however, older than the statute. In that case a bill was drawn in the French language in France, but in English form, referring to English currency, and upon an English acceptor, payable in England. It was endorsed in France, by an indorsement bad as a French indorsation, but valid in England. The question was, could the indorsee recover from the acceptor, who pleaded that the indorsee had no good title? The court held that the bill was an English bill from the first, and that the indorsation, being good by the law of England, was good against the acceptor. It is thought that the decision would be the same under the statute, since § 72 (b) should in fairness be read as coextensive with the main enactment in (1), and that what is true of the bill itself, should be true of the supervening contracts. This view seems to be borne out by the proviso attached to (2), with reference to the "interpretation" of the indorsement of an inland bill in a foreign country.

The effect of (2) of § 72 seems to be, so far as bill contracts made in the United Kingdom are concerned, to make the place of payment regulative of the respective obligations of drawer, indorser, acceptor and acceptor supra protest. This is plainly so as regards the two latter, the acceptor and the acceptor supra protest. As regards the drawer and indorser, they must, it is thought, within the United Kingdom either be looked upon as guaranteeing payment in due course, according to the law of the place of performance—the interpretation which the law of England puts upon their contract—or else their liability must be regulated by that same law, the law of the place of payment, on the footing that all the supervening contracts, like the original drawing of the bill, are bound up with the assignation of the fund lying in the hands of the drawee at the place of payment. This is the law of Scotland, where it is held that the main obligation, contained in the assignation by the drawer, will be transferable all the world over with the effects which the law of the debt assigned, the lex solutionis, attributes to it. (See, as to the law of England, Westlake, § 230; as to the law of Scotland, Robertson v. Burdekin, 1843, Ct. of Sess. Repts. 2nd ser. vi. p. 17, and Stewart v. Gelot, 1871, Ct. of Sess. Repts. 3rd ser. ix. p. 1057.) The distinction between the law of England and Scotland, the latter of which agrees with that of France, is maintained by § 53 of the statute.

But Mr Westlake goes too far when he applies the English rule beyond the United Kingdom, and states that in his opinion the law of the place of payment will always give the rule for the whole series of bill contracts, since, as he argues, mercantile usage will always hold the obligants, other than the drawee, to be sureties for the due performance of his (the drawee's) obligation, the result being to introduce the law of the place of payment to determine the import of the contract. We have seen, on the contrary, that the author holds the law of each separate contract to determine its import, and this is probably the meaning of the English statute, the word "interpretation" being read as including the force and extent of the material obligation. All that is said in the text as to these subsidiary obligations will now, therefore, be applicable to the law of England.

Mr Westlake raises an important question on (3) of § 72. He holds that the operation of the section must be restricted to the case of the last holder, and cannot be extended to the case of an indorser who has been made liable and seeks recourse against a prior indorser, or the drawer. The notice in that case, he holds, in accordance with the case of Horne v. Rouquette (1878, L. R. 3, Q. B. D. 514), must be in conformity with the law that rules the prior indorsement or the drawing, i.e. the contract which the prior obligant has made with the person who seeks recourse. But, in the first place, the language of the section is not limited in the way suggested, and it seems an exaggeration to say, as Mr Westlake says, that the extension of the enactment to the cases of all holders is contrary to principle, for this is the doctrine adopted by the author, and was the doctrine of law in Scotland before the passing of the statute, since all incidents of the original contract—and the necessity of presentation, of a protest, and of notice of dishonour, as well as the sufficiency of these when made, are such incidents (Story, § 360)—were regulated in the law of Scotland by the law of the place of payment (see cases of Robertson and Stewart, quoted supra). The conclusion which we reach is that here again the statute has adopted the theory sanctioned in the text.

In the case of Rouquette v. Overmann (1875, L. R. 10, Q. B. 525), the effect of the French legislation of 1870-1871 upon the obligations of English drawers and indorsers of bills payable in France was considered, and it was held that, as the law of the place of payment was regulative of their obligations—the common law of England before the statute—their liability was extended by the force of the French laws up to the period of indulgence allowed by them. Whether this decision would now be repeated, since § 72 (2) of the statute has become law, depends on whether Mr Westlake's reading of that enactment or our reading is sound. In our opinion the statute would not have the effect of extending the obligation of a foreign drawer or indorser.

Questions of prescription, compensation, or set-off, and the like, being by the law of England and that of Scotland extrinsic to the contract contained in the bill, may subsist to different effects between the holder and the drawer, acceptor or cash indorser, according to the provisions of the lex fori of him against whom the holder takes recourse. This doctrine of the common law is not touched by the provisions of the statute.

We may supplement the text by citation of some authorities in foreign courts on points dealt with by the author. As regards matters of form, the lex loci actus is generally recognised as regulative; thus a blank endorsement, or an undated endorsement, or an endorsement that does not bear to be "for value received," is good if the law of the place where it was made does not demand these conditions, and must be recognised even in a country where they are required, the place of payment being in the latter country—has been decided by the Tribunal Civil de Marseilles (Domestini v. Icaramanga & Cie., 1876, J. iv. 425); the Court of Paris (29th March 1836; Sirey, 1836, Q. 457; and again Cachal v. V. Tromp, 1884, J. xi. 183); and the Court of Bordeaux (Morgan v. Lefargue, 1880, J. viii. 155). The Deutsche Wechselordnung, § 56, as we have seen, and the Code of Commerce of Switzerland, § 437, expressly make this provision.

It may be noted that blank endorsement is recognised in England, the United States, Belgium, Germany, Portugal, Hungary, Russia, Denmark, and Austria.

The doctrine that the law which should regulate protests is that of the place of payment, receives support from decisions in France and in Russia, which reject the doctrine of the text; the Court of Paris (Brocheton v. Aron et Cie. 1875, J. iii. 361) has held that the validity of a protest must be determined by the lex solutionis; and the commercial tribunal of St Petersburg (Gibbs v. Sewastianoff, 1875, J. v. 297), laid down that a bill must be protested within the time and according to the forms prescribed by the law of the place of payment.

The French courts will not entertain action for the contents of a bill accepted by a foreigner and payable to a foreigner in a foreign country (Laurie v. Lacy O'Brien, C. de Paris, 1875, J. iii. 104); nor does the fact that the bill was drawn in Paris confer jurisdiction upon them, if it is payable abroad in foreign money, and the dispute arises between two foreigners; they will not exercise jurisdiction although the transaction of trade, which gave the bill its origin, took place in Paris, and there is an assignation of all rights in and to the bill to a French subject (Ottet v. Vereken, C. de Paris, 1879, J. vi. 547). The unwillingness of French courts to permit foreigners to conduct suits before them is noticed at length infra.

VI. MARITIME LAW.¹

RECOGNITION OF THE GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW IN MARITIME LAW. AN UNIVERSAL MARITIME LAW. Lex fori IN MARITIME LAW.

§ 317. In the domain of maritime law, as in other branches of law, the idea is being more and more recognised that we have to do, not with principles universally recognised,² which merely took a different stamp in the laws and practice of different countries, but with rules of law which, like other legal institutes, were the product of theories rooted in national characteristics, and in no small measure resulted from the legislations of the different States, setting to work upon the subject with an unfettered discretion and in pursuit of practical advantages, the conception of which varied from time to time. The recognition of this truth is of modern origin, dating from the end of last century.

At the same time, the conditions of sea-voyages have changed. On the one hand, as ships have become larger and more costly, their individuality, the fact that they have a character which is different from other assets of moveable estate, has become more prominent; while, on the other hand, it seems impossible to hold them to be uncontrolled by any of the rules that prevail in international law for traffic in moveables. Then, again, every ship will frequently take in cargo at widely distant ports: cargo vessels often trade between the most distant and dissimilar countries, and are only advised during their voyage of their destination, the terminus of their journey.³ Thus the possibility of conflict between different systems of law has become much greater and much more serious. In former times the law of the judge who had to determine the case might be applied in most cases without much injustice, and in many other cases the law of the port to which the ship was bound might be adopted for all who had any interest in the matter, because it was just in the courts of that port that there was vested, in questions of average adjustment, a kind of voluntary or prorogated jurisdiction. But nowadays a strong opposition to general rules of that kind has grown up, and the strongest and undoubtedly successful opposition is against a general application of the lex fori. There is all the more foundation for this opposition, inasmuch as modern codes of procedure provide that their new jurisdictions—with as many arms as a polypus, which have too often been planned so as to give an unfair advantage to the native pursuer, and which overlook the natural conditions of the matter in dispute—shall be applied in maritime cases as in others. This is an error, from which no doubt the practice of England and that of the United States have up to this time kept themselves free. The German Code of Procedure, however, to take one instance, imitating the legislation of France to a certain extent, has certainly fallen into it.⁴ Smekens, in the Commercial Congress at Antwerp in 1885,⁵ declared, as the result of his long experience as president of the Court of Commerce there, that he deplored the application of the lex fori to real rights in and over ships, to which he had been so often driven by the law recognised up to that time; and this rule was unanimously adopted,⁶ viz. :—

¹ Efforts for the establishment of an universal maritime law among civilised States are to some extent justified, and nowadays are making themselves distinctly felt. It is no part of our task to discuss them. But see the resolution of the Institute of Public Law (Turin 1882, Ann. vi. p. 91): "Les matières à l'égard desquelles l'uniformité est surtout désirable, sont: les lettres de change et autres papiers négociables le contrat de transport et les principales parties du droit maritime." See, too, Sacerdote's report given at Munich, 1883 (Ann. vii. p. 108), and the "projet de loi uniforme sur les assurances maritimes, which was adopted at Brussels in 1885 (Ann. viii. p. 125).

“En cas de conflits des lois maritimes, il ne faut pas appliquer une règle générale, mais distinguer suivant les cas.”

Thus the methods of scientific legal observation and enquiry, which in other departments of international law are recognised as sound, and have been sanctioned by Asser, Lyon-Caen, and now by the practice of the English and American courts, are approved of for the sphere of maritime law.⁷ The old point of view is rejected, and described as beaten out of the field. It is, however, strange enough that the most recent work in German on maritime law by R. Wagner adopts the old point of view,⁸ for he proposes that the lex fori, in favour of which he sets up a presumption that in some measure is difficult to rebut,⁹

⁴ The German Code of Procedure contains a perfect motley of sample jurisdictions, which are a serious matter within Germany, but in international matters are useless and dangerous. As regards France, see § 14 of the Code Civil, so often criticised.

⁶ Actes, p. 103.

⁷ See Foote, pp. 367, 368, of 1st Edn. “The attempt to treat English maritime law as something anomalous and distinct in itself appears illogical and unnecessary.” See also pp. 412, 413, of 2nd Edn.

⁸ Pp. 131-135.

⁹ It is true that it is not every and any judge, who may accidentally be called upon to judge in a dispute upon maritime matters, who is to apply his own law, but only such a judge as “the decision of the question should fall to as a necessary result of our theory of maritime intercourse.” The competency of courts, however, is determined, not by the law of nature, nor by shall only in exceptional cases be excluded by any other system of law.¹⁰

It is not unusual to find this last view of the matter [the lex fori] defended on the ground of its practical convenience. The only claim it has to such a character, however, is that it is convenient for the courts. Alfred de Courcey (iii. p. 243) has pointed out, with incisive force, and with special reference to the differences between modern English and French maritime law, the truly monstrous results of the application of the lex fori, e.g. in claims for damages which are raised against owners on account of collisions at sea. It may be a matter of pure chance on which side of the channel, only a few miles broad, the action is instituted. It cannot be said of De Courcey, who is "administrateur de la compagnie d'assurances générales," that he necessarily pays homage to a dry and abstract theory.

the law maritime, but by the rules of process. The application of the lex fori is accordingly made to depend on the solution of a preliminary question, a matter on which Wagner's theory gives the judge in practice no assistance whatever. The converse, viz. that the competency of the court must be determined by the competency of the law, is more like the truth. (See the law of process.) Wagner's appeal (p. 135) to the old oath of the judges "to judge the stranger like the citizen, and the citizen like the stranger," is a mere phrase. It is just the lex fori, which cannot be known beforehand to the parties, and may depend upon a thousand accidents, that may lead to a legal result that is unfair and is not alike favourable to the stranger as to the citizen. See Fiore, Dir. pubb. ii. § 1043, against the application of the lex fori in maritime law. § 24 of the German Code of Procedure, viz.: "The court within whose territory a person has property, or within whose territory the article of property claimed in any action actually is, will be held to have jurisdiction to entertain an action for patrimonial claims against that person, if he has no domicile in the German Empire." Wagner tries to use this particularly inconvenient provision by associating it with the doctrines of arrestment and freedom from arrestment in the case of outward-bound ships. He looks upon freedom from arrestment, however, which is not by any means a doctrine admittedly applicable to foreign ships, as a "renunciation of the powers of sovereignty." But it is quite incorrect to put any such meaning on § 24, and freedom from arrestment is not at all the same thing as extra-territoriality. This is an instance of the capricious treatment of our doctrine by Wagner, although his work in other respects is so meritorious.

¹⁰ Wagner falls again completely into error in the modification of this theory of the application of the lex fori, which he makes at p. 135. The purport of it is that the parties should have the power of making a valid bargain as to the law that is to be applied, irrespective of whether they do so at an earlier or a later stage, or during the course of the process itself. This is certainly incompetent in the case of actions upon delict, e.g. actions of damages for running down, although it was allowed by the Court of Commerce of Hamburg in the case cited by Wagner himself. It is, however, a mistaken theory for all possible relations of the parties, although these are purely contractual, to the extent in point of time which Wagner assigns to it. The court cannot be forced to apply a law to circumstances which it is not suited to regulate, or to recognise some entirely unreasonable proposition of private international law (see supra, p. 100). One cannot see why this should not hold good in maritime law, as it does in other branches of law. Wagner confuses the bargain which he proposes to allow in the course of the action on the one hand with the case, that from ignorance, or from the carelessness of the parties or the judge, the appeal to foreign law is not taken at a sufficiently early stage in the process, and on the other hand, with the case that the parties, in making their original contract, declare, in virtue of their freedom of contract, that they will be ruled by some particular territorial law. The decision of the Appeal Court at Hamburg, reported by Busch, goes further astray in its reasoning even than the Court of Commerce.

PROPERTY IN SHIPS.

§ 318. The first question for consideration in maritime law seems to be—What law decides as to property in a ship?

This question is generally answered to the effect that the law of the nationality of the ship must rule. But, conversely, the laws of different States make a ship's nationality dependent on the ship being in whole¹¹ or in part the property of citizens of a particular State. The answer given to the question merely imports that the property in a ship can only pass in accordance with the law of the flag, which the ship as a rule flies. A ship then, which has not as yet acquired any particular nationality, by going through the necessary formalities, is for that time a moveable article, and, like any other moveable article, for the purposes of the acquisition and transference of property in her, is simply subject to the law of the place in which she happens for the time to be.

Special difficulties, however, arise, if the law of the country, whose nationality has been acquired by the ship, makes the transference of property in her, or the full operation of such a transference in questions with third parties, dependent on an entry in its own shipping register, as is the case in many systems of law.¹² If the State, in whose territory the ship happened to be at the time of the transference of the property, has the same rule of law as the State of her home port, then we may safely say that the property can only pass, or receive effect in a question with third parties by means of such an entry in the shipping register of the home port. But what is to be the result, if, by the law of the place where the ship is, property may be acquired or be made effectual without any particular form being observed? In logic, the law of the place where the ship is must prevail. For a ship is in its nature a moveable article, and although the law of the home port treats a seagoing ship (or a seagoing ship of a particular size or tonnage) in a different way from other moveables, yet, according to general principles, such a rule of law cannot claim an extra-territorial operation any more than any other rule of law that deals with moveables.¹³ An unconditional recognition of every rule of law that

¹³ A consistent course of practice in France on these lines is recognised by Lyon-Caen, J. iv. p. 482. See judgment of the French Ct. of Cass. 19th March 1872, rep. by Fiore, Dir. pub. ii. p. 229, and to the same effect, Ct. of Brussels, 27th Dec. 1879 (contrary, however, to the opinion of Clunet, Rev. xvi. p. 146). The theory of the law of England, too, is that "if personal property is disposed of in a manner binding according to the law of the country where it is, that disposition is binding everywhere:" per Mr Justice Pollock in Cammell v. Sewell, 1858, 3 H. and N. p. 617 [app. by Lord Blackburn in H. of L. in Castrique v. Imrie, 1870, 4 E. and J. App. 429], see Westlake, 180, 181. Even the judgment of the Court of New Orleans prevails in the home port (e.g. as to sale without any formalities or the constitution of real rights in the same way), notwithstanding the fact that the vessel is lying in a foreign port, to the prejudice of all who trusted to the law of the place where the vessel actually is, would in fact be intolerable. Indeed, we must maintain that the State to which the home port belongs would have to recognise a transference of property which was not in accordance with its own laws, but was in terms of those of the port where the vessel actually was at the time, in the event of the subsequent return of the vessel to the territory of the home port.¹⁴ This is a consequence of the principles of the law of things as we have already expounded them (p. 497). Of course, if the person who has acquired the property in a foreign country, does not in the meantime cause that fact to be registered in accordance with the laws of the home port, it is possible for a third party again to acquire a right in that port in accordance with its laws, by which the right acquired abroad will be rendered ineffectual. This is a very stringent compulsitor for making a person, who proposes to acquire the property of a ship in another State, observe at the same time the requirements of the law of the home port. The laws of those States which require property to be registered, in order to make it effectual against third parties, have thus an operation which is not to be undervalued,¹⁵ even without supplementing their powers by any exceptional rule of law, which could only be achieved by international treaty, or by some special legislation on the part of the different States. It is therefore incorrect to say that a seagoing ship, if we apply to it the general rules of international law that regulate other moveables, will be dealt with, as has been said, just as a trunk or portmanteau would be.¹⁶ At least that is incorrect, if the law of the home port makes adequate provision for registration, and if there are ship's papers in existence, to prevent that bona fide acquisition of property which might otherwise so easily take place with unlimited effect, and to the prejudice of antecedent rights. It is also possible to add weight to this operation of registers by penal provisions against the native owner, who does not see that registration is effected within a certain fixed period.¹⁷

reported by Fiore in J. iii. p. 128, with which he finds fault, seems to be justified by the lex rei sitæ of the ship. The reasons which are assigned, are, no doubt, based upon an assumption of the rule of the lex fori.

¹⁴ Asser to the contrary effect, § 109.

¹⁵ Lyon-Caen et Renault, Dr. c. ii. §§ 1622, 1623; art. 195 of the Code de Comm. requires a particular written form for sale, or an acte authentique. The French law of 17th Vendémiaire, year ii. requires in addition an "inscription en douane." The former requirement is applied—but not, as these authors think, in obedience to the rule "locus regit actum"—to ships which are not French, but are found in French territory: the latter applies to French ships only; but, as should be added, only if in the interval the change of property abroad has not led to a change of flag.

¹⁶ So Picard, J. viii. p. 479.

¹⁷ Wagner, p. 139, proposes in some obscure way to look primarily to the place of performance in the case of the property being transferred to a foreigner. Why, he does not say: the lex rei sitæ is to rule only where the place of performance is doubtful (what does he mean by doubtful?). The Code of the Netherlands, art. 310, to which Wagner appeals, also speaks of the lex rei sitæ exclusively.

NOTE BB ON § 313. PROPERTY IN BRITISH SHIPS.

[The property in a British ship can only be validly transferred by a compliance with the statutory requisites, and that is true whether the transference takes place in Britain or abroad. The statute also makes provision for the case of a foreign ship being acquired by a British subject, and conversely, for the case of a British ship being acquired by a foreigner.

The principal sections of the statute (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104) bearing upon these topics are the 19th, 38th, 54th, 76th, 79th and 81st. The 19th section provides that all British ships must be registered as directed by the Act, under penalty of being detained, if they shall attempt to proceed to sea without registration. On the contrary, a ship built in Britain for a foreigner need not be registered, and an assignment of the right of property in her may be effected without the use of the statutory forms. (Union Bank v. Lenanton, 1878, L. R. 3, C. P. Div. 243.)

The 38th section provides that no person shall be entitled to be registered as owner of a ship or a share of a ship until he has made a declaration in the form of schedule B, stating inter alia whether she is foreign built or no. He must also state his qualification, to be owner of a British ship, for (§ 18) no one can be owner of a British ship save natural born British subjects, or naturalised subjects, or bodies corporate established under the laws of Great Britain or some British possession, and having their principal place of business there. That the provisions of the 38th section apply to the case of ships bought abroad is made evident from § 54, whereby it is enacted that if a ship becomes at any foreign port the property of persons qualified to be owners of British ships, the British consul may grant the master a provisional certificate, to serve as a certificate of registry, until the ship arrives at a British port, when this provisional certificate becomes void.

By §§ 76, 79, provision is made for an owner, who desires to sell his ship outside the United Kingdom, obtaining a certificate of sale from a registrar to go with the ship's papers, as the ship proceeds abroad.

§ 81 (10) provides that where a ship is sold to a person not qualified to be the owner of a British ship, the bill of sale, the certificate of sale, and the certificate of registry shall be produced to some registrar or consular officer, who shall forward them to the registrar of the port in which the ship is registered, in order that the registrar may close the register. (11) provides that if the directions of (10) are not followed the person acquiring the interest shall be held by British law to have acquired no title at all, and the person professing to exercise the power of transference shall be liable in a penalty.

Thus it seems to follow that a British ship retains her national character till a transfer of her is effected in British statutory form. (See Lord Shand in Granfelt v. Lord Advocate, 1874, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. i. p. 782.)

The provisions of the 81st section are applicable to sales in foreign ports, for there is a reference to the consular authority of the place. The 54th section deals with the case of the purchase of a ship in a foreign port by a British subject. It will be observed that the statute postulates the execution of a bill of sale even when the transaction is in a foreign port.

That a bill of sale is necessary, whatever its particular form may be, to pass the property of a ship, would certainly be held in the case of a ship sold or bought by British owners, and it is probable that no British court would recognise a sale even of a foreign ship, by foreigners to foreigners—if such a case should occur in British courts—without a bill of sale. In The Sisters 1804 (5 C. Rob. Ad. 155) Lord Stowell says: "According to the ideas which I have always entertained on this question, a bill of sale is the proper title to which the maritime courts of all countries would look. It is the universal instrument of transfer of ships in the usage of all maritime countries; and in no degree a peculiar title-deed or conveyance known only to the law of England: it is what the maritime law expects, what the Court of Admiralty would in its ordinary practice always require." Again, in the case of Schultz v. Robinson and Niven, 1861, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiv. p. 120, where a question arose as to the transference of the property of a Prussian ship, which was being detained in a Scottish port, this doctrine was approved by Lord Justice Clerk Inglis, who was of opinion that without a bill of sale the court would not entertain a plea of the transference of property in a ship.

But, subject to this requirement, it would seem that a transference, valid by the law of the place where the ship is, will be recognised in British courts as a good transference, always provided that neither party to the transference is a British subject, in which case, as we have seen, the statute claims recognition. This is on the principle that "if personal property is disposed of in a manner binding according to the law of the country where it is, that disposition is binding everywhere:" per Pollock in Cammell v. Sewell, 1858, 3 H. and N. 617, app. by Lord Blackburn in Castrique v. Imrie, 1870, 4 E. and J. App. 414. If the ship is on the high seas, the law of its flag will be the law that must be observed, for by fiction the situs of the ship is then held to be in its home port, or, if there be no such fiction, because the personal law to which the owner owes obedience is the law of the home port. (Westlake, § 150.) An application of this doctrine was made in Scotland in 1861 in the case of Schultz quoted supra. Arrestments were there laid on a Prussian ship, whose owners were all Prussians, in Scotland, in respect of debt due by a person who certainly had been, and was alleged still to be an owner pro parte. The objection taken to the validity of the arrestment was that this person had ceased to be owner, in proof of which a bill of sale executed by him at sea in favour of another Prussian subject was produced. It was disputed whether such a bill of sale was of any effect until registered, and the evidence of a Prussian lawyer was led, from which it appeared that by the law of Prussia no such registration was necessary. The court, following this statement of the foreign law, held that the property had been transferred, and consequently that the arrestment was bad. The effect to be given to the law of the place where the ship is, is also indicated by decision that that law must determine whether a foreign owner has a right in equity to dispute the right of a person who has entered into a contract of sale with him, but who has not obtained a good title. Hooper v. Gumm, 1867, L.R. 2, Ch. App. 282.]

PROPOSALS FOR LEGISLATION. CRITICISM OF THESE.

§ 319. Would it not, however, be desirable that the law of the home port should be the only law to determine questions of property in a ship, although that is not at present recognised as the law?

The Institute of International Law,¹⁸ and the Congress at Antwerp in 1885, answered this question in the affirmative, on the motion of Lyon-Caen. The resolution of the Congress at Antwerp¹⁹ mentions, it is true, only rights of pledge and privileges over ships. It is, however, a matter of inference, that what is true of pledge in this respect, should also be applied to rights of property.

If the law of the flag is alone to be recognised, parties interested will be prevented from availing themselves of the law of the place where the ship is. That will often be a serious obstacle to the speedy sale of a ship, because the observance of the law of the home port may involve delays, while, on the other hand, the buyer may not always be able to ascertain this law with sufficient certainty at once. That there is some foundation for these and similar considerations, may be seen from the fact that when the German Commercial Code was under consideration these were the reasons for not insisting on writing as an essential,²⁰ and that again the Dutch Code, e.g. although by § 309 it makes the badge of property the recording of the proper documents in the public register, still makes in § 310 this prudent and sound exception, viz. :—

“If the ship, which belongs to inhabitants of this kingdom, happens to be abroad, and is there to be transferred to foreigners, the transference shall be carried out in conformity with the law of the place where it takes place.”

But, although it may be conceded that, in respect so many foreign consulates now exist, it will be easier to ascertain what is the law of the home port and to observe it, is it conceivable that a foreign State, which, e.g. adopts the principle that the shipping register cannot be pleaded by any one who is in knowledge of a transference having taken place, although it has not yet been entered in the register, should, notwithstanding this principle, refuse effect to a transference that has taken place in its own territory, so as to uphold the absolute force which is attributed to the register by the law of the home port? Besides, if an absolute force were given to the law of the flag, as is demanded by the resolutions of the Institute of International Law and the Antwerp Congress, a variety of conflicts with public maritime law would necessarily ensue, e.g. with the law of confiscation or seizure,²¹ and, on the other hand, difficulties would arise with the doctrines of law, which are recognised on behalf of maritime trade, and must be measured by local ideas, viz. the duties of attending to the wants of the crew, and of saving the ship and cargo for all interested, not indeed in specie, but by realising their value by a speedy sale. In any case, the universal application of the law of the flag postulates that this law shall in its requirements keep itself within certain limits, and that it shall not attempt to treat seagoing ships, contrary to their nature, as if they were real property, while it shall not, on the other hand, countenance an undue want of formalities. Whereas, as we have seen, it is possible to carry on the existing system fairly well—it being always kept in view, that a real right is not lost by the law of the place where the ship is, simply because it could not have been created under that law in the way in which it was created, but is only lost if it comes into collision with some stronger right which has been created under the law of the place where the ship subsequently comes to be. On the other hand, universal and unrestricted recognition of the law of the home port and no other may give rise to serious evils, unless distinct limits are laid down within which the law of the home port must be confined.²²

²⁰ See Lewis, p. 25.

It is, however, a different question whether every rule which is applicable to other kinds of moveable property should, without any distinction, be applied to seagoing ships, e.g. whether we should apply to them that rule of French law "possession vaut titre," which in such a subject would be specially dangerous. That may very well be matter of dispute, if the law of the place where the ship is itself prescribes a system of registration for its own ships trading with the port, which is in direct contradiction to that rule of law which favours actual possession and acquisition without any particular forms. On this ground, and not simply because all rights in a ship are consistently to be ruled by the law of the ²¹ Or should the right of confiscation or seizure be excepted? It must be expected that just as the freedom of maritime trade increases in the interest of subjects of the most various nations, the need of having in the ship itself something that can be taken as a guarantee, will be more and more felt, and that this guarantee cannot very well be made to depend upon the law of the home port in all circumstances.

home port (Loi du pavillon), many judgments, and in particular judgments of French courts, are open to attack.²³

NATIONALITY OF SEAGOING SHIPS.

§ 320. The law of that particular State to whose flag a ship makes claim, must primarily decide the question of the ship's nationality. If it is possible that the ship should belong in the circumstances to either of two countries, or to one of many, the declaration of the owners' intention must rule, and if they could not agree in the manner required, the ship must retain its original or earlier nationality. There should, besides, be a general recognition of the principle that no ship, which has once carried a flag, should be allowed to adopt another nationality²⁴ before it is definitely, or on condition of acquiring that new nationality, released from its old ties; and again, it should only be released from its old nationality on condition of acquiring another.²⁵

LAW OF PLEDGE OVER SEAGOING SHIPS.

§ 321. The rivalry of the law of the flag and that of the place where the ship is, raises questions of particular importance with regard to the validity of securities over ships. It is in this branch of the subject²⁶ that the application of the lex rei sitæ, the law of the place where the ship is, or where it last was, as the case may be, which French legal authorities have made, has called up the counter theory, which proposes to declare that the law of the flag shall alone furnish the rule.

In respect that the law of France, up to the date of the law of 10th

²⁴ Excepting, of course, alterations of nationality in time of war by virtue of the law of capture.

²⁵ Fiore, Dir. pubb. ii. p. 226.

²⁶ The question whether the captain has power to pledge the ship does not belong to this part of the subject; it will be discussed hereafter.

December 1874,²⁷ knew nothing of rights of hypothec over ships, security rights, which had been duly constituted over foreign ships abroad in conformity with the laws that there prevailed, were on that account held of no effect in France.²⁸ The security of shipping must be seriously threatened by any such system. If a foreign ship ran into a French harbour, any transfer of the property in her, and even any arrestment followed by execution, necessarily destroyed the security right which had been well set up in another country in accordance with its law. But a right over a moveable object which has been well constituted abroad is not extinguished, merely because the thing afterwards reaches a place by the laws of which it could not have been constituted. It is not extinguished till it comes into collision with some definite right which is well constituted by the law of this latter place. But, by French law, the right in security constituted abroad had no operation in competition with one who could appeal to the rule "possession vaut titre," and no operation either against the privileged ship's creditors created by the code de commerce. It may be thought doubtful, however, whether it must necessarily be without effect even as against other ordinary creditors of the owner. The test would be what meaning must be put upon certain other provisions of the law of France, and whether it could be said that, because the French legislator had closed all doors to the creation of hypothecs over French ships, he would also refuse to allow hypothecs over foreign ships to be recognised even to that limited extent. We do not presume to decide the question according to the law of France; we can see, however, that an adequate measure of security would be attained, without an absolute recognition of the law of the home port, by simply paying some respect to a legal relation well constituted according to a foreign legal system.²⁹

²⁷ A Belgian statute of 21st August 1879 followed, but with some modifications, this French statute.

²⁸ See the judgment of the Court of Cassation of 19th March 1872 (J. i. p. 31); Lyon-Caen (J. ix. p. 246); and Fiore, Dir. pub. ii. p. 230.

²⁹ Since the law of France at the present time, while recognising generally the legality of a hypothec over ships, confines such a security to ships of a certain tonnage (20 tons and upwards), this question may be raised: Is a security right which is well constituted by the law of the flag over a vessel of less tonnage, effectual in France, in spite of the French law to the contrary? The question is not unimportant with reference e.g. to the law of Belgium, since that law requires only a tonnage of 10 tons. Laurent (vii. § 391) answers it in the negative, because the French law will only recognise hypothecs of the character fixed by itself. Laurent cannot, plainly, be refuted by the observation, that the determinant is simply the law of the flag and no other. All the same we must adopt the opposite view, which is Lyon-Caen's (J. ix. p. 248). French law, by adopting a hypothèque maritime, made a distinct difference between ships and other moveable things. We have therefore a right to assert, that it is not every rule of law that is good for other moveables, which must be applied to ships also without distinction; and since the law of France, in the case of French ships, refers questions of registration to the law of the home port, the possibility of entering foreign ships on a register must be determined by their national law; but it is the legal possibility of registration that will determine the possibility of the constitution of a hypothec. (Cf. too, Brocher, ii. p. 376.) Lyon-Caen (ut cit. at p. 252) has very correctly shown that § 2128 of the Code Civil is not applicable to maritime hypothecs. The nullity of an instrument to effect a

The resolutions of the Institute of International Law, and of the Congress at Antwerp in 1885, propose to stand out against this French theory, and to make the law of the flag the only law of which account is to be taken. The question, however, suggests itself, whether this principle is necessary, and whether the security of the ship's creditors, which is the desirable thing to ensure, will, in truth, be attained by an universal acceptance of the proposed regulations. The resolutions of the Institute are these (Ann. viii. p. 134), viz. :—

“(2.) Quels sont les créanciers du bâtiment qui ont ou n'ont pas droit de suite, dans le cas où il est aliéné ;

“(3.) Si le navire est susceptible ou non d'être hypothéqué ;

“(4.) Quelles sont les formalités à remplir pour la publicité des hypothèques maritimes ;

“(5.) Quelles sont les créances garanties par un privilège maritime ;

“(6.) Quels sont les rangs des privilèges sur le navire ;

“(7.) Quelles sont les formalités à remplir par le capitaine qui emprunte à la grosse en cours de voyage.”

In these propositions we find that the law of securities over ships is placed completely on an equality with that of securities over real property. So much so that by (4) the law of the place where the vessel actually is is thrown out of account even in questions as to the form of the securities, while (7) provides that even the formalities of a bond of bottomry are to be determined, not by the law of the actual situation of the ship, but by the law of the home port.

The distinction between the two classes of securities cannot, however, be ignored. Real property has a locality which is really permanent : ships can only be treated as real or immoveable property by virtue of a fiction. Thus, for instance, the master will be deprived of all power of using the forms of the country, in which his vessel for the time happens to be, to grant a security or a bond of bottomry. The result will be that he will frequently find that he cannot obtain so much credit, or can only obtain it under oppressive conditions : for as the creditor will often be in ignorance of the laws of the home port, he will be thereby rendered more suspicious of the security. But it is not merely the existence of the security rights that is to be tested by the law of the flag : their mutual relations and their relations to other real rights are to be tested in the same way. If this were not so, creditors, who had lent in accordance with the law of the home port, would not get the security they expected. These are requirements which involve this result, that even the laws of the place where the ship is, which can be described as being in theory coercihypothec, which has been executed abroad, is simply an exceptional provision resting on a misunderstanding, which must be strictly interpreted and not applied except to immoveables, which, besides, at the time the code was promulgated, were the only subjects that could be affected by hypothecs.

tive, or laws of "ordre public," will have to give way to the law of the flag. Unless it is expressly said that these proposed rules are to take precedence even of coercitive laws and laws of "ordre public," the security which is aimed at will only be problematic, and at the best we shall be unable to avoid a deluge of controversy. But if it is expressly said, that even the laws of "ordre public" must give way here, then we are in truth requiring the State where the vessel actually is to surrender in a measure her sovereign rights, and we are practically making merchant ships extra-territorial.³⁰ The State, in whose harbours or waters a foreign ship is lying, would no longer be entitled to declare the ship itself really bound for navigation or harbour dues, or for salvage, etc.;³¹ and persons, who give salvage services, would not know what security was offered to them for payment, since they would not have time to inform themselves as to the law of the flag. Thus the interests of navigation would themselves be prejudiced if no heed at all were given to the local law. All these objections are of course equally applicable to the shorter statement of the rule adopted by the Congress of Antwerp, viz. :—

"En cas de contestations sur les privilèges, l'hypothèque ou le nantissement on suivra la loi du pavillon."

The provisions which are necessary, and which alone would be adequate, are these, viz. :—

(1.) Pledges or securities over ships shall be universally recognised if they are constituted, in so far as forms are concerned, in conformity with the law of the flag, i.e. the home port. No law of the port where the ship is, forbidding the vindication of a moveable article over which a security exists, shall apply to vessels, if the security which has been constituted is noticed in the vessel's papers, and could not have been overlooked except by gross carelessness on the part of the person who has acquired the vessel.

(2.) Vessels may also be given in pledge under the forms of law recognised by the port where they happen to be.³² If, however, the ship reaches the territory of some other system of law, these securities must be entered in the ship's papers as described in (1), and they cease to be operative unless, within a certain reasonable period (to be fixed by the law of the home port) after the ship has returned to that port, the creditor makes provision with the proper authorities for having the formalities required by the law of the home port satisfied.

(3.) The respective priorities of rights of pledge, and their relations to the rights of other privileged ship's creditors, are to be determined by the law of the place where they are put in force by diligence or execution.

³² The Congress at Antwerp recognised the principle in so far as bonds of bottomry were concerned (Question 18, Actes, p. 117).

It must be admitted that rules (1) and (2) necessarily involve a certain amount of encroachment on the substantive legislation of individual States. But this encroachment is slight and may very well be endured, while a solution of the questions as to the conflict of laws in this connection which shall satisfy the necessities of the case, is impracticable without a certain uniformity in the municipal laws concerned. This is the result of the peculiar double character of the seagoing ship, which from its value and importance may be almost ranked with real property, or, if this expression is preferred, may be assimilated to a legal person; while at the same time its actual character, the fact that it is moveable, cannot be altogether kept out of sight. (3), however, is simply a deduction from the general principles of private international law, as we shall show at greater length, when we take up the subject of bankruptcy; and we hold it altogether impossible for any State to refuse to give effect to this rule.³³ No doubt the security of the creditor who holds the right of pledge may, under the operation of that rule, be prejudiced to some extent if the ship, after a security has been constituted, should reach a territory where a different system of law from that where the security was constituted prevails. But, on the one hand, it is neither possible nor necessary that the security of a pledge over a ship should be on exactly the same footing as one over a true piece of real property; while, on the other hand, we must remember that other privileged rights are well known which serve as security for outlays on the vessel, which in their turn again indirectly benefit the creditor who holds the security. It is also familiar that Roman law, even in the case of immoveable property, to some extent gave privileged security rights, which ranked before those of earlier date. Less importance, however, may be attached to the serious consequences of such privileges in the case of ships, while on the other hand expenditure is much more often matter of absolute necessity in the case of a ship, to prevent it from being lost altogether. The lex rei sitæ can, however, only regulate the captain's powers, in so far as the right of pledge applies to the hull and rigging of the ship. To extend its application to something connected with the ship, which is not subject to the lex rei sitæ, e.g. to the sum for which the vessel is insured, is a result that can only be effected if the law of the flag allows.³⁴

³⁴ In this connection we must agree entirely with Lyon-Caen (J. ix. p. 255). There is for instance, an important difference between the law of Belgium and that of France. The former extends the rights of privileged creditors so as to affect the insurance money.

The place where the contract is made, is, strictly speaking, a matter of no consequence: the important matter is the place in which the ship, the thing pledged, is at the time of the contract. That is the result of the general principles which regulate the law of things. If the place of the contract were not the same as the place where the ship was lying, there would be no necessity for paying any attention at all to it. The owner of the ship can easily observe the law of the home port, while the captain or the owner's correspondent will only pledge the vessel in the port where she happens at that moment to be. The Congress of Antwerp, in speaking of the "lieu du contrat" (see e.g. Qu. 10, Actes, p. 105), assumed the identity of the two places, i.e. the place of the contract and the actual situation of the ship, a state of affairs which is generally the case.³⁵

SECURITY RIGHTS WHEN THERE IS A CHANGE OF FLAG.

§ 322. In the Antwerp Congress this question, too, was raised, although it was not answered by a vote³⁶—What shall become of antecedent security rights, if the ship changes her flag? It is plain that there is not the slightest reason for holding that, as her nationality is changed, rights which have been well constituted should at once be lost. Nor can this be the result of the fact that the forms for creating a right of pledge according to the law of the subsequent nationality are different, or that—if we are dealing with direct statutory hypothecs—the law of the flag that is subsequently acquired would not sanction them.³⁷ The rule, however, which may very well be a rule of law in many countries, that rights which are not entered in the registry of the home port go for nothing in questions

³⁵ Laurent (vii. § 392) has asserted that, even according to the existing French statute, securities constituted over ships in another country will be void in France, as a consequence of his theory that the requirement, that a document shall be made public, is a "statut réel," i.e. a coercitive enactment. For, as a French court has held (C. d'Aix, 22nd Nov. 1876), publication in a foreign country is not publication in France. The French Ct. of Cassation (25th Nov. 1879, J. vii. p. 583) has, however, pronounced against this over-rigorous doctrine of law, and an excellent refutation of it is to be found in a judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Oldenburg of 18th May 1861 (Seuffert, xvii. § iii.). Native creditors are warned by the ship's foreign flag that the want of entries in the registers of this country which are applicable only to native ships can give them no absolute guarantee against the existence of earlier security rights. The absence of such registration of the earlier rights, unless that registration is prescribed by the law of the home port also, gives the new creditor no preferential right, and there is nothing left to regulate the case except the general rule that real rights, which are once validly constituted, are not lost by the fact that the thing, the subject of the security, passes into a territory by the laws of which it would not, in the circumstances, have been constituted.

with third parties, may have this result.³⁸ In the latter case, however, the obligation of the officials to enter security rights, the existence of which they can with certainty ascertain from the ship's papers or their register, must of course be recognised. If this duty is not satisfied, it is no doubt possible for prior rights in security, which have been well constituted, to be lost. That case, however, is just the same as the case which may also occur, viz. that, where a strict system of registration of hypothecs over real property exists, some hypothecs should be lost through the carelessness of the officials, e.g. in opening a new volume.

CAPACITY OF A SHIP TO BE MADE THE SUBJECT OF A SECURITY.

§ 323. As we set out by assuming that seagoing ships are in their nature moveable subjects, and that we shall not be entitled, in their case, to diverge from the rules that regulate other moveable subjects, except on the ground of some inevitable necessity, we have not as yet given any special answer to the question, what law decides the capacity of a ship to be burdened with a security right? From what we have said, the answer follows directly. The law of the place where the ship for the time is decides this question: but the security right, which has thus been constituted, may very easily again become inoperative, if the ship should reach the territory of another law, in which this security right comes into conflict with the rights of others (see supra, note 29). Again, in so far as security rights are made dependent on entry in a register, and such a register is only kept in the home port of the ship, security rights can only be constituted by way of registration, if the ship is by the law of the flag capable of being subjected to such a security right. The new theory³⁹ proposes in a radical fashion to apply solely the law of the flag. But in so doing it casts the safeguards of local commerce to the winds. It can, however, hardly be supposed that the different States on closer examination will adopt a rule of the kind. Would they allow the real security which they might have on account of any damage caused by a ship, or the legality of a real arrestment, which in its civil effects is hardly distinguishable from a right in security, to be dependent on the good pleasure of the law of the home port of the vessel?

NOTE CC ON §§ 321-323. SECURITIES OVER BRITISH SHIPS.

[Mortgages over British ships are regulated by 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, §§ 76-80. It is provided that a registered owner, who wishes to mortgage ³⁸ Wagner in this sense very properly distinguishes between maritime rights in security and other rights in security. He holds that the lex fori will give the exclusive rule for the former, whereas it is rather the lex rei sitæ that must regulate them. Of course, the court that will determine the case will, as a general rule, be the court in whose territory the ship actually is at the date of the decision.

his ship at any place out of the country in which the port of registry is situated, may apply to the registrar, who shall give him a certificate of mortgage. No such certificate is to be granted so as to authorise any mortgage in the United Kingdom or in any British possession, or by any person not named in the certificate. Every mortgage made under authority of this certificate shall be endorsed on it by a registrar or British consular officer, and they shall rank according to the date of their indorsation. The discharge of any mortgage may be also indorsed on the certificate. These provisions seem to provide ample protection for mortgagees of British ships in foreign ports.

Bottomry bonds, whether in the strict sense, i.e. hypothecations of the ship, or hypothecations of the cargo, are also ruled by the law of the flag according to English law. MacLachlan, p. 63, Westlake, § 219, Lloyd v. Guibert, 1865 (L. R. 1, Q. B. 115). If a person ships goods on a foreign ship, he commits himself to the powers of the master as these exist by the law of the flag. A bottomry bond executed in a Portuguese port, by the master of an Italian ship over the cargo, before the Italian consul, and without any communication with the English owners of cargo, was held good in the English courts, although by English law it would have been bad, as it was good by the law of Italy. Gaetano and Maria, 1882, L. R. 1, P. D. 137. On this subject, see further infra, § 325, on powers of master.]

JOINT OWNERSHIP IN A VESSEL.

§ 324. If the vessel is the property of several persons, then the law of the existing nationality determines the rights of the several co-owners, particularly their right to sell their shares, or to alter their ship's flag.⁴⁰ The question is one simply as to the import of the right of property which these individuals have, and so long as that does not come into conflict with the rights of any third party, which happen to rest upon the law of the place where the ship is, or with the jus publicum of another State, it must continue to be operative. It may also be said, in support of this view, that the individuals who acquired shares in the ship under a particular flag, submitted themselves to the law of this flag. The Congress at Antwerp⁴¹ resolved upon this proposition, which certainly is wide enough, and perhaps is too wide in its scope, viz. :—

“La loi du pavillon régit, en tous pays, les différends relatifs au navire et à la navigation, qui se produisent entre les copropriétaires, entre les propriétaires

*et le capitaine; entre les propriétaires ou le capitaine et les gens de l'équipage.*⁴²

[A British ship, to have that character, must belong wholly to persons entitled to hold such a ship, viz. British subjects or British corporations (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, § 18). All changes in the ownership must be endorsed on the certificate of registry (§ 45). By §§ 62 et seq. when an interest in a British ship has by death or marriage passed to a person who is not qualified to be the owner of a British ship, the person to whom the interest has so passed may apply to the court to order a sale of the property so transmitted within a limited time. Power is given to the court (§ 65) to prohibit for a time any dealing with a ship or shares of a ship. This power may be exercised on the application of any interested person.]

POWER OF THE CAPTAIN TO SELL THE SHIP OR TO GRANT BONDS OVER IT.

§ 325. The question as to what law will determine the power of the captain to sell the ship, or to grant bonds over it, is particularly difficult, and at the same time, is a question of the highest practical importance. We must proceed upon the principles of mandate and agency, for, undoubtedly, the captain is the mandatary of the owner. The law, therefore, which is primarily applicable, is the law of the place where the owner carries on his shipping business, i.e. the law of the home port or of the flag.⁴³ The captain has all the powers which this law gives him irrespective of whether the law of the place where the ship at the time is lying does or does not give him more restricted powers. But are his powers limited to those conferred by the law of the home port?

If we simply apply the principles of an ordinary mandate, we answer this question affirmatively; the Congress at Antwerp⁴⁴ passed a resolution to the same effect, viz. :—

“Les pouvoirs du capitaine pour pourvoir aux besoins du navire, le vendre, l'hypothéquer, contracter un emprunt à la grosse sont déterminés par la loi du pavillon, sauf pour lui, à se conformer, quant à la forme de ces actes, soit à cette loi, soit à celle du lieu du contrat.”

The captain has, however, a certain repute and a certain credit, which are due to the ship of which he is in command; these are to be measured by the usages, and by the law of the place where the ship for the time is. The captain has, accordingly, in addition to the powers we have specified, the powers, not of the lex loci actus, but of the law of the place where the ship is lying. But because he enjoys these powers only in respect of the ship, his powers are limited to dealing with her, and do not extend so far as to enable him to make the owner personally liable over and above.^{45 46} Any restrictions, therefore, imposed upon the ship by the law of the flag, can only be treated, in so far as any disposal of the ship herself is concerned, as special stipulations or agreements⁴⁷ for limitation of the statutory power given by the law of the place where the ship is.⁴⁸

⁴³ See Wharton, § 441; Foote, p. 398. The domicile of the owner is immaterial, Foote p. 409.

⁴⁴ Actes du Congrès, p. 117. To the same effect, see Asser, § 110.

Of course, the ship's flag calls the attention of third parties to the law of the home port of the captain. But, upon the whole, there still are cases of necessity, which are somewhat differently defined according to local ideas, in which the captain will have the power, without special authority, to bind the owner. Thus, to frighten third parties from bargaining with the captain, by holding out to them the possible application of a foreign law, which will be prejudicial to them, may be very disadvantageous to the owner himself, in a case of pressing necessity. But, by the provision of the German Code quoted in note 47, it is only the party contracting in bona fide who would be protected even in such cases. The man who was aware of the limitations imposed by the law of the foreign flag, of a more stringent character, would not be protected. Of course, the lex loci actus does not touch any question of the responsibility of the captain to the owner.

If, however, it is proposed that the law of the place where the ship is⁴⁹ should not be taken into account at all,⁵⁰ on the one hand we should give persons, who have made advances to the master in terms of a law that is ⁴⁵ This distinction between personal responsibility of the owner and the power of the master to dispose of the ship seems to be familiar to the law of England. Cf. Westlake-Holtzendorff, § 141, and Foote, p. 336. What is true of the sale of a ship must also be true of any obligations, so far as they may result in the forced sale of the ship. The decision of the Supreme Ct. of Comm. of 5th March 1877 (Dec. xxii. No. 21, p. 98), which apparently lays down the general proposition that the liability of the owner for acts of the captain is regulated by the law of the flag, is very easily reconciled with what we have said in the text. The pursuers demanded that the German owner should be made liable even to the extent of his "fortune de terre," because this was the rule of liability by the law of the place where the captain had made the transaction in question. This demand the court rejected for the best of reasons. Wagner, p. 137, declares in favour of the application of the lex fori.

⁴⁶ The right of abandonment is always to be tested by the law of the flag. Judgment of the Queen's Bench of 27th Nov. 1865 [Lloyd v. Guibert, L.R. 1, Q.B. 115] cited by Westlake, Rev. vi. p. 394.

⁴⁷ See German Comm. Code, § 500: "The owner who has restricted the statutory powers of the master, can only plead that these restrictions have been exceeded, in questions with third parties, by showing that these third parties were aware of the restrictions."

⁵⁰ It is obvious that the law of the home port may set itself above these principles, which we have dwelt upon in the text with an equitable consideration of the rights of third parties contracting, and may require them unconditionally to obey the law of the flag, e.g. in so far foreign to them, occasion to make use of any rights of seizure or arrest that they may have, to the serious prejudice of the owner and those who are interested in the cargo. The existence of such rights of arrestment the law of England and that of North America are, for instance, inclined to test by the lex rei sitæ, even in connection with the personal liability which is at the bottom of such claims. On the other hand, we should at once fall into conflict with the principles which must be recognised in questions of salvage. For it will often be impossible to ascertain, in such cases, whether a bargain has really been concluded or not, and it is practically absurd to treat cases, in which assistance has been given ex contractu, on an entirely different footing from cases in which it has been given without any contract.⁵¹

[By the law of England and Scotland, the power of the master to sell or bond a ship is to be determined by the law of his flag. (MacLachlan, p. 180; Westlake, § 219; Lloyd v. Guibert, 1865, L. R. 1, Q. B. 115; and Gaetano and Maria, 1882, L. R. 7, P. D. 137. In the former case it is said "reason and convenience are certainly in favour of holding that the authority of the master to bind his owners should be fixed and uniform according to the law of his flag, which is known to both, rather than that it should vary according to the law of the port in which the ship may happen for the time to be." This doctrine does not depend, however, on any "law maritime," a position which is now entirely exploded, but is the result of the best consideration of British jurists for the interests of all concerned. It is, in short, the international doctrine as held by British courts, i.e. British law, with no claim to recognition beyond a British forum, except what its expediency and nationality can win for it. The title conferred by an Admiralty Court of proper jurisdiction must be recognised by British courts. See Dr Lushington in the Segredo, 1853 (Spinks Eccl. and Ad. p. 36.)]

LIABILITY OF THE OWNER FOR DELICTS AND quasi-DELICTS OF THE MASTER.

§ 326. Still less is it possible that the liability of the owner for delicts and quasi-delicts of the master should be measured exclusively by the law as the form of the bond of bottomry is concerned (see §§ 312 and 234 of the Code de Comm. for instance). Then, if the bond has to be sued upon in the country of the home port, the courts of that country must follow the instructions of their own law. But it is possible that the bond should be founded on in an action in the court where it was granted, e.g. by means of an arrestment of the ship. Is this State, or any third State, to be absolutely bound by any provisions which the law of the home port may see fit to enact? Our object must be to make as little as possible depend on the accident of the place in which the action is brought. Many authors decide the question simply in the way the courts of their own country would decide it, and think only of the case of ships of their own being sued upon bonds in these courts. Mr Justice Byles [and Dr Lushington] as cited by MacLachlan (p. 171) argue that, unless the court decided exclusively on the law of England, English shipowners would be prejudiced. It seems very questionable to me whether this argument is worth much.

⁵¹ Phillimore (§ 823) in the interest of bona fides, goes so far as to say that where money is borrowed for some necessary purpose of the ship, the lex loci is sufficient even if it be the case that the lender were acquainted with the restricted powers of the captain.

of the home port. That is in direct antagonism to the public safety and to the equality of all before the law, both of which things the State must study to maintain within its own territory. A seagoing ship is an engine often of great power, and capable of doing great damage to person and property outside itself. If this or that foreign State sees fit to discharge the owner of all liability for reparation, and to refer the injured party to the master, who is often unable to make good the loss, should we, in whose country the owner is liable, be forced to concede such a privilege to foreign ships and foreign owners? Of course, we cannot go so far as to hold the foreign owner personally liable without any restriction, because in his person the owner is not subject to the foreign law of the place where the delict was committed. But it is quite consistent with a rigorous observance of the due limits of the competency of the jurisdiction of different States that the ship should be liable, if the law of the place where the damage was done declares either that the owner is liable without limit, or liable up to the value of his ship. But again, on the other hand, there is no necessity for enlarging the liability of the owner beyond what the law of the place where the damage has been done allows, even if the law of the home port sanctions the larger scale. The law, which allows the more extensive liability, does so in the interest of public security, not for the purpose of fining the owner. If, then, the law which undertakes locally to ensure the safety of the public, contents itself with a slighter liability, we may hold that there should not be an additional liability in accordance with the law of the flag.⁵² In the results at which we arrive we see a reflection of the provisions, which are being more and more adopted in the legal systems of individual States, with some differences no doubt in detail, without regard to private international law. The ship herself makes the owner liable only, however, to the amount of her own value. The freight which has been earned is, however, in such questions an accessory of the ship in so far as the law of the place where the damage is done pronounces it to be so, and in so far as the freight is secured by a right of retention or by impledgment, or as an outstanding claim of debt is subject to the law of the place where the damage is done, or to any other law similarly expressed. We shall consider hereafter what the result should be, if the damage is done on the high seas.

The view which is most extensively held at the present time, but which cannot surely be fully reconciled with the necessities of public safety in each locality, holds that even in claims upon delict the liability of the owner should be determined by the law of the owner's home port exclusively. To this effect Lyon-Caen (J. ix. p. 258), Abbot (p. 256), MacLachlan (p. 175), Lewis (pp. 48, 49), on § 451 of the German Code of Commerce, and the Supreme Commercial Court of Germany, have all expressed themselves.⁵³ There must necessarily, however, be some doubt cast upon the effect which judgments on this question, pronounced in suits brought in the forum domicilii of the owner, and not in that of the delicti commissi, should have on our conclusions. The considerations which may be advanced on behalf of the lex loci actus are in such a case apt to fall into the background.⁵⁴ On the other hand, the distinction between the unlimited liability of the owner, and his liability as limited by the value of the ship, has not as yet been taken with sufficient sharpness in any judgment.⁵⁵ Wagner, of course, in this case also declares in favour of the lex fori.

⁵² Any statute, therefore, which introduces a liability confined to the value of the ship, proceeds entirely in conformity with the principles of private international law, if it extends that liability to the vessels of foreign nations, in so far as the event that raises liability has taken place within the territorial waters of the State. See the English Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 63, § 54): "The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign." Originally this implied an indulgence for foreign vessels: before its date it was not the statute law, but the common law maritime, that was applied to them, and it was held that this implied an unlimited liability. But by English law the liability of the owner does not at present extend to the full value of the ship (see Wagner, p. 137). Asser, § 110 ad fin. finds in the English enactment we have quoted a conflict between the positive law of the statute and international law, as the latter is to be deduced from general principles.

CLAIMS ARISING OUT OF COLLISIONS. COLLISIONS IN HARBOURS AND TERRITORIAL WATERS.

§ 327. Claims raised on account of collisions⁵⁶ between ships,⁵⁷ which have arisen so frequently of late (Anseglung, Zusammenstoss, Abordage), are claims ex delicto or quasi ex delicto, or claims which arise out of the general guarantee or safeguard, which the law desires to afford to persons and property. There can, therefore, be no reasonable doubt that, if the collision occurred in any harbour, or in waters subject to any definite sovereign

⁵³ Judgment of 21st Sep. 1878 (Dec. xxiv. § 26, p. 83): "In so far as the owner is sued on such grounds by third persons, the action must be founded on some obligation created by statute, and not upon any contract or delict, and the owner may require that he shall be judged by the law of his own country in this matter, the only law to which he has subjected himself in carrying on his business."

⁵⁴ See Story, § 286*b*, who very prudently expresses himself thus even in reference to contract debts: "But it is far from being certain that foreign courts, and especially the courts of the country where the advances or supplies were furnished, would adopt the same rules, if the lender or supplier had acted with good faith, and in ignorance of the want of authority of the master." See, too, Brodie's excellent remarks cited by Story. [Brodie on Stair, ii. pp. 955, 956.]

⁵⁶ This (zusammenstoss) is the technical expression used in § 736 of the German Code of Commerce.

⁵⁷ See below, under "extra-territoriality," for the peculiarly difficult case where the ship that does the damage is a ship of war of some foreign State.

power, the law of the place where the damage was done, and no other law, must be applied, and this is beyond question the view which now prevails.^{58 59} The Congress at Antwerp, too, in 1885 (Actes, p. 145, Quest. 60), expressed itself thus, viz.:—

“L'abordage dans les ports, fleuves et autres eaux intérieures, est réglé par la loi du lieu où il se produit :”

and the Institute of International Law, following Sacerdote's proposals, in 1888 reached the same result. Special presumptions, which the law not unfrequently sets up as to the fault of the crew of one ship or the other, e.g. where the one is in motion and the other at anchor, or where the one is a steamer and the other a sailing vessel,⁶⁰ are in these matters to be treated as part of the substantive law of the case, and are, like the other points, to be decided by the lex loci actus, not by the lex fori.⁶¹

It is, however, precisely in this connection that it becomes plain that, in order to lead to any practical result, the liability by the lex loci actus must, to the extent of the value of the ship, attach to the owner as well as to the master. If the master only is responsible by the lex loci actus,⁶² the practical operation of this law will, in most cases, in view of the large sums of damages involved in such cases, be a complete mockery.

This rule must in particular be applied to the solution of the question

⁵⁸ Cf. Abbot on Shipping, p. 579 of 12th ed. Collisions between ships of foreign nationality on the English coast are in practice decided in accordance with the law of England; in the case of collisions in a foreign territory, damages will only be awarded by an English court if the foreign law and the law of England concur in holding that there is an obligation to pay damages. This is in accordance with the ordinary English rule as to delicts (Abbot, p. 580). Foote's explanation on this point (pp. 482, 483) is less satisfactory. He throws aside the lex fori, and proposes that, as a matter of principle, the general law maritime should rule, and then he allows the English legislature the power of modifying this law maritime according to its pleasure, and so as to bind English courts absolutely. I cannot discover in what this proposal differs from an application of the lex fori. See, too, Lyon-Caen (J. ix. p. 598); Asser-Rivier, § 112; Trib. Comm. Marseilles, 10th June 1869; C. Montpellier, 31st March 1873, J. i. p. 28; Judgment of English Court of Admir. 26th November 1867, The Halley, L.R. 2, Ad. and Ecc. p. 3 reported by Külm in his Zeitschrift für das ges. Handelsr. xii. pp. 425-430. The German Imp. Ct. (i.) 30th May 1883 (Dec. xxi. § 24) applies the law of Germany to all collisions occurring in German waters, and emphasises the lex loci actus. In the judgment of 12th July 1886 (xix. § 2) the same division of the court gave more prominence to the coercitive character of such rules of law, and preferred therefore the lex fori.

⁵⁹ The two judgments of the English Ct. of Admiralty, reported in J. xv. p. 114, of dates 26th July 1886, and on appeal 15th February 1887 [Augusta v. Chilian, 5, Law Times Reps. p. 326], determine the question whether the ship had a compulsory pilot on board, whose advice the captain was obliged to follow, according to the lex loci actus, while the question whether on that account the owner of the English ship, which did the damage, was liable in damages to the other ship, also an English ship, was in their view to be determined by the law of England.

⁶⁰ On these presumptions see Lewis, Seerecht, ii. p. 136, note.

⁶¹ To the same effect on both points judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Comm. of 21st September 1878 (Dec. xxiv. § 26, p. 83).

which is so differently answered in different maritime laws,⁶³ viz whether the owner is free of liability if the negligence is the negligence of a compulsory pilot, whom the master is, by the lex loci actus, compelled to take.⁶⁴ But, conversely, the liability of the owner, which in other matters is determined by the law of the flag, disappears if the lex loci actus throws no liability on him.⁶⁵

NOTE DD ON § 327. COLLISIONS.

[By the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862 (25 and 26 Vic. c. 63), § 54, it is provided that no shipowner, be he British or foreign, shall be liable beyond a certain amount per ton of his ship's tonnage for damage caused by the improper navigation of his vessel; unless there be actual fault or privity on the owner's part, a case which is not likely to occur. This is applicable wherever the locus of the damage may have been. By § 57 of the same Act it is provided that, when foreign ships are within British jurisdiction, the regulations for preventing collisions prescribed by the Act shall apply to them, and in any cases arising in any British court of justice concerning matters happening within British jurisdiction, foreign ships shall, so far as regards such regulations, be treated as if they were British ships.

In the case of collisions in foreign territorial waters, the law of England will not give damages unless both the foreign and the English law concur in holding damages to be due (Abbot as cited in note 58; Westlake, § 197; The Halley, 1868, L. R. 2, C. P. 193). In this case it is, however, observed that the English court will enquire into the state of the foreign law, "as one of the facts upon which the existence of the tort, or the right to damages, may depend."

This principle is illustrated by a series of cases. By the law of England, as expressed in § 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 (17 and 18 Vic. c. 104), no owner nor master of any ship is to be "answerable to any person whatever for any loss" occasioned by the fault of a qualified pilot within the district where the employment of such a pilot is compulsory. Now the employment of a pilot on entering the port of Havre is by French law compulsory: a collision occurred there between two English ships, and an action of damages was raised in the English courts. The defendants pleaded the compulsory pilotage. The court, however,—after being informed by skilled evidence that the functions of a pilot in French waters were not the same as in England; that, whereas in England the pilot supersedes the master in the control of the conduct of the ship, and must not be interfered with, “except under most extraordinary circumstances,” by the master, in France by French law he does not supersede the master, but acts as his adviser only,—refused to give effect to the plea of non-liability, even although, as matter of fact, the master had given up the charge of the vessel to the pilot. The court ascertained what the relation of master and pilot was by French law, and having ascertained that fact, they applied the law of England, Augusta v. Chilian 1887 (5, Law Times Reps. p. 326). The same rule had been followed in the case of the Guy Mannering, 1882 (L. R. 7, P. D. 52 and 132), where the locus of the collision was the Suez Canal, the rules of which as to the import of compulsory pilotage are similar to those in force in France, and in the case of the Agnes Otto, 1887 (L.R. 12, P.D. 56), the locus of the collision in that case being the Danube.

Carrying out the principle enunciated in the case of the Halley, the English courts will not give damages against a foreign ship under compulsory pilotage in the full sense, whatever the law of the foreigner's flag may lay down on the matter. Westlake, § 204, and cases there cited.]

COLLISIONS ON THE HIGH SEAS.

§ 328. But what are we to say of collisions on the high seas? The ordinary rules as to delicts and quasi-delicts are not applicable in such cases, because there is no distinct territory subject to some sovereign power, in which the act, resulting in damage, has been done. One can well understand that in this case recourse has frequently been had to the lex fori, as a way out of the difficulty.⁶⁶ But to apply the lex fori is to make this important obligation to give reparation dependent on the one hand on chance, or, on the other, on the caprice of the pursuer. It involves therefore a plain injustice, and accordingly Lyon-Caen (J. ix. p. 600) declares the common law of all nations, which knows no obligation for reparation except on account of the culpa of some individual, to be applicable, and alone applicable, to all collisions on the high seas. We cannot,

⁶⁶ See Asser-Rivier, 113, and the French judgments given by Lyon-Caen (J. ix. p. 601). Wagner (p. 14) is of course of this view. To the same effect, too, the grounds of judgment in the decision of the German Imp. Ct. (i.) of 12th July 1886 (Seuffert, xlii. § 88), already referred to. See, on the other hand, the editor's note in J. xiv. p. 442. A judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Lübeck of 30th Jan. 1849, Bremer Samml. vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 8, held that § 10, subsec. 1, of the Hanseatic maritime code, according to which, in the case of an accidental collision, both ships take equal shares of the loss, was applicable to a collision between two foreign vessels. See C. de Paris, 16th Feb. 1882 (J. x. p. 145). See, on the other hand, Clunet (J. x. p. 148): “Comment soutenir en droit que par cela seul qu'un tribunal est compétent pour connaître d'une affaire c'est la loi territoriale qui doit être appliquée.” however, in modern times, think of appealing, in the matter of private law, to any such universal law, particularly in maritime affairs. We shall be more likely to attain a sound result by the following reasoning. Since no law can lay obligations on foreign persons who are not within its territory, we cannot require more from any one who is sued than what his own law, the law of his domicile, imposes on him; and again, because a law which apportions damage that is purely accidental must rest solely on equitable considerations, which would not be satisfied if native ships were unfairly prejudiced, no larger reparation can be demanded than the law of the pursuer's domicile would give in similar cases to the owner against whom the claim in question is being made. The Antwerp Congress of 1885 (quest. 60, Actes du Congrès, p. 145) pronounced precisely to this effect, viz. :—

“L'abordage en pleine mer, entre deux navires de même nationalité, est réglé par la loi nationale.

“Si les navires sont de nationalité différente, chacun est obligé dans la limite de la loi de son pavillon et ne peut recevoir plus que cette loi lui attribue.”

In practice an inclination to adopt the principle has already manifested itself in some cases,⁶⁷ and it has been most recently approved by the Institute of International Law in 1888.^{68 69}

⁶⁸ See Trib. Comm. Brest, 22nd Jan. 1887, and the confirmatory judgment of the Court at Rennes, 21st Dec. 1887 (J. xv. p. 80). These apply the law of the “navire abordeur.”

See Story, § 423*g*. He hesitates, however, between our view of reciprocity and the lex fori. Although the judgment cited by him in his note 3 to § 423 seems to favour the latter rule in the reasons given for the decision, it is not by any means conclusive, because in the particular case the forum and the domicile of the defender were identical, and, according to the law of the forum, the defender was not required to make good the damage that had been caused. On the other hand, the judgment of the Court of Rouen, cited by Story in § 423*g*, note 3, seems to favour the view taken in the text. A French ship was run down by an English ship on the high seas. The court refused the pursuer's demands. Story, however, does not give the grounds of judgment, and I have not been able to find them.

See Wharton, § 472*a*, on the English decisions. The Supreme Court of Portugal, in an interesting judgment of 21st June 1880 (J. viii. p. 177), applied the law of Portugal to a case where a Portuguese ship had been injured within sight of the Portuguese coast. Lyon-Caen and L. Renault (Dr. c. § 2027) very soundly refute the reasoning which is used to advocate the application of the lex fori with special reference to French law, and in particular point to the hardships which may arise from the lex fori, since this law may be quite unknown to the very persons who have suffered loss. They declare in favour of the law of the flag of the injured ship. But this is quite arbitrary; the law which is binding on the injured person, may have no obligatory force for him who does the injury. On equitable grounds, however, we may justify ourselves in holding that if the formalities required by the law of the injured ship are satisfied, that is enough.

Again, can the right to prosecute a claim for reparation be tied up by the necessity of observing certain formalities and certain specified periods of time?⁷⁰ Is the principle which we have suggested to hold good in these matters also? It is plain that by logical sequence, where damage has been done in a harbour or in waters belonging to some particular sovereign power, the law of the place where the damage was done must be applied. No considerations of practical inconvenience can be urged against this conclusion, since in such cases the injured party can easily acquaint himself with the provisions of the lex loci actus, and satisfy their requirements.⁷¹

But, as regards damage done on the high seas, it would be necessary to observe the law of the person who is under the obligation to make reparation, since these formalities and periods of time are plainly introduced in his interest; he, at least, could make no complaint. But then it is just these statutory provisions that the injured party may often find it highly difficult to observe. He will often be unable to learn what they are in time, if, e.g. the collision has taken place at night, or in a fog, and if the vessel that did the damage has made off quickly. It may even sometimes happen that it is impossible at once to ascertain what the nationality of the ship that did the injury is.

Labbé,⁷² accordingly, takes the view that the period for making claims in such cases must, in accordance with natural justice, be determined by the circumstances of the particular case. But, as Lyon-Caen rightly points out, it might be difficult to obtain practical recognition of this view, consistently with the strict positive enactments of the various municipal systems of law. Again, on a sound view of the matter, the rule "locus regit actum" can only be used to this extent, that the form of claim which the injured party must make is a valid form, if it is in conformity with the laws of the place where it is made. The rule "locus regit actum" cannot be extended to the question of the period within which the claim has to be made. The Congress at Antwerp, recognising the principle by which the law of the place where the damage was done will regulate the period and the form of the claim, if the damage was done in territorial waters, a river or a harbour, adopted almost unanimously this proposition :—

⁷¹ French courts have frequently, even in cases in which the injury was done in the territorial waters of some power, applied the French law as to the period within which claims must be made and actions brought, where the actions were directed against French owners. Cf. C. de Montpellier, 31st May 1873 (J. i. p. 29), and C. d'Aix, 12th July 1871 (J. i. p. 26); Trib. Comm. Seine, 3rd Sep. 1883 (J. xi. p. 280). To the opposite effect, and pointing out the injustice that lies in that procedure, are Lyon-Caen (J. ix. p. 604), and Clunet (J. xi. p. 282). The injured party is often unable to ascertain beforehand what the powers of the court are.

*“ Si l'abordage a eu lieu en mer, le capitaine conserve ses droits en réclamant dans les formes et délais prescrits par la loi de son pavillon, par celle du navire abordeur, ou par celle du premier port de relâche.”*⁷³

It was not, however, overlooked that in adopting this rule there was a departure from strict principle. The proposition as one de lege ferenda is one that may be approved of. If we take our stand on positive law, or adhere to strict logic, we can never hold that the law of the injured party should be applied.⁷⁴ On the other hand, in so far as a real prescription of actions is concerned,⁷⁵ although the period prescribed in § 436 of the French Code de Commerce is not to be regarded as a prescriptive period, there is no reason for departing from the rule which we reached by deduction, viz. that we can only admit an obligation to make reparation, if it exists both by the law of the ship that does the damage and of that which suffers it.⁷⁶

CLAIMS FOR SALVAGE.

§ 329. Claims for salvage of ship and cargo are undoubtedly quasi-contractual. Accordingly the lex loci actus will be applied, if there is any such law in the case, i.e. if the salvage or assistance has been performed or given within the territory of a civilised State. The same law, too, in respect it is the lex rei sita, will determine questions as to any real right or rights of retention that may be claimed over wreckage and salvaged goods.^{77 78}

On the other hand, very serious legal difficulties are presented by the case of salvage on the high seas, or within a territory that has no

⁷³ Actes, i. p. 146. According to the resolutions of the Institute of International Law (Lausanne 1888), the law of the claimant was to rule. But the claimant may make his claim either in the court which has jurisdiction according to the rules of his own law, or in the court to which the law of the other party attributes jurisdiction.

⁷⁴ We should rather hold that the law of the first port that could be reached should rule. Lewis takes a different view: he thinks that the law of the injured person must take the leading place. Grassi is contented to let the law of either party rule.

⁷⁷ See, on this subject, the discussion of cases in mercantile law in Asher's Monatsschrift (Hamburg, pt. i. 1836, p. 146), and the account there given of George I.'s proceedings in 1824 against the wreckers at Bremen, and the regulations as to wreckage in the Duchy of Oldenburg in 1775. Also Asser-Rivier, § 114. Turin, 19th Aug. 1885 (J. xiv. p. 241); Towage in territorial waters.

system of law that can be recognised by a civilised State as binding on its subjects. The consideration that no law but the law of the home port can lay any obligations upon the ship and the owner for the voyage on the high seas, would dispose us to apply the law of the salved vessel, or of the vessel whose cargo has been salved.⁷⁹ On the other hand, it has been argued that the purely voluntary act of salvage must be ruled by the law of the salvor, while the ship which was salved was in a situation of danger, and, if there were no law to regulate the matter, would have to pay whatever price the salvor asked.⁸⁰ The salvor, it is said, must know on what recompense he may calculate, and thus the general interest will be best consulted by applying the law of the flag of the salvor.⁸¹ It was this argument from expediency which chiefly moved the Congress at Antwerp to adopt a resolution that—

*L'assistance en mer est rémunérée d'après la loi de l'assistant.*⁸²

The legal ground, however, on which we must proceed, which leads to the same result, is the fact that when a ship is in distress the fiction that she is a part of the country, the flag of which she flies, is no longer completely applicable to her.⁸³ A ship in distress, that can no longer manage itself, is dependent rather on the salving ship, in so far at least as the operation of salvage is concerned. Thus we can, on legal considerations, as well as on considerations of expediency, defend the application of the law of the salvor's flag. That does not, however, prevent special provisions of the law of the home port of the ship that is salved, which are particularly favourable to the ship or the persons who take part in the salvage, from being applied, if the law of the home port specially provides that this shall be done. For we cannot doubt the competency ⁷⁹ See the opinions of Saintelette, Engel, Vrancken, and Lyon-Caen at the Antwerp Congress (Actes, i. pp. 147-150).

⁸⁰ So Spée (Registrar of the Ct. of Comm. at Antwerp), Actes, i. p. 147.

⁸³ See the interesting judgment of the court at Rennes, 17th April 1883 (J. xi. p. 512, pracs. p. 514). The question there was as to a wreck found on the high seas.

Demangeat, J. xii. p. 143, puts the application of the law of the salvor on the assumption of a negotiorum gestio, since the ship that is salved is really altogether passive in the matter. That does not seem to me to be conclusive. If we are not to give effect to the considerations stated in the text, we cannot assert that the law of the salvor will rule a negotiorum gestio, particularly if we proceed on the principle that the law of the place where the thing is done is decisive in cases of negotiorum gestio.

of that law to impose such obligations on its own ships, for the encouragement of salvors. Thus, from the point of view of international law, no objection can be taken to the competency of the English statute of 1861 [24 Vict. c. 10, § 9], which sanctions a payment for the salvage of persons who are on board British ships, wherever the salvage may have been performed.^{84 85}

To apply the law of the salvor seems no doubt to carry with it this disadvantage, to which attention was called at the proceedings of the Congress at Antwerp, that if ships of different nationalities take part in the salvage, different principles would have to be applied to the same act of salvage. It would not, however, in that case be inequitable to apply the law of that ship on which the great burden of the assistance which was rendered fell, and in doubt the law of that ship that was the first to bring assistance. The amount of the salvage will in any case be determined on equitable principles. If, however, the work of salvage began in one territory and was completed in another, or if it began on the high seas and was completed in the seas adjoining some particular territory—which latter is the ordinary case—the only law we can then consider is the law that regulates the first part of the assistance given.⁸⁶ If, lastly, the salvor should take action at the request of some one—e.g. of the consul of the State to which the ship in distress belonged—then the law under which the request was made would govern the case, and no other law could do so. For contracts for salvage are lawful, and we must allow the ship to be represented by her consul, in so far as the exclusive application of the law of the coast is concerned. By holding fast to this principle of representation, questions which arise may often be simplified, particularly ⁸⁴ See MacLachlan, p. 621; Asser-Rivier, § 114 ad fin. The rule holds good within English waters for the salvage of persons who are on board foreign ships. We might, following out this, be tempted in certain circumstances to reverse the rule which we laid down for cases of collisions, and to say that the person who has performed the salvage may choose between his own law and that of the salvaged ship, according as the one or the other is more favourable to him. But, if we were to have regard in that way to two different systems of legislation, we should find ourselves involved in another set of difficulties, since, as a general rule, the amount of salvage is first ascertained by a special order from the proper officials, in which it is impossible to apply the same sharp principles as can be applied in the case of collisions.

as consular treaties often concede a certain right of interference to the consuls of the country to which ships in distress belong.^{87 88} If the law of the ship that gives the assistance is applied, and especially if it is applied in the way we have indicated, this result, besides, will generally follow, that in most cases the officials, in estimating the amount to be paid for salvage, will have to apply their own law. That simplifies the whole matter, without making the owners of the salvaged ship and of the cargo so much dependent on accident and caprice as would be the case, if the principle were that the lex fori should rule. If the lex fori gave the rule, the captain of the salvaging ship would be tempted to bring his ship to that port, the laws of which were most favourable to him. If an appeal is made, before a maritime court or official, to a foreign law, the person taking the appeal to that law in his own interest must, as in other cases, prove his assertions. In doubt these courts or officials will be guided by the law of their own country, while again, as more and more consular officials are appointed, it will not be very difficult to obtain information as to the laws of other countries.

CONTRACTS OF AFFREIGHTMENT.

§ 330. The general rules of the law of obligations, and all that we said in that connection about land carriage, are applicable to contracts of carriage by sea. In such cases, the principal thing to observe is the law of the country in whose business language the documents signed by the parties are expressed,⁸⁹ and it is particularly unsound to attempt to take as our exclusive guide in this matter the law of the place of destination.⁹⁰

⁸⁷ Asser, § 115 (p. 225), at least holds it to be desirable to insert some such provision in consular treaties.

⁸⁹ See the judgments of the German courts cited by Wagner, p. 136, note 19: in particular the judgment of the Imperial Ct. of Germany (i.) of 16th April 1881 (Dec. iv. § 27, p. 87).

[The form of a charter-party will be regulated by the law of the place where it was made (Lamy v. Gentles & Co. Trib. Comm. de Caen, 1883, J. xi. p. 282). The case of Lloyd v. Guibert cited below, note 90, makes the law of the flag, and not that of the place of performance, the rule for determining the effect of the charter-party. This will multo magis be so if the contracting parties had the law of the flag in view on entering into their contract (Missouri S.S. Co. 1888, L. R. 42, Ch. D. p. 321).

The Scottish courts would no doubt follow these recent English decisions, if the point were distinctly tabled for their decision, but I find that in the case of the Immanuel, 1887 (Ct of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xv. p. 152), Lord Justice Clerk Moncrieff says that a bill of lading must be judged by the law of the place of performance: while Lord Young, in the same case, repudiates the law of the flag as interpretative of the bill of lading, and prefers to judge it by the law of Scotland, since it is an instrument "written in our language and expressed in our forms." His lordship disputes the right of an owner—in this case a Dane—to send out his ship "to trade with all the world," framing his contract in the English language, and in English technical expressions, and then to appeal to the law of his flag. These views were, however, only obiter, for the point determined in the case was whether the statement in a bill of lading was conclusive evidence as to the quantity of cargo received. This was held to be a question of evidence to be ruled by the law of the forum, not by that of the flag or of the locus contractus.

Whether a master should have refused to deliver goods without production of the bill of lading, is a question as to the modus of performing his contract which must be ruled by the law of the place of performance. Stettin, 1889 (L.R. 14, P.D. 142).]

AVERAGE.

§ 331. Strictly considered, all provisions for apportioning among all concerned loss occasioned by measures adopted in perils by sea, all provisions for average loss,⁹¹ are simply part of the law of carriage. One can easily understand that on this point the ordinary practice in maritime law, established by usage, has been to apply the law of the port of flag; and accordingly the English court applied the law of France, and not that of England. The obligations arising from a bill of lading were held, in a judgment of the German Ct. of App. of 30th May 1879 (Dec. xxv. p. 195), and in one of the German Imp. Ct. (i.) of 5th December 1887 (Dec. xx. p. 57, § 13), to be ruled by the law of the port of destination. But that is specially inconvenient for modern commerce, in which the port of destination is altered by telegrams despatched after the vessel has started. The captain could not, if that were the rule, know timeously what his obligations are, and he may have a different set of obligations with regard to each person interested in the cargo, if the ship calls at several ports. The case is different as regards the transference of real rights over the cargo by means of a bill of lading; see supra, §§ 225, 228.

destination.⁹² The first thing that contributed to this result was that, in the Middle Ages, goods were generally consigned to factories, which were subject to the same law, in the matters which we are now considering, as was the person who sent the goods. Subsequently, again, it was found expedient to adopt the principle of taking the law of the port of destination and not that of the port of despatch as regulative, out of consideration for the average adjusters, who would thus be able to do their work according to the law of the port of destination, with which they were familiar. If the ship in the course of her voyage took goods on board from different ports, this plan secured a common law applicable to all interested, which would not have been the case if the law of the place where the goods came on board had been adopted.⁹³

We could hardly, however, on logical grounds—unless we are to consider the convenience of the average adjusters of decisive importance—justify a proposal to set the port into which a ship is driven on the same footing as the port to which she is bound, with a due regard to certainty in the application of the law.⁹⁴ And in modern times, since it frequently happens that the port of destination is first made known to the ship during the voyage by telegram at some port of call, when a floating cargo is sold; and since goods are taken on board at different ports, where the ship puts in, to be forwarded to different destinations,⁹⁵ it has been justly

⁹² See discussion and decisions of the Court of Hamburg in Asher, Rechtsfälle, i. p. 204; Asser-Rivier, § 117, C. de Bourdeaux, 21st January 1875 (J. ii. p. 351); English Ct. of Comm. Pleas, Mavro v. Ocean Marine Ass. Co. 1875, L.R. 10, C.P. 414 (J. iii. p. 188); German Sup. Ct. of App. 24th September 1872 (Dec. vii. p. 168); 23rd December 1872 (Dec. viii. p. 239); see Sachs, Rev. vi. p. 243; also decision of 13th November 1878 (Dec. 25, p. 1); Wharton, § 443, and the cases which he cites; Westlake-Holtzendorff, § 209; Judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Norway, 25th March 1886, J. xv. p. 151, and French jurisprudence as indicated by the decisions there cited; Ulrich, p. 397, on English law, and p. 451, on that of the United States. In the judgment by the German Sup. Ct. of Comm. of 23rd December 1872 referred to, it is said that while the German Commercial Code did not declare the law of the port of destination to be regulative, the only reason for not doing so was the fear that such a general rule would, contrary to the wishes of the parties, exclude the application of German law: that there was no doubt that the law of the place of adjustment of the average would be applied as a general rule. (See Protocols of the Commission for consideration of the German Comm. Code.)

⁹⁴ See the discussion by Asher, referred to in the beginning of note 92. Voigt-Seeböhm (Deutsche Versicherungs Recht, 1887, p. 528) is of a different opinion.

⁹⁵ In the discussion by Asher, at p. 218, it is said of a case like this: "Each part of the voyage has its separate destination, and each of the different bundles of common interests which exists during the course of the voyage, must be ruled by the law of the next destination. The person, then, who is interested in the cargo that is bound for the last destination will be subject in succession to several systems of law. Although this seems startling for the moment, the difficulty disappears when we remember that the persons interested in the cargo have maintained that to apply the law of the port of destination is to make everything depend on accident and caprice, and gives occasion for injustices and anomalies of various kinds. Lyon-Caen accordingly proposes to regulate the matter of average by the law of the ship's flag,⁹⁶ and the Institute of International Law has adopted this proposal.⁹⁷ Lyon-Caen supports his proposal, on the one hand, by noting that in the general case the average loss takes place on the high seas, and then the law of the ship's flag suggests itself, and again by urging that to have regard to the law of the flag, which is ascertained beforehand, may very reasonably be supposed to be in accordance with the intention of parties. But the Congress at Antwerp was of a different opinion.⁹⁸ They thought the proposal first of all too strong an innovation, counter to long usage, which would bring confusion and danger with it.⁹⁹ Again, besides the protest of the average adjusters who were present, the argument was also pressed that merchants frequently employed ships, the law of whose flag in questions of average it would take years to ascertain (e.g. Chinese vessels); whereas, in the majority of cases, the place of destination was certain, while it was the consignee, and not the consigner, who was interested in the fate of the cargo. Lastly, it was said, a necessity might arise in the course of the voyage for transferring the cargo to other ships, and to different ships of different nationalities. What law would be applicable in such a case, if the law of the flag was to be the law sanctioned by principle? The Congress in the end, in direct contradiction to Lyon-Caen's proposal, and after rejecting an intermediate proposal, adopted this simple rule, against the opinion, no doubt, of prominent members (Quest. 36), viz. :—

“Le règlement des avaries se fait d'après la loi du port ou le chargement se délivre.”

This declares the law of the place where the ship is actually discharged,¹⁰⁰ be that in consequence of a mere accident, to be the rule, and not the law of the port of destination. This solution,¹⁰¹ which certainly suits the convenience of the average adjusters and insurance agents, but just as certainly does not suit the convenience of traders, and of the insurers themselves, is utterly unlawyerlike, because it simply commits the issue to the decision of pure chance.¹⁰² To arrive at a true solution, we rights against each other, as well as against the owner.” We may accept this solution, if the ports of call, and the ports in which goods are taken on board, are exactly known beforehand. But, in any case, the result will be great expense and complication.

must place in the front rank the intention of the parties, whether that be actually expressed or implied, but still declared in some way or other.¹⁰³ In any case, there is nothing to prevent the parties from placing themselves under some particular law for the purpose of settling questions of average. If there are definite points on which we can base any further assumptions, this much we can assert, that if one person, or several persons domiciled in the same territory, charter a ship, they declare that they will be ruled by the law of the port of destination. This we can support by past usage and by the other reasons urged at the Congress. This, too, we may assert, that, if these persons reserve to themselves the right to declare the port of destination while the ship is on her voyage, and not sooner, the law of this port may, in doubt, be accepted as the rule. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that various reasons recommend the law of the ship's nationality where the ship takes up piece goods for various destinations, or is chartered, it may be, for various destinations.¹⁰⁴ More modern English jurisprudence, of which Foote (p. 392 et seq.) gives interesting notes, has already approved of these reasons—a fact which is well worth consideration—and is more and more inclined to declare in favour of the law of the flag. Scientific lawyers cannot, however, settle anything more in abstracto, since the real determinant is the intention of parties, and usage does not support the application of the law of the flag. All that can be done is to call the attention of the parties and the legislative powers of different countries to the advantages which, in certain cases at least, will result from the application of the law of the ship's nationality.¹⁰⁵ [The British law on this subject is that the port of discharge shall, in the absence of agreement, give the rule. See MacLachlan, pp. 690, 691, and infra, p. 732, note 115.]

MARINE INSURANCE IN A CASE OF AVERAGE.

§ 332. The law which regulates the matter of average will also indirectly give the rule¹⁰⁶ for ascertaining the extent of the damage which the insurer has to make good to the insured.¹⁰⁷ The marine insurance does not, therefore, get rid of the question as to the application of the ¹⁰³ See, in this sense, Foote, p. 418.

¹⁰⁴ In the same way, if the ship is only chartered in part, and the master or owner is only left with the power of taking in goods for other destinations. Jacobs, the president of the maritime law section of the Congress at Antwerp, proposed (Actes, i. p. 125): "Le règlement des avaries se fait d'après la loi du pavillon, lorsque le navire n'a pas au moment du départ, une destination déterminée."

¹⁰⁷ Doubts may occur even on this point. See e.g. the Dutch decisions reported by Hingst. Rev. xiv. pp. 417, 418. But it would be illogical (as Asser, §§ 116, 117, holds) to hold the law local law, but rather applies the local law to other persons. With a view to marine insurance, proposals have been made very recently for a substantially uniform code on the matter of average. Rules of this kind were first set up in 1860 by the English Association for the Promotion of Social Science, and they have been revised by the Association [German] for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations (York and Antwerp rules). [These rules were revised by this Association at their meeting in Liverpool in August 1890, J. xix. p. 124.] The Congress at Antwerp laid down a number of propositions as to average, the adoption of which was recommended¹⁰⁸

LIABILITY OF THE OWNER ON THE MASTER'S CONTRACTS.

§ 333. We have already noticed that it would be wrong to measure the powers of the master as regards securities over the ship solely by the law of the flag, and just as wrong only to hold the owner responsible, in cases of collision, according to that law, where the collisions occur in waters that belong to some definite territorial power. Accordingly, we cannot unreservedly assent to the proposition adopted by the Congress at Antwerp (Actes, i. p. 129), whereby it was declared that that law, and it alone, would regulate the responsibility of the owner for all acts of the master and crew, of whatever kind. In cases of claims on delict, and those which arise quasi ex delicto, the public and coercitive character of the local rules of law involved necessarily demands, as we have noticed, that the owner should be liable up to the value¹⁰⁹ of the vessel, if the lex loci actus sets up such a liability.¹¹⁰ In the case of contracts, the person who does not know positively that the captain has only a limited authority must at least be protected up to this value. And, even if a contracting party does know that the law of the flag gives the captain more restricted powers, he should receive this amount of protection, in so far as he does not know that the captain was intended to be confined within these limits. For the owner is quite likely to find it for his own interest to enlarge the powers of the captain so as to meet the rules of liability prescribed by what happens to be the lex loci actus on each occasion, while it will often be intolerable¹¹¹ to

of the place of adjustment to rule the question of average, but the law of the place where the policy of insurance was made to decide the question whether the insurer is liable for certain average losses. See, too, Westlake, § 220; Wharton, § 444. The latter, however, does not express himself so distinctly.

¹⁰⁹ We can agree in the result of a judgment of the Supreme German Ct. of App. of 5th March 1877 (Dec. xxii. pp. 88, 98; Seuffert, xxxiii. § 98); liability in this case was negatived only so far as it exceeded the value of the ship (fortune de mer). The reasons for the judgment no doubt go further.

¹¹⁰ Cf. Actes, i. p. 419, Qu. 31, p. 223.

¹¹¹ On this subject see Hindenburg and Platon's important communication to the Antwerp Congress (Actes, i. p. 127). The House of Representatives of the United States had at that require that a third party making contracts which require much despatch, such as contracts of this kind are, shall ascertain precisely what acts of agency the master is empowered by the law of the flag to do, and what he cannot do.^{112 113} Of course, on the high seas the law of the flag of the master who comes under an obligation is alone applicable, apart from cases of salvage and contracts for salvage, as already noticed.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF THE MASTER AND CREW AGAINST THE OWNER.

§ 334. The law of the flag, on the other hand, must necessarily decide as to the rights and duties of the master and crew in questions with the owner.¹¹⁴ That is a result necessarily following from the connection between obligations of that character with the discipline of the ship, which must be maintained with uniformity, respect being, of course, always paid to the criminal law of the locality, unless it makes exceptions in the case of foreign ships.

CONTRACTS FOR INSURANCE AGAINST PERILS OF THE SEA.

§ 335. The rules which regulate other departments of the law of contracts must be recognised in general in the law of marine insurance. If the insurer is drawn into a contribution to general average, without having been able successfully to resist a claim for contribution, the insurer must recognise the adjustment of the contributions even although it has been carried through under a law of which he knows nothing.¹¹⁵ Besides time approved a bill declaring that all clauses by means of which owners attempt to save themselves for responsibility for negligence on the part of the master, to be null. This law was to be applied to all ships which should carry cargo to the United States.

¹¹⁴ So even Wagner, p. 138.

¹¹⁵ That is at least the clause in general use in English practice. "Liable for average as per foreign statement" implies not merely that the insurer is bound by the calculations of the average adjuster, but also by the law under which the adjustment was made. ["Under the terms of this policy the underwriters and the assured have both agreed to accept the adjustment and statement of the average stater in the foreign port, if and when made, as conclusive between them both in the principle and details as to the loss which the underwriters are to undertake in respect of general average," per Bovill, L.C.S. in Harris v. Scaramanga, 1872, L. R. 7, C. P. 481. It was held in two other cases that "the foreign statement" was intended to cover questions as to the proper principle of valuation to be applied, and to meet all disputes as to whether the loss was a general average loss, as well as to decide mere questions of calculation. A plea that the loss, included by the foreign average stater as a general average loss in accordance with his own law, was not one by the law of England, will be repelled by an English court. Hendrick, 1874, L. R. 9, C. P. 460. Mavro, 1875, L. R. 10, C. P. 414. Lord Shand expresses an opinion in Robinow and Marjoribanks (1876, Ct. of Sess. Repts. 4th ser. iii. 1134) that an insurer of cargo will be liable, in the principle of these cases, on the basis that, traders generally lay, as is well known, special weight upon the language and the technical expressions on which the contract of insurance is framed. Accordingly, the Congress at Antwerp almost unanimously approved this proposition, viz.:—

This rule can, however, only hold good in so far as the parties undoubtedly possess freedom to contract. What is to be the rule in the case of coercitive laws, and particularly of laws which declare certain insurances invalid? There is no want of such cases in the law of maritime insurance, and we can also find a great variety of statutory provisions as regards the details of the various limitations put upon the right to insure. Limitations of this kind are intended partly to secure that policies shall not degenerate into wagers: to some extent they exist in the interest of the actual safety of the vessel and her cargo,¹¹⁷ and lastly, their object may be to protect the insurer against fraud. In so far as the first and the last of these classes are concerned, the policy is invalid, if the law of the insurer pronounces it to be so. But, again, all courts must throw out actions which the lex fori compels them to regard as contra bonos mores. As regards the second of the classes described, the law of the flag must rule. The limitation in such cases has the features of a rule of preventive police, and police precautions on the high seas are the affair of the flag. Thus the captain of a German ship cannot validly insure his wages even with an English insurer: it is certain that he cannot do so as against any peril that may happen on the high seas, and as I think just as little against a peril which may occur in a port, or in the seas adjacent to any country where such insurances are sanctioned. The law of that country has certainly no interest to infringe the rules provided by the home port of the ship, in the view of a more thorough protective policy. But the wages of a Belgian crew may be well insured with an insurance company in Hamburg. If the State of Belgium is of opinion that its sailors and captains will do their duty just as well although their wages are insured, the German State has no reason for exercising any additional police supervision over them by applying § 784 of the German Code of Commerce.

One of the provisions, the object of which is the protection of the of the value of the cargo as stated by the foreign adjuster, and not on the basis of the shipping value, the amount to be recovered not exceeding the sum insured. See also MacLachlan, p. 691.] See Foote, p. 456.

¹¹⁶ Actes, i. p. 129 (Question 52).

insurer, is, e.g. § 786 of the German Code of Commerce, which requires notice, if the insurance is on foreign account. In such cases, according to general rules, the law of the insurer's domicile must regulate the obligation to pay the sum contained in the policy, unless in some exceptional cases bona fides should require the application of the law of the place where the contract was made.¹¹⁸

Double insurance is, in the law of England and in that of the United States, treated on a different footing from that which is accorded to it in the maritime laws of Germany and France. In these latter countries the second insurance is invalid.

We have already discussed this case in § 267. It only remains to notice that the result at which we there arrived is specially approved for maritime law by Voigt (Das Deutsche Seeversicherungsrecht, 1884, p. 89) and by Lewis (ii. pp. 286, 287). In the absence of any agreement to the contrary, the obligation of the German insurer is ruled by the law of Germany. He is, therefore, by virtue of § 792 of the German Commercial Code, under no obligation, if there has been a prior insurance with an English insurer to the full value.

[In a question which arose in the Scots courts under a contract of marine insurance, the locus contractus was Glasgow, the owners were domiciled in Scotland, and the forum was in Scotland. The ship herself, however, was registered in Nova Scotia. The point to be determined was whether the standard of seaworthiness required by the contract was to be sought in the laws and customs recognised in Glasgow or in Nova Scotia. It was held that the contract must be read with reference to Glasgow, Cook v. Greenock Insurance Co., 1843, Ct. of Sess. Rep. 2nd ser. v. 1379. See supra, p. 663.]

From the principles which we laid down in § 255, it follows that maritime law must, like other branches of law, refuse to recognise an insurance against the consequences of a transgression of foreign fiscal regulations. The question, however, whether an insurance against the risk of confiscation on account of contraband of war is ineffectual, is matter of doubt. The Congress at Antwerp (Actes, i. p. 259) left this question undiscussed, because it touched on public law (droit public). But here we must distinguish. There would be no room to doubt the invalidity of the contract of insurance, in so far as the State itself to which the ship belongs, or the State from which the goods are being exported, has forbidden this traffic with the belligerent State. But, if this is not the case, we can only say that the person who carries contraband goods, is doing an act of bold partisanship for one of the belligerents, a thing which is neither immoral nor absolutely illegal,¹¹⁹ although of course the opposite belligerent may meet it with the resources of war, and in particular with a claim of confiscation. Such insurances are therefore to be held good, and so also are policies against the consequences of running a blockade. Of course, they cannot be pleaded in the courts of the State to whose prejudice the conveyance of the contraband goods or the running of the blockade was undertaken.

FREEDOM OF SHIPS FROM ARRESTMENT. POLICE REGULATIONS.
COMPETENCY OF CONSULS.

§ 336. Whether the law as to the freedom of ships that are ready for their voyage from liability to arrestment¹²⁰ is to be extended to ships of another nationality,¹²¹ is of course dependent on the law of the place where the ship happens for the time to be,¹²² and so, too, is the question whether the freedom of seamen's wages from arrestment may be applied to the case of foreign seamen.¹²³ In doubt this privilege should be conceded to foreign ships also. It exists, of course, in the interests of the freighters.

Police regulations, dealing with seaworthiness¹²⁴ and the sanitary conditions of ships, are applicable, in accordance with the law of the flag, to ships, even when they are in foreign ports. On the other hand, regulations of that kind may also be extended to foreign ships, which are intended to take in cargo, or, in particular, passengers in the ports of this country. But that is not quite self-evident: in doubt it is rather held that the certificate issued at the home port is to be taken as establishing the seaworthiness of the vessel.¹²⁵

¹²⁰ See German Code of Comm. § 446, and Wagner, p. 133; Code de Comm. § 215.

¹²³ Negated by Trib. Civ. Havre, 17th April 1886 (J. xiv. p. 68), in accordance with the law of France.

¹²⁴ See Lyon-Caen (J. ix. p. 490).

The personal rights and duties of those who belong to the crew will undoubtedly be ruled by the law of the flag. This is recognised even by those who propose to apply the lex fori exclusively in almost every other part of maritime law.¹²⁶ The decision of questions of this kind is frequently committed to the consul. But, of course, the point must first be settled whether or not the person in question really belongs to the crew.

[It was held in the case of the Livietta, 1883 (L. R. 8, P. D. 209), that the law of the ship's flag must regulate the right of a foreign Government to recover, in preference to other creditors, the amount which it had advanced to enable shipwrecked sailors to return to their own country. The claim was determined on the analogy of the preference given to the seamen themselves for wages, and the foreign Government was preferred upon the proceeds of a sale by order of the court, to solicitors who had acted for the parties interested in the ship, in the proceedings which led up to the sale.]

IMMATERIAL RIGHTS. COPYRIGHT, ETC.

I. RIGHT OF THE AUTHOR IN LITERARY, MUSICAL, AND ARTISTIC WORKS.

INTRODUCTION. DISTINCTION BETWEEN INTELLECTUAL (geistig) PROPERTY AND OTHER KINDS OF PROPERTY.

§ 337. A production which really belongs to the sphere of intellectual effort, be it a scientific, artistic, or poetical work, has an undeniable tendency to become common property. It is, of course, directly produced by the individual, but ultimately it is connected by countless roots, with the common activity of society at large,¹ in a way that cannot be accurately calculated. Again, its effort always is to suggest something new to the community of mankind, to send down new shoots, and bring forth new fruits. Every one who has produced an intellectual work which he prizes, feels in himself an impulse to communicate it to others. That the author of a really intellectual work should be restrained from giving it to his fellows by a consideration of the profit which the exclusive and solitary enjoyment of it can promise him, is not a natural, but rather an artificial idea. It is quite otherwise with true property, with rights in corporeal things or with legal claims, which disclose a prospect of acquiring or enjoying rights of property. In this latter case, enjoyment by many must always diminish the enjoyment of the individual, and that although the property is not an exclusive property, but is limited to any extent you please by the pre-eminent rights of the community, or may even be analyzed into a common right of property in the nation. But where we have a work that is purely intellectual, the enjoyment of the many does nothing to impair the enjoyment of the individual. It is here that we find the origin of the distinction between corporeal or physical property, on the one hand, and intellectual property on the other; it does not lie in any exclusiveness of right, such as is asserted for the former, or in its indefinite duration.²

THE RIGHT OF AN AUTHOR LIES ESSENTIALLY IN HIS RIGHT OF PROHIBITION AGAINST THE PUBLIC.

§ 338. In spite of this tendency to a common enjoyment of these intellectual works, we feel a desire to do justice to the men to whom we directly owe their production. The individual author seems to have a better right of property in his work than any one else can have, and the author of a leading work of the kind feels it to be an injustice, a wrong, if he is left without any special share in it for himself. Granted, then, that this special share should not consist merely in honour and glory—and even these may suffer under certain circumstances by the unrestricted use by others of the work: granted, on the other hand, that the special share is not to take the shape of a reward that is to be arbitrarily fixed for the particular case, an expedient which would give the author, in return for his connection with his work, a substitute artificial, inadequate, and suitable only for exceptional cases;—we are then reduced to this, that we must place some restrictions on the general freedom for the benefit of the author. The general public is forbidden to use his work in a particular way, that he may alone be able to use it in that way. The community is limited in the use of their powers of labour, and of some of the assets of their property, for behoof of the individual. For instance, the printer, who has not received, either directly or indirectly, from the author of a literary work the proper license, is prohibited from using his types, paper, and machines, for the reproduction of copies of any particular work. An author's right or intellectual property is therefore substantially a right of interdict or prohibition,³ a limitation of the general freedom for the author's behoof. It makes no difference that we look upon this restriction of the general freedom as something natural and self-evident, or have at least begun to do so. Nor does it make any difference that behind this general limitation of freedom, the freedom of the author, who alone enjoys that privilege, viz. that he may use his work in the particular way, takes upon itself all the characteristic features of a right of property, may be the subject of succession or sale, and—the most important of all—may acquire a considerable value in the market. For the inventor or author, by reason of this very limitation of the general freedom,⁴ receives a monopoly for certain productions and resultant effects, which owe their origin to the intellectual work which he originally produced.

² See to this effect Darras, Du droit des auteurs, p. 35: "Un droit de propriété suppose une jouissance privative; le droit des auteurs suppose une jouissance commune."

⁴ This must not be misunderstood. The public conscience, which to a certain extent has been developed in these matters in modern times since the discovery of printing, demands that the general freedom shall be so restricted; and so general is this demand, and so fully admitted, that one is scarcely now conscious of the restriction.

It is not necessary for us to examine more closely the familiar and interesting question as to the nature of an author's rights.⁵ What we have said is beyond dispute. It is enough to enable us to treat authors' rights in their international aspects, if we say this much more, viz. that this right of authors was as a matter of history primarily developed, by a concession of the right of interdict and the monopoly, of which we have spoken, by means of a privilegium.⁶

THE PRINCIPLE FOR THE INTERNATIONAL TREATMENT OF AUTHORS' RIGHTS WHICH FOLLOWS FROM THEIR CHARACTER AS RIGHTS OF PROHIBITION.
GENERAL RESULTS OF THIS PRINCIPLE.

§ 339. From this character of a right of prohibition,⁷ set up as against the general freedom, which exists in other concerns of life, we may deduce this leading principle, dominating the whole subject as an international problem, viz.:—

The author or inventor, or generally any one who claims what is called an immaterial right,⁸ either in his own person, or by succession to some predecessor, can only do so under the conditions and to the effects which are enacted by the law of the country in which the act which encroaches upon his right of prohibition is done. In other words; since the protection of authors' rights or intellectual property is in practice evidenced in every country by the fact that any one who trespasses upon it, thereby commits a delict for which he can be punished, the international treatment of rights of this kind is regulated by the rules which determine the law of delicts, that is, by the rules of criminal law. It may, then, in a certain sense, be said that the principle of territoriality rules here, as it does in criminal law.

One special result of this is that the existence of any rights of this description cannot be exclusively determined by the law of the country to

⁵ For the different theories see e.g. Stobbe's D. Privatr. vol. iii. p. 1; Beseler, § 210; Kohler, Das Autorrecht, in v. Ihering's "Jahrbuch für die dogmatik des heutigen römischen und deutschen Privatrechts," vol. xviii. p. 129. Picard (J. x. p. 565) describes authors' rights as "Droit intellectuel." Despaget regards it as a right of property, and subject therefore to the Statut réel. The results, however, are practically the same.

⁷ This right of prohibition constitutes the only real kernel for a philosophic doctrine of which we can lay hold. See on this subject Mandry, "Das Urheberrecht" (1867), p. 31; and the same author, in his work "Der Civilrechtliche Inhalt der Reichsgesetze, systematisch zusammengestellt," 3rd edn. 1885, p. 493.

Laurent, iii. § 326, points out that there are many very real distinctions between intellectual and corporeal property.

which the author belongs by extraction or by domicile, or by that of the country in which the work in question is first produced or the discovery made, or published, or placed under State protection (e.g. by taking out a patent). Such rights can only be recognised in so far as this is possible according to the law of the country in which the invasion of the right in question is alleged to have taken place.⁹ These rights are therefore in quite a different position from property rights, rights in corporeal things.

We must further enquire whether this last law is to be the exclusive rule for testing such rights. Nothing that has yet been said excludes the possibility that an immaterial right will only be recognised in the State in which some claim is made upon it to the extent to which it is recognised in the State in which the literary production is first published, or the invention first applied: that, therefore, rights of this kind can only exist in so far as they are in accordance with both of these systems of law. We shall reserve this question for further consideration. In the meantime, we shall direct our attention to the results which ensue from the dependence of literary and artistic property on the law of the place where an infringement is said to have taken place.

The law of the country in which the infringement of the author's rights takes place will determine (in the sense that we cannot hold that any infringement has taken place at all, if what is pleaded as an infringement is repudiated by this law)—

First, The extent¹⁰ of the author's right, the question, therefore, whether and under what conditions the author enjoys a protection against the publication of translations not authorised by himself,¹¹ against dramatic or musical performances¹² of his work, against reprints of articles in journals and newspapers, against modifications of his original work—adaptations, as they are called—against reprints of extracts, isolated extracts in books of “selections,” etc., etc., against the employment of architectural plans, against the reproduction of works of art.¹³

Secondly, It will also determine the question whether in any particular ⁹ See Phillimore, § 579. As a general rule this will be the lex fori.

¹⁰ V. Martens, p. 157 (§ 41), takes a different view. He thinks that the extent of the author's right to protection is to be determined by the law of the place of the original publication.

¹³ The question, too, whether the title of a work is protected in itself, is part of this subject.

case we have to do with an exception from the general rules of intellectual property,¹⁴ whether, for instance, speeches delivered in public or lectures are entitled to protection.

Thirdly, It will also decide questions as to the extinction of the author's right, or any questions that may arise as to his liability to lose his rights,¹⁵ which some laws lay down with a view to the acquisition of them by the State, or, it may be, by other persons, who, after the lapse of a certain time, desire to make reproductions of the original work.

Fourthly, It will regulate the measure of damages which can be claimed by the aggrieved party, the public penalty, if any, which may follow,¹⁶ and to what extent a prosecution for the offence must be an official prosecution, or may take place on the motion of the aggrieved party.

On these questions both legal literature and the decisions of the courts are in substantial agreement. That they should be answered as we have answered them is also to be inferred from the argument which is so often applied by popular consent, that we cannot give a foreign author or a foreign publication more extensive rights than we give to our own.

THE RIGHT OF AUTHORSHIP IS A PRIVATE RIGHT FROM THE AUTHOR'S POINT OF VIEW. RESULTS OF THIS PROPOSITION: CONTRACTS CONNECTED WITH THIS RIGHT: SUCCESSION IN IT.

§ 340. But again, if we consider authors' rights not as a right of prohibition against the public, but as a personal, and in particular as a transferable right of property, the general principles of private international law, which regulate the transference of rights and the assumption of duties or obligations, must be applied. In accordance with this theory,

¹⁴ For example, some publications, e.g. official publications, may be reprinted to any extent. One might be tempted to submit these exceptions exclusively to the law of the place of publication, if we were to start with the idea that the question here was one as to an implied consent by the author to the unrestricted publication of his work. But the author cannot determine the fate of such publications according to his own pleasure, and, if we were to accept that rule, we should be laying on the subjects of other countries the duty of acquainting themselves accurately with the laws of foreign countries, an unjust and impracticable course to take.

¹⁶ In so far as claims for damages and penalties are concurrent (e.g. in the case of the reparation often recognised as involved in the German Statute of 1870, § 18, subsec. 4), we can never go beyond the limit approved by the lex fori, as we showed at p. 636.

Claims of damages, however, can hardly ever be advanced in any country other than that in which the right of prohibition has been invaded.

from that point of view the decisive law must be the law of the citizenship or of the domicile, as the case may be, enjoyed by the parties, or the law of the place where the bargain which regulates the matter was concluded or is to be fulfilled.

Thus the rule "locus regit actum" must be applied to the form of contracts for publication. But if no special form is required by the law of the place where the work is used, if, e.g. the law of the place where a dramatic representation is given, requires no special form of contract, the person who makes use of the work is entitled to appeal to his bona fides, even although the contract by which the right of representation has been given is, in point of form, not binding upon the author. If we were to lay down the principle that a bargain is always good in point of form, if it is conform to the law of the place where it is to be carried out, the person making use of the work would be protected, if he could appeal to the law of the place in which he proposed so to use it.¹⁷

We must, too, in judging of the substantial provisions of any contract for publication, or connected with a work of art which has been produced by some one who wishes to part with it, follow the general rules. If a contract of that kind is made from two different places by letter or by telegram, we must in doubt determine all questions by that system of law which is the more unfavourable to the claims of both parties to exclusive and prohibitory rights, and the same rule will hold good as regards any copies that may be made in a third territory.¹⁸ This is material for the case that the legal systems of the countries in question make different provisions as to the right of one who has bought a work of art to make copies from it.¹⁹ As regards the interpretation of doubtful expressions, Darras lays down a rule, which is not unfair, that in doubt the decision must be against the party who laid the completed draft of the bargain for signature before the other, and in the same way against the party in whose own language the document is written.

The acquisition of a copyright by succession follows the general rules of the law of succession, and, as it is inconceivable that the lex rei sitæ should have anything to say in the matter, there can be no hesitation in saying that the personal law of the deceased must be applied.²⁰ Lastly, the rights of several persons who have taken part in the same work must be tested by the law which regulates the contract for their co-operation, and not by the law which may happen to be the law of the place in which

¹⁸ This latter limitation is a consequence of the fact that the right of the publisher, the person who has acquired his right from the author, becomes in its turn, as against the author, a right of interdict or prohibition.

¹⁹ See e.g. the German Statute of 9th Jan. 1876, § 8, and, on the other side, Pouillet, § 364, on the doubts of the French law. What we have laid down in the text must be applied to the question, to which different answers are given in different statutes (see Darras, § 326), whether and after what period an author who has published his work in a serial or magazine can publish it in some other form.

²⁰ See Lyon-Caen, Rev. xvi. p. 446; Darras, § 472.

one of them brings out the joint work.²¹ The thing to be discovered here is the import of the implied intentions of the parties, or a positive law that shall supplement the expression of their intentions.

WHAT ACTS FALL UNDER THE PRIVILEGE OF PROHIBITION CONCEDED BY THE STATE?

§ 341. It will frequently be of importance to determine how far the State can subject to its prohibitory enactments, and prosecute before its own courts, acts which may be deemed to be infringements of some copyright, which exists or is recognised in its own territory, or to be injurious to that right, although these acts have been, in whole or in part, committed within some other territory.

The general rules of international jurisdiction in criminal matters must be allowed to regulate this point. Thus the State may extend its rights of prohibition so as to cover what is done by its own subjects in another country, whereas the acts of foreigners in a foreign country are beyond its jurisdiction. But even that exercise of jurisdiction over acts of its own subjects abroad, if stated absolutely, is at variance with general usage, putting out of sight the exceptional cases of political or official offences.²² The limitation that an act, which is innocent at the place where it is done, cannot be visited with punishment by the State in which the person who does it has his home, must be understood.²³ The prohibitory laws of a man's own country only control him when he is abroad, in so far as these laws are recognised at the place where his act is done, according to the law that is there in operation for the control of all alike. If, then, the lex loci actus does not protect the work with which we have to do, or does not protect it in some particular direction, e.g. does not protect it against unauthorised dramatic representations, a native of this country, where that protection is given, may avail himself of the freedom which the lex loci actus accords to him. Any further restrictions, imposed upon a man who is beyond the territory of his own State, by the laws of that State would have little practical effect. It would do our native authors little good, since the great body of foreigners resident in their own and other countries, and not in ours, are not bound to pay any heed to the rights of the author in the particular case, whereas we should embarrass our countrymen resident abroad in their competition with foreigners; e.g. a theatrical manager of this country, resident abroad, would have to pay to one of our authors dues for performing his pieces, while the foreign manager would not require to pay anything.

²² See, e.g. the German Criminal Code, § 4 (2). Resolutions of the institute for public law in 1888, § 8, as to criminal jurisdiction, Ann. vii. p. 157. I cannot recognise as conclusive Kohler's argument, and the distinction he takes between "facere" and "non facere" in a foreign country (Zeitschr. f. d. Civilproc. x. p. 449).

Since, then, on a sound view of the matter, an act is allowable all the world over, if it is so at the place where it is intended to have its real substantial operation, preparations in this country for a reproduction in a foreign country will be lawful in themselves. But of course the State may expressly provide that such preparatory measures shall infer punishment; and though it might be maintained, on abstract logical grounds, that it is not the unlicensed multiplication of the work, but the unlicensed distribution of copies or reprints that injures the author, it will be a good practical measure to make the first step liable to punishment. In such a case, there will be no reference to the place where the copies are intended to be distributed. Undoubtedly abuses might arise under the cover of such professed intentions; intentions, too, which would be liable to alteration. But a prohibition like this is not a matter of necessary inference, and it does not necessarily follow that, because unlicensed multiplications or copyings are forbidden, the traffic in them is also forbidden.

EFFECT OF THE LAW OF THE STATE WHERE THE WORK HAD ITS ORIGIN UPON THE RECOGNITION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE AUTHOR IN SOME OTHER STATE.

§ 342. In our view, and so far as the subject is a subject of legal philosophy, the prohibitive right, or right of interdict, is the primary right which belongs to the author, while his personal or property right is the secondary element, although the converse order may be the proper order for a system which keeps chiefly in view the practical object to be attained. The result of our view would be that as a matter of principle the only question for consideration, in determining whether a work should enjoy protection, would be the law of the place where the multiplication or copying was intended to take place, or had taken place. It would be immaterial whether such a protection was given in any other country, and in particular at the place where the work first appeared. This principle of protection, in accordance with the native law, without heed to whether such protection is forbidden by the law of the place where the work first appeared, has been in recent times maintained by congresses of authors and artists interested in the subject;²⁴ and besides that by Celliez, Droz, the Swiss delegate and president of the conference of Berne (see infra), the French delegate Ulbach at this conference,²⁵ and by Darras (§ 300).²⁶

At the present moment there is no doubt that the opposite view, which seems to be more fanciful, but is in truth not so favourable to the authors' rights, the view, namely, that these rights are primarily personal rights, is the prevailing view. The analogy of what are known as personal statutes seems to yield us this result, viz. that if a man does not enjoy a personal right in the country to which he belongs, he can make no claim to it anywhere else.²⁷ Thus the question whether a person enjoys protection as an author in the particular case will always, it seems to follow, be determined by that one of the two laws concerned which is less favourable to him. It is plain that the author can have no protection, if the law of the place where he proposes to apply for interdict refuses him this protection; nor has he any protection, if his own personal law gives him none, or has ceased to give him any. This strain of argument is, however, fallacious. The law of a man's own country is not generally recognised for his personal relations in a foreign country; it does not determine the general powers which the legal system attributes to individual persons, i.e. their legal capacity, or capacity of having rights, and this is the question at issue here. Again, it would follow from any such theory, that an author in whose own country copyright was unknown, or unknown in the particular circumstances, would not be able to transfer any right to a publisher in another country; for a man cannot transfer what he has not. But such a result as this is at variance with all theories; no one takes any thought of the personal law of a foreign author who gives his work to a publisher of this country.

²⁴ See Paquy, p. 143, and Darras, p. 280. The fourth resolution passed in the literary congress held in 1878 in Paris ran thus: "Toute oeuvre littéraire, scientifique ou artistique sera traitée dans les pays autres que dans son pays d'origine suivant les mêmes lois. Il en sera de même en ce qui concerne l'exécution des oeuvres dramatiques et musicales."

²⁵ "Rigoureusement aucun ouvrage intellectuel n'a de patrie."

OBSERVANCE OF THE FORMALITIES REQUIRED IN THE STATE IN WHICH THE WORK HAD ITS ORIGIN.

§ 343. The theory of the personal law did no doubt obtain a certain amount of support for a time, from the fact that, in order to obtain statutory protection for literary, musical, and artistic works, it was formerly required by most states that certain formalities should be observed; that a number of copies should be deposited with particular officials, or an entry made in a register. This was a mere survival from the old theory of privileges or concessions. The simultaneous observance of such formalities in several countries is, as we can easily understand, very oppressive for the author and for the person who holds the right of publication. Thus the most recent practice in international conventions for the protection of intellectual property has reached this position—and that all the more readily, as it was seen that such formalities in literary or artistic matters were superfluous²⁸—that it is sufficient to obtain the desired protection in country B, if the necessary conditions have been once fulfilled in the country of the first publication.²⁹ That looks like a recognition of the theory which associates with the work a personal right that shall accompany it all the world over. But in truth we are concerned in this matter with nothing more than a means of information. In concluding an international convention, the parties are, of course, as a general rule, not in a position to touch each other's municipal law. These formalities are left alone, but it is provided that at the least, so far as the existence of the authors' rights are concerned, it shall be sufficient if these formalities are satisfied at the place of publication. Thus these formalities do no harm in international relations. It was natural that the general convention of Berne should take this course, and there was all the more excuse for its doing so in respect that it was intended to apply to an indefinite number of States. No argument in favour of the recognition of the theory of a personal right can be drawn from the shape taken by art. 2, § 1, of this convention, viz.:—

“La jouissance de ces droits est subordonnée à l'accomplissement des conditions et formalités prescrites par la législation du pays d'origine.”

DIFFERENT PERIODS OF PROTECTION.

§ 344. The practical consequences of the distinction between our theory and its rival will be of special importance in the case in which the period of protection in the country in which the author's right had its origin is shorter than in the country where it is said to have been infringed.

²⁸ The case is different with samples of inventions; in such cases several persons may simultaneously fall on the same idea. But it is inconceivable that several persons should simultaneously produce the same literary, artistic, or musical work.

The question, however, may be asked, whether this limitation of the author's rights to the standard of the law of the country to which the work belongs, is not justified by reasons of expediency.³⁰ As a matter of fact, such reasons are often used to support it, and have determined many authorities in its favour. If the author has no longer any special profit from his work in the country of its first production, then it is said that he cannot claim any such profit in another country; and if the general distribution of good works at a cheap rate, after the monopoly conceded to their author has expired, is a growing benefit to the community, then, it is said, it is unreasonable not to secure this advantage for the community of our subjects, if the inhabitants of the country where the first publication took place are already in the enjoyment of that advantage.

This consideration of expediency has, as matter of fact, influenced the great majority of legal systems and international treaties; the most recent of these is the Convention of Berne.³¹ It has even, as it seems, determined French jurisprudence, although there is nothing said of any such limitation in the French decree of March 1852, which regulates these matters, a measure conceived in a truly magnanimous spirit.³²

But, at the same time, there is much to be said against these considerations of expediency. Logically, if the public of another country is never to have the advantage of a cheaper market at an earlier date than our fellow-countrymen, the rights of an author belonging to another country should never be protected, if they are unprotected or have ceased to be protected in any part of the civilised world. If any general convention were by law to give the law of that State, which had devised the most unfavourable terms for the author, a preference of this kind, then, on the other hand, the publishing trade will tend to that State which gives the longest period of protection. It is, however, impossible to find any solution of the question as to what shall be the result of following the principle, to which we have stated our objections, which shall be legally sound, if the work appears simultaneously in several countries. The 2nd article (3) of the Convention of Berne takes the law which gives the shortest period of protection as the rule: but this is quite arbitrary; it is simply a decision given in despair, under the necessity of coming to some decision.

³⁰ Droz (Darras, p. 534) described the rule in question as a mere measure of opportunism ("opportunität").

³² Pouillet, § 853, points this out. Celliez (see Renault, J. v. p. 461) expressed himself quite distinctly to this effect. The French delegates at the conference at Berne were also of this mind (see Darras, § 302).

EQUAL PROTECTION TO NATIVES AND FOREIGNERS. EXAMPLE OF FRENCH LEGISLATION. RECIPROCITY.

§ 345. But are foreign works, and works which have appeared in a foreign country, to have as a matter of course claim to the same protection as our laws give to their native authors?

If we take our stand upon the character of a right of interdict, and remember at the same time that this right is an equitable and legal claim attaching to the person of each individual, we must, following the general principle of the equality of foreigners and natives before the law, answer this question unconditionally in the affirmative. If we look upon reprints of another man's work, the piracy of another's industry and exertions, as morally objectionable, we must forbid it in this country, irrespective of whether the person who is plundered is a foreigner or a native subject, and irrespective also of the fact that the law of the country in which he has his home takes a different view of the matter. "La contrefaçon," remarked Lherbette³³ on the occasion of the debates on the Franco-Sardinian Convention of 1844, "est un vol. Pour punir chez nous le vol commis ou préjudice des auteurs étrangers, est-il nécessaire que les gouvernements étrangers en agissent de même avec nos auteurs? La morale ne serait donc plus un devoir, mais un marché."

Experience has in fact shown that the reprinting of foreign works on a large scale not only damages native authors, since their work has difficulty in competing with the printed works which are not burdened with any honorarium to the author, but that in the end booksellers are forced into a ruinous system of underbidding each other or to the payment of honoraria to foreign authors and agents, and to private agreements with competitors of their own nation, without securing themselves against further reprints by rivals in the trade.

Thus the example which we find in the legislation of France was at once generous and wisely calculated. In the opinion of Darras (§ 178),³⁴ the legislation of 1793 and the decree of 6th Feb. 1810 had already made the question of protection against reprints independent of the author's nationality and of the place where the work appeared. But the practice of the courts was against this; they gave protection only in cases in which the work was first published in France. But a decree of 28th March 1852, without the possibility of doubt, placed under the protection of the French laws against piracy all works, although they appeared in foreign countries and were due to foreign authors, and that without any question as to reciprocity. French diplomacy has not, by reason of this liberality, found any difficulty in arranging advantageous conventions, as the result has shown, although formerly her literary and artistic productions fell victims in a marked degree to reprints and to piracy. The task of arranging these conventions has on the contrary been made easier. Completely unselfish testimony was thus given to the objectionable character of this piracy, and to the mischief it did to the country whose trades availed themselves of it, and most States have not been able to resist the force of this argument.³⁵ True it is that French diplomacy has not maintained quite the same liberal position as was taken up in the decree of 1852. The theory that a work should not be protected in a foreign country, or that that protection should not be continued, if protection is not given, or has expired in the country of its origin, has as a rule been formally recognised in the conventions concluded in France after the decree; and in some respects the authors and publishers of the countries with which France has concluded such conventions are more unfavourably placed than the authors and publishers of countries with which she has no such treaty.³⁶ The example of France has had an enormous influence in obtaining international protection for literary and artistic property in general; and in the end a general convention formulated at Berne was reached by a large number of European and American States,³⁷ to which (art. 18), following the precedent of the Postal Union, it is kept open for other States to give in their adherence. Of course, this convention, in order to come into operation in the different States, required to be sanctioned by their respective legislative bodies.³⁸

³⁴ Protection of dramatic and musical works against unlicensed representation was not, in the opinion of the best authorities (see Darras, § 218), given by this decree.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS.

§ 346. Conventions, and among them that of Berne, rest on the principle of reciprocity. From what we have said it follows that in itself this principle is unsound.³⁹ If the piracy of foreign intellectual productions is objectionable, then in truth the repression of the practice should not be made dependent on other countries pursuing the same course. The view is, however, generally held that by such liberality many States might lose the opportunity of concluding conventions for themselves or of adhering to a general convention. The object, however, viz. the exertion of a certain pressure on other States, might be attained otherwise than by holding that any one shall be allowed to do an act that is in itself unlawful, if the State whose subject is injured allows an objectionable act to be done to our subject. It might, e.g. be provided that the subjects

³⁵ The United States have up to this time refused to accede to any convention, and that concluded with Russia is very imperfect. On this last see v. Martens, § 41 ad fin.

³⁷ Russia and the United States seem still to withhold their adherence on principle.

³⁹ By the 38th article of the Belgian Statute of 22nd March 1836 (J. xiv. p. 417) protection is given to foreign authors irrespective of reciprocity.

of such States should be required to pay an exceptionally high fee to entitle them to raise an action for redress, or that in such cases the court might give judgment for a penalty to be paid to the public treasury, but not for damages. It is much more easy to reconcile special dues for the legal protection of foreigners, or modifications of the remedies of the law in their case, with the principles of international law, than it is to justify on international principles the absolute denial of all right to foreigners, or their absolute exclusion from all remedy.⁴⁰

We may add that it will be much easier to investigate the nationality of an author, or possibly of a bookseller, in the course of a process than to do so outside the process and antecedently to it. Again, the immorality of the piracy of foreign work is brought much more sharply forward, if it is as a matter of course reprobated by the State, than if the repression of it seems merely to be the result of an international treaty.

Besides that, as a practical matter, the system of reciprocity is only applicable in the case of conventions, or in some such way as that the legislative power or the Government shall decide, and formally proclaim that reciprocity is guaranteed by this or that foreign State. Reciprocity in this sense only, that some protection or other is given to foreign authors and foreign works, may, in view of the defective legislation of the other State, or of the piracy which is carried on by translations, easily made and at little cost, be worth little or nothing. If courts are only to give protection, if, in exactly similar circumstances, the foreign court would give its protection, the result would be a very difficult investigation in every case, and serious uncertainty in the law. That foreign literary and artistic productions should be set on the same footing, it is therefore necessarily postulated, if desirable results are to be attained in practice, that the municipal laws of the different States shall be to a certain extent the same.

The Convention of Berne on this account very rightly did not restrict itself to affirming the proposition that native and foreign production should be alike protected by the law so far as the States there represented were concerned. The Convention contains also, to a certain extent, international rules of law to be applied equally to all, particularly with reference to protection against unauthorised translations, reprints of magazine articles, representations of dramatic and musico-dramatic works.

RETROSPECTIVE EFFECT OF CONVENTIONS.

§ 347. After treaties have been concluded for the protection of authors' rights, the question will not unfrequently require to be decided whether the protection now secured by the treaty will apply to works which have already been published. We must answer the question in the affirmative, and the Convention of Berne (art. 14), in conformity with the usual practice under treaties, gives the same answer.⁴¹ On the one hand, it is not the treaty which first creates the author's rights; its import rather is, that it is a defence for his existing rights, and, on the other hand, no one has a private right in a claim that what has hitherto been allowed by law, shall continue in the future to be allowed. But copies that have already been prepared may still be sold,⁴² and an indulgent view may fairly be taken so as to allow the blocks, prepared for printing musical works, to be used to a certain extent.⁴³ There can, however, be no notion of an indemnity being paid by the author or the publisher to the copyist or pirate.⁴⁴ If the author should, before the convention which gives him protection has come into operation, have concluded a bargain with a bookseller in the other country, if, for instance, he sent to this bookseller proof-sheets for a new edition, in return for an honorarium, or should the managers of a theatre, in spite of there being no legal protection for the author, have paid him an honorarium for the right of representation, still, the bookseller or the theatrical managers have in such a case acquired no rights for the period after legal protection has come into play; there must be a new contract between the parties with reference to the change in the law. The author had previously no right of prohibition in the other country, and could not therefore make any contract with reference to it.⁴⁵ The payments which were made up to the date when that right of prohibition was given, are either a mere matter of courtesy, or payments in return for certain actual advantages. Of course, the legislature or the treaty making powers can disregard this legal deduction. Thus, for instance, the Protocol to the Franco-German Treaty of 1883 contains in its second head the proposition that dramatic and musico-dramatic works, which have been publicly performed in the original, or in a translation before that treaty shall have come into force, shall only enjoy protection in the terms in which that was conceded by the treaties concluded previously with the individual States of Germany. Undoubtedly, this enactment was prompted by considerations of fairness to theatrical ⁴¹ See the analogous decisions of the French courts, pronounced after the French decree of 1852, in Pouillet, § 849, and Paquy, p. 118, for the practice under treaties.

⁴² The copies already printed must be marked with a stamp.

⁴³ Most treaties have detailed provisions on this point.

⁴⁴ See Darras, § 233, with reference to the effects of the French decree of 1852.

⁴⁵ See Paquy, p. 140, who expresses himself to this effect with reference to the prolongation of a period of protection introduced by the convention. According to his view, that will benefit the author, but not the publisher. See Thöl, Theaterprocesse (Göttingen 1886), on a similar controversy which was discussed in Germany. The matter in dispute here was the rule for protection against unlicensed representations given or enlarged by the imperial statute of 1870. Art. 9 of the Franco-Spanish Convention of 18th June 1880 provides: "Le bénéfice des dispositions insérées au paragraphe précédent pour les ouvrages publiés sous le régime de la convention de 1853 profitera exclusivement aux auteurs de ces ouvrages ou à leurs héritiers et non pas aux cessionnaires dont la cession serait antérieure à la mise en vigueur de la présente convention." managers who had made expenditure on scenery and stage-properties; these considerations are, however, of very questionable validity.

[§ 6 of the English statute, passed to carry out the provisions of the Convention of Berne, 49 and 50 Vict. c. 33, provides that its terms shall not diminish any "interest arising from or in connection with any work lawfully produced in the United Kingdom subsisting or valuable at the date of the Order in Council." This provision was held by the Court to protect the rights of a bandmaster who had bought for 5s. the right to perform a French polka before the date of the order applying the convention to French subjects. Moul v. Groenings, [1892], L. R. 2, Q. B. 443.]

IS THE PROTECTION GIVEN A PROTECTION FOR NATIVE AUTHORS, OR A PROTECTION FOR NATIVE PRODUCTION? (PRINCIPLE OF PERSONALITY AS AGAINST THAT OF TERRITORIALITY.)

§ 348. If the principle of the equality of the rights of foreigners and of natives before the law is not to be recognised in this branch of law, we may hold either the nationality of the author or that of the publisher, or the place of publication, to be the place the law of which should regulate questions as to the international protection of an author's rights. We have no hesitation in declaring that we are in favour of the principle of the place of publication, i.e. the principle of territoriality. That was originally the principle of the law of France,⁴⁶ and is that of English law,⁴⁷ and now, too, is that of the Convention of Berne. On the other hand, the German Statute of 11th June 1870 (art. 2 (3), with reference to the copyright in literary compositions, copies, musical compositions, and dramatic works, by § 61 protects all works by German authors, and also all works published by publishers who have their place of business within German territory,⁴⁸ while the law of the United States gives to its citizens or inhabitants, as authors or publishers, the sole right of multiplying copies or of putting plays on the stage.⁴⁹ An author, who causes his works to appear in a foreign country,

⁴⁶ See Renouard and Renault, J. v. p. 115.

⁴⁸ This is perhaps the result of the theory of the right as a personal right improperly separated from the basis of the right of prohibition. (Endemann, on the contrary, Comm. on § 61, describes the reference to the right of authorship "finding its keystone in the personality of the author," as an empty phrase.) By the German law, it matters not where the German is resident. "The German citizen, according to the idea of the German law, carries the German law of copyright with him all over the world." (Endemann, ut cit.) Undoubtedly, if a man ceases to be a German, he loses the protection of German law for works as yet unprinted. But he loses it for works which have already been published abroad, and if he again becomes a German, he recovers it. And thus the periods of protection vary, if the country to which a German emigrates has a convention with Germany for the protection of intellectual property.

at once expatriates them, and thus renounces the special protection which the law assigns to native works only. Again, the question as to what protection a particular work enjoys, must, if possible, for practical reasons be made independent of what is often a difficult question, viz. the question as to a person's nationality. The subject is one of importance, if the period of protection is to be made dependent on the law of the country of origin, as it is by most conventions, and now, in particular, by the Berne Convention.

In determining what is the place in which a work has appeared, we must have regard not to the nationality of the publisher, but to his domicile or his place of business, if he has one;⁵⁰ an alteration in these can have no effect upon the author's right, when once it has been acquired, since they serve merely as fixed points for determining what is in truth the place of the appearance of the work. If we were to adopt any other view, the title-page of a book would be misleading,⁵¹ and it would be necessary to institute difficult enquiries as to changes of domicile. If we adopt the idea that it is the production which is protected,⁵² and the productions of course of this country, we reach simple and practical results. The conception, on the other hand, of copyright as a direct right belonging to the person of the individual, which will change as that person's nationality changes, complicates the subject with manifold difficulties.

PROTECTION OF UNPUBLISHED LITERARY WORKS.

§ 349. The principle of protecting not the producer but the thing produced seems, however, to fail in the case of unpublished works, and it may well be that that is the reason why the principle of an abstract right in the individual still finds so many adherents, and claims a place at the head of so many State treaties, and, in the Berne Convention, almost the place of honour. It looks as if we must at least admit as a subsidiary principle this principle of a personal right, which in that character would necessarily be regulated by the law of the country to which the person belongs. But in our opinion it is not necessary to do so. It only needs to be considered protected, only if they are published by German publishers. (Cf. Wächter, Urheherr. p. 121.) But that will not prevent the assumption of a man of straw belonging to Germany as publisher. All that is necessary is, besides the true foreign publisher, to have a fictitious German publisher.

⁵⁰ Thus in the revised statutes of the United States, §§ 4952 and 4971 (given in translation by Darras, p. 367). There is some doubt as to the right of representing dramatic works.

⁵¹ How is it possible to assume, in the case of a work that has appeared in another country, that the author is a countryman of our own?

⁵² That may be maintained according to the German statute of 1870. Dambach (p. 272) and Endemann (ut cit.) are of a different opinion. There is, however, nothing to prevent us from recognising the comprehensive provision of this German statute as a recognition in part of the territorial principle.

that it is always possible, in the case of an unpublished work, that it should still be published in this country. This possibility can and will be protected by the law of this country. No doubt, by this means we reach a protection of the authors of unpublished works, without regard to their nationality or domicile. But this is not an unreasonable result. Something may be said for refusing the protection of our laws to works published in a foreign country, which refuses to protect works published in this country. On the other hand, publication for the first time, or public representation, of any work without its author's consent is an act so entirely at variance with the most universal and direct sentiments of justice, and so immoral, that the author does not in our view require the aid of modern copyright statutes, to enable him in many cases to take proceedings against it.⁵³ He could, in our view, avail himself of the Roman actio injuriarum, wherever the principles of this action are still recognised. To forbid him to take proceedings against such conduct (which frequently besides will be associated with the commission of a delict of another kind, such as the theft or embezzlement of a manuscript), for no other reason than that the State, to which the injured author belongs, itself—perhaps against his wish—refuses to allow redress in similar circumstances, is in truth a mere product of selfish stupidity, calculated to damage the interests of the country which favours such a course, as is generally the case in similar circumstances.⁵⁴ If we cannot persuade ourselves of the comprehensive principle of protection without respect to the author's nationality and the place of publication, we should at least allow the barriers of nationality to fall aside in the case of unpublished works. In this way we should at once simplify the juristic theory, and at the same time bring a sharper pressure to bear on other States, which still resist the conclusion of equitable and fair conventions. If the matter were thus simplified, we might leave the author's nationality out of account altogether. We can, however, by insisting on reciprocity, strike at the whole book-trade of any State that holds out against it, whereas this trade is, as things stand at present, often protected by reason of the nationality of an author who belongs to our country or to some other country, with which we have a protective treaty, particularly when the country refusing reciprocity has the same language, or at least uses the same language to a considerable extent. Accordingly, some such sentence as this must stand at the outset of § 2 of the Convention of Berne, viz.:—

“Les œuvres publiées pour la première fois dans l'un des pays de l'Union

RIGHT OF DOUBLE PUBLICATION.

§ 350. Is it competent for an author to divide the prohibitory rights which he possesses by geographical districts, so that, for instance, in one country none but the copies issued by the publishing house of A, and in another country none but those issued by B, may be put into the market?

If we deal with copyright exclusively on the analogy of a right of property, nothing seems to stand in the way of the recognition of this right of separate publications. Nevertheless, the existence of such separate rights is at variance with sound legal deductions: it is not a thing that is by any means self-evident, and its practical advantages are, to say the least, doubtful. It involves an increase in the severity of the prohibitory right of the author that is highly oppressive, since it makes it very much more difficult for the public and for booksellers to distinguish copies that are legally placed in circulation from copies that are illegal. This will be specially felt, if a claim is made, in consequence of any such right, that the copies made in country A shall not be brought into country B under pain of confiscation, and if the public are expected to exercise special caution in buying copies.⁵⁵ But we can quite easily reconcile with the convenience of the public some obligatory effect being allowed to an agreement that the author shall be entitled to sue the publisher, who deals in copies of a book or of a musical work beyond the limits of some district that has been assigned to him. A measure of that kind will satisfy all the requirements of the author and of the publishing trade. The public and retail dealers will not be drawn into the matter, and will suffer nothing. But it is possible for the law and for any international convention recognised as law,⁵⁶ to give sanction to the opposite view—which is in our opinion an unsound view—and that opposite view is recognised as a matter of course in patent law, as we shall see afterwards.

The Convention of Berne makes no mention of any such right of separate publication. Orelli's opinion (p. 46) is that it was intended (?) to abolish it for the future, and, after what has been said, it cannot be maintained that its competency is a self-evident matter.

THE GENERAL CONVENTION AT BERNE IN 1885. SUBSTANCE OF IT, AND COMMENTARY ON IT. THE IMPORTANCE OF SPECIAL CONVENTIONS CONCLUDED BY INDIVIDUAL STATES IN RELATION TO IT.

§ 351. Lastly, let us consider the international protection of copyright in the shape in which its leading features were cast by the Convention at Berne.⁵⁷

(1.) In the first place, we must point out that this Convention does no more than establish a certain minimum of international rules of protection and of uniformity in the individual States. Individual States are free, under § 15, to conclude separate treaties between each other, so far as they give a wider protection and are not in contradiction of the provisions of the general convention. Of course, too, earlier treaties are to this extent preserved in full vigour. Most States, then, will have a somewhat difficult task to keep in view precisely what their legal position is. They will have to consult simultaneously the Berne Convention, their own separate treaties, and, of course, each its own municipal system. It will not unfrequently be a question whether some provision in a separate treaty is reconcilable with the Berne Convention. The particular circumstances of each case must determine the applicability of such a provision. Authors and their legal representatives will be entitled to appeal either to the Berne Convention or to the provisions of the separate treaties, according as the one or the other is the more favourable to them. They will only be prevented from taking the latter course in so far as some absolute legal proposition is laid down by the Berne Convention. That is the case, for instance—and to the disadvantage of authors—in so far as the duration of the period of protection may not last longer in any country belonging to the union, than it does in the country in which the work had its origin.

⁵⁶ See, e.g. the Convention between the North German Bund and Italy on 12th May 1869, art. 7; Franco-German Convention of 19th April 1883, § 15; German-Belgian Convention of 12th Dec. 1883, § 11.

(2.) Again, as we have noticed already, the Convention proceeds on the principle of reciprocity; but, of course, it does not forbid any individual State which is a member of the union from protecting an author's rights as such without reciprocity. According to the provisions of the Convention, protection of these rights is obligatory only on condition of a mutual protection being given by the States which constitute the union.

(3.) In accordance with our theory, the Convention bases the rights of the author, as a matter of principle, and in conformity with the characteristics of a right of prohibition or interdict, upon the law of the country in which these rights are to be used to stop the multiplication of the work in question, or the employment of it for profit. This proposition leads off the first article which contains any substantive enactment (§ 2). We cannot adopt Orelli's view (p. 22), which takes the law of the country of origin as the law which lies at the root of the matter. Even if the majority of the delegates who attended the Convention were of this mind, that will, in view of the language of the Convention, be of just as little importance as is the opinion of a person who brings in a bill, if it does not agree with the text of the bill as it is passed into a statute. To this we may add, that the universal rule of practice up to the date of the Convention is in direct opposition to Orelli's opinion, viz. "the extent (?) of an author's rights is determined by the local law of the place in which his work is published."

We have already seen that the provisions made by the Convention, by which the formalities, which an author must observe to obtain the protection of the law, are to be determined exclusively by the law of the country in which the work had its origin, are easily reconcilable with our theory.

(4.) The Convention, as we already noticed, holds fast to the principle that the author can claim no rights in another country, which he does not enjoy in his own country, or in the country of origin. This principle is, however, only to be recognised as regards the shorter duration of the period of protection (§ 2 (2)):⁵⁸ it does not apply to other limitations of the author's rights; too extensive and too troublesome an enquiry into the laws of foreign countries was purposely excluded. If a man then reprints in country B a work which first appeared in country A, he cannot found upon the extinction or expiration of the author's rights in A, if these are extinct, or have expired for any other reason than the mere lapse of the period of protection. Practice may show that there are not many cases in which we can separate in this way the question as to the duration of the period of protection from other questions as to the existence of the right. It will often be necessary, in order to determine what is the period of protection in the particular case, to take into account a whole series of other foreign enactments.⁵⁹ Besides, the difficulties which arise from setting limits upon the author's rights in accordance with the law of the country of origin, will not be appreciated till some time has elapsed. It will take a good many years before we shall have many cases in which a work is no longer protected by the laws of State A, whilst the protection of it in the territory of State B still subsists. Experience up to the present time can, therefore, give no evidence in support of the theory which we are now criticising.

⁵⁹ In so far as the right of the author depends on a reservation, which by the law of the country of origin he is free to make, any waiver of this reservation would in our view fall to be regarded as a waiver which must operate in other countries as well.

At the same time, however, the attainment of the chief object, which induces the law to put a limit on the rights of an author, will be impeded. If it is argued, in support of this limitation, that the public of the country where the work is originally published should not be placed in any more favourable position as regards it, than the public in this country is, it is plain that, so far as this argument goes, it is quite immaterial whether the foreign public is to enjoy the work at a cheaper rate because of the expiration of the period of protection, or because the author's rights have lost the protection of the law for some other reason.⁶⁰ To attain the object of the limitation, the parties to the Convention, as we have already noticed, were induced to make the law of the land which gives the shortest period of protection the invariable measure, in cases in which the work appears simultaneously in the publishing houses of different countries. In the case of pictures and sculptures, it will often be necessary to institute difficult enquiries into the nationality of the author.

(5.) We recognise a substantial advance in one provision made by the Convention, viz. the enactment of a series of important rules of uniform international law, dealing with the right of translation, the right of utilising foreign leading articles (e.g. in books of "selections"), and also with the representation of dramatic and musico-dramatic works, and adaptations, as they are called, of these, and dealing also with the proof of copyright.

(6.) Lastly, provision is made for the establishment of a permanent office of the union for the protection of literary and artistic works at Berne.⁶¹

It would be a transgression of the limits, within which we must keep the present treatise on copyright, if we were to enter on a detailed consideration of particular conventions for the protection of copyright.⁶² These treaties or conventions are still concluded among the more important States, and will continue to be of importance in the future. We can only advert

⁶⁰ What shall we say, for instance, if, by the law of the country of origin, but not by the law of the other country, the right to sue for penalties for infringement is excluded by prescription, on the expiration of the period within which any such action must be brought? (E.g. German statute of 1870, § 35.) It would be lawful to distribute this reprint, which might possibly be very extensive, in the country of origin. At least, if that country were Germany, it is certain that it would be lawful. (Wächter, Antorr. p. 288.)

to some special features of them, which are also typical. We observe, then, that the practice sanctioned by earlier usage, of incorporating such conventions with treaties of commerce, has been properly abandoned.⁶³ The protection of authors' rights should not be made dependent upon the necessities of trade, which change so much more quickly, or upon the varying views that are from time to time taken of these necessities. Commercial treaties are often, too, for a time thrown out of operation by a declaration of war between the parties to them. Again, the "most favoured nation" clause, which is not above suspicion even as regards commercial treaties, is entirely unsuitable for conventions about copyright.⁶⁴ These conventions, in spite of the general convention of Berne, we may suppose will still be concluded between individual States. Perhaps, indeed, in order to get rid of obscurities and to simplify the state of the law, these conventions may to a certain extent have been rendered necessary by the general convention itself.

APPENDIX. PROTECTION OF PHOTOGRAPHS.

§ 352. Photographs of a work of art, of which there is a copyright still valid, are simply reproductions of it. If a man has got a license to take photographs of such a work of art, he is to that extent the legal representative of him who has the copyright in the original, and undoubtedly enjoys the protection to which such a representative is entitled. The unlicensed reproduction of such a photograph is an infringement of the original copyright in the work from which the photograph is taken.⁶⁵

The case, however, stands otherwise with original photographs, photographs of objects in which there is no copyright at all (e.g. natural objects), or objects, the copyright in which has expired, or where the particular method of reproduction is not touched by the law of copyright.⁶⁶

It may be debated whether photographs of this kind are to be regarded as works of art or as industrial products. The law of Switzerland takes the former view. In the German Empire, on the other hand, starting with

the idea of photography as a mere product of an industrial business (although, of course, it does approach the work of a pictorial artist), we considered it necessary to pass a special statute against unauthorised imitations or reproductions of photographs (10th Jan. 1876). As an international question, then, viewed in the light of the reciprocity, which gives shape to treaties on this subject, and apart from any special treaties dealing with photographs, the protection of photographs stands thus,⁶⁷ viz. :—

(1.) If we are dealing with a question between two States, which both alike treat photography as artistic work, then we must apply the principles of artistic property.

(2.) If we are dealing with a question between two States, which both alike treat photography as something that is not artistic work, then in both of these States the foreign photograph is without protection.

(3.) If we are dealing with a question between two States, only one of which regards photography as artistic work, then, by the provision specially introduced in the concluding protocol of the Convention of Berne, the foreign photograph is protected in this one of the two States,⁶⁸ but a photograph taken in the State which gives this protection, or by a subject of that State, is not protected in the other State. A treaty between two States, neither of which has adopted the Convention of Berne, and only one of which treats photographs as artistic work, cannot, by reason of the relations of reciprocity which regulate treaties in general, be interpreted to mean that the one State must protect the photographs belonging to the other.

It is certainly desirable, when we consider the very general use of photographs, and the considerable trouble and expense which they not unfrequently cause to the photographer and to the publisher, that there was a general convention for their protection. Such a convention, however, could only be passed upon the footing, that the conditions for protection must in every case be present in the shape required by the law of the State in which the protection is claimed. It could not be provided⁶⁹ that no formalities, except those required by the State in which they have their origin, require to be fulfilled, as it is provided in the case of literary and artistic works. Formalities in these latter cases are superfluous, as we may safely proceed upon the assumption that two different authors cannot produce substantially identical works. It is otherwise with original photographs, and for that very reason it is easier to raise pettifogging processes in connection with them. If, then, it was found impossible for all nations concerned to arrive at uniform provisions on this subject, then protection could only be given to foreign photographs on some such conditions as those specified by § 5 of the German statute with reference to German photographs.⁷⁰ To give protection to a foreign photograph in the German Empire under conditions different from those of § 5 of the statute, would be inconsistent with the nature of the prohibitory right involved in copyright.

⁶⁷ See Dambach in v. Holtzendorff's Handb. iii. pp. 594-597.

NOTE EE ON §§ 337-351. INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT IN GREAT BRITAIN.

[Since international copyright has been placed under statutory regulations in recent years, regulations which followed upon the resolutions of an International Convention, there is more of a historical than a practical interest in referring to the position of foreigners at common law, or under legislative enactments as they stood before 1886.

It would seem that at common law an author would have the same right, whether he was a British subject or not, to appeal to the law of England or Scotland for protection. This appeal to the common law would only be made in cases in which there had been no publication, for the author's exclusive rights at common law are lost after publication (per Lord St Leonards in Jefferys v. Boosey, 1854, 4 H. L. (815). But before publication an author has an exclusive right in his work: this right is carried so far as to be applied to letters which have been written and transmitted to the person for whose perusal they were intended. The publication of such letters may be restrained by the writer of them, either because of a right of property in them which still remains in him, as the law of England holds (Oliver v. Oliver, 1878, 11 C.B.N.S. 139, and Gee v. Pritchard, 1818, 2 Swanston, 402), or on the ground of just and expedient interference for the protection of reputation, as the law of Scotland prefers to say (see Morrison's Dict. v. Literary Property, App. Nos. 1 and 4, and Bell's Pr. § 1356). In such matters a foreigner anxious to prevent injury to his reputation in this country, or to vindicate a right of property here, will be as much entitled to do so as any British subject. The courts will be open to him for this purpose, just as they would be open to him if he desired to protect his character on any other point, or to vindicate his property in any other article.

That copyright is "a natural and civil right," and not a mere creation of statute, may be of importance for the determination of questions arising even subsequently to the statutes, which may have been unforeseen when the statutes were framed. Thus, for instance, in 1871 Lord Gifford held that in addition to the protection afforded against literary piracy by the 17th section of the Copyright Amendment Act (5 and 6 Vict. c. 45), an

"(a.) The name, or the firm, as the case may be, of the person who took or who published the original negative;

"(b.) The domicile of the maker or publisher;

"(c.) The year in which the legal copy first appeared;

"In the event of contravention of these provisions, no protection will be given.

action of damages might be maintained by a British publisher, who held a British copyright, against a bookseller who had sold in this country copies of the protected work, which had been printed in America. His lordship thought that the remedies of the statute, among which an action for damages was not included, were not exhaustive: the right of the author did not begin and end with the statute, but was to a certain extent defined, and its enforcement facilitated by it. (Tennyson v. Forrester, 1870, 43 Scot. Jur. 278; see also Copinger, p. 218.)

But until the Act of 1886, which followed on the Berne Convention, it had been doubted whether an alien, unless he was present in British territory at the time of the publication, could claim the protection of the Copyright Statutes. Lord Cairns and Lord Westbury, in Routledge v. Low, 1868, L. R. 3, H. of L. 100, thought that the presence of the author within British territory was immaterial, and their reasoning appears irresistible. Why should a foreigner be unable to vindicate, as well as any British subject, an asset of his property in this country, he having, by coming here for publication, secured to the British public the benefit to be derived from the advancement of learning among them? But in Jefferys v. Boosey, 1854, 4 H. L. (p. 815), it had been held that the foreigner's presence on British soil was necessary.

Up to the passing of the Act of 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 33), however, no work that was not first published in Britain could claim the protection of the Copyright Acts. But in 1885 the Convention of Berne had been drawn up in the terms sketched by the author, and the British Parliament, in order to give its provisions validity in the United Kingdom, passed the Act of 1886, entitled the "International Copyright Act."

It will be convenient to print here ad longum the more important articles of that Convention. A full translation will be found in the appendix to Mr Scrutton's work on copyright, and the original text will be found in J. xii. p. 498.

Art. 2. Authors belonging to one of the countries of the union or their agents enjoy, in the other countries of the union, the rights which the laws of these countries respectively concede at the present time, or shall hereafter concede to their own subjects, in respect of their works, whether these are or are not published in one of the countries of the union.

The enjoyment of these rights is subject to the fulfilment of the conditions and formalities prescribed by the law of the country in which the work had its origin: it cannot last longer in the other countries of the union than the period for which protection is allowed to it in the said country of origin.

The country where the first publication took place, or, if this publication took place simultaneously in several countries of the union, that country among these whose law gives the shortest period of protection, is held to be the country of origin.

In the case of unpublished works, the country to which the author belongs is considered as the country in which the work had its origin.

Art. 3. The stipulations of this Convention are equally applicable to the authors of literary or artistic works published in one of the countries of the union, although the author himself belong to a country which is not a party to the Convention.

Art. 4. defines the expression "literary and artistic works." By the final protocol it was provided that the manufacture and sale of instruments, for the mechanical reproduction of musical airs which are copyright, shall not be considered as constituting an infringement of the copyright in the music.

Art. 5. Authors belonging to one of the countries of the union, or their agents, enjoy in the other countries of the union the exclusive right of making or authorising the translation of their works up to the expiration of ten years, dating from the publication of the original work, in one of the countries of the union.

In the case of works published in parts, the period of ten years count from the date of the publication of the last part of the original work.

In the case of works made up of several volumes published at intervals, such as reports or collections published by literary or learned societies or by individuals, each volume, report, or collection is held to be a separate work in computing the periods of ten years.

The 31st Dec. in the year in which the work was published is held as the date of publication, for the purpose of calculating the period of protection, in all cases for which the present article makes provision.

Art. 6. Licensed translations are protected exactly as original works are protected. In consequence, they enjoy the protection stipulated in articles 2 and 3 as regards unauthorised reproduction in the countries of the union.

It is understood that, as regards a work the right of translating which is public property, the translator cannot prevent this work from being translated by several writers.

Art. 7. Articles from newspapers, periodicals, or reviews published in one of the countries of the union, may be reproduced in their original form or as translations, unless the author or editor has expressly forbidden this. In the case of reviews, it will be sufficient that this prohibition should be made in a general way at the head of each number.

In any case, this prohibition shall not apply to articles of political discussion, or to the reproduction of news of the day or faits divers.

Art. 8. As regards the power of borrowing from literary or artistic works for publications intended for instruction or bearing a scientific character, or for collections of selections (chrestomathies), the effect of the legislation of the different countries belonging to the union, and of any arrangements that may exist or shall yet be concluded by them, is reserved entire.

Art. 9 extends the provisions of the 2nd article to musical works.

Art. 10 expressly includes among the unlicensed reproductions, which the Convention is intended to suppress, indirect appropriations of any literary or artistic work, bearing such titles as adaptations, arrangements de musique, etc., when these are simply reproductions with unimportant changes, and without any of the features of a new original work.

In applying this article, it is understood that the tribunals of the various countries will apply the reservations expressed by their own laws.

Art. 12. Every piratical work may be seized on importation in those countries of the union in which the original work has right to legal protection.

The seizure takes place in conformity with the municipal legislation of each country.

Art. 14. The Convention applies to all works which, at its date, have not become public property in the country of their origin.

Art. 15. It is understood that the Governments of the respective countries of the union reserve power to themselves to make independent arrangements with each other, in so far as these arrangements shall give authors or their agents more extensive rights than those given to them by this union, or shall include other stipulations which shall not be contrary to this Convention.

Art. 18. Countries which have not taken part in this Convention shall be allowed to join it on their request, if they give protection in their own territories to the rights which constitute the subject of this Convention.

An additional article provides that this Convention shall not affect subsisting conventions among countries belonging to the union, if these conventions ensure authors more extensive rights than those contained in this Convention, and do not contain any conditions contrary to its provisions.

By a final protocol, it is inter alia provided that in applying the principle of article 14, the countries of the union shall, where they have no such stipulations in existence to regulate their relations, fix, each for itself, the conditions under which the protection is to be given.

To give effect in Great Britain to the provisions of this Convention, it was necessary that Parliament should interpose. Accordingly, the Act 1886 was passed to enable Her Majesty, by Order in Council, either under the provisions of the statutes 7 and 8 Vict. c. 12, 15 and 16 Vict. c. 12, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 12, or the present Act, to give effect to the main provisions of the Convention, and an Order in Council, to take effect on 6th December 1887, was accordingly made.

The statute of 1886 then provides (§ 2, subsec. 3) that the International Copyright Acts and an order made thereunder shall not confer on any person any greater right or longer term of copyright in any work than that enjoyed in the foreign country in which such work was first produced.

§ 3. subsec. (1) provides that an Order in Council may provide for determining in which of two or more countries, within which a work has been simultaneously produced, it is to be held to have been first produced. This section seems to be contrary to one of the provisions of art. 2 of the Convention, and accordingly we find that the provisions of art. 2 are recurred to in the Order in Council, which provides: (5) "A literary or artistic work first produced simultaneously in two or more countries of the Copyright Union shall be deemed, for the purposes of copyright, to have been first produced in that one of those countries in which the term of copyright is shortest."

§ 4 (2) provides that Her Majesty, before making an Order in Council under the Acts, shall be satisfied that the foreign country with reference to which the order is to be made, has made such provisions for the protection of the authors of works first produced in the United Kingdom as she shall think expedient.

§ 5 (1) gives the author of a book or of a dramatic piece first produced in a foreign country, to which an Order in Council applies, the same right of preventing the production and importation of any translation in and into the United Kingdom as he would have of preventing the production and importation of the original work;

(2) provided that this protection shall cease if no translation is produced under the author's license within ten years after the book, or each number of it, is published.

(3) A lawfully produced translation is protected in the same manner as if it were an original work.

By § 7 of 15 and 16 Vict. c. 12, the provisions of which are saved by the Act of 1886, any article of political discussion which has been published in any newspaper or periodical in a foreign country may, if its source is acknowledged, be re-published or translated in any newspaper or periodical in this country. Other articles so published may be re-published or translated, unless the author has signified his intention of retaining his copyright and right of translation in some conspicuous part of the newspaper or periodical. If he has done so, his article will receive the same protection as books receive, without the necessity of observing the same formalities.

By § 6 of the Act of 1886, Orders in Council are made retrospective, i.e. so as to protect antecedent publications, except in so far as they have been lawfully reproduced. The provision is that the Act or Orders shall not diminish any interest arising from or in connection with any work lawfully produced in the United Kingdom subsisting or valuable at the date of the Order in Council. For an interpretation of what is meant by such an "interest," see Moul v. Groenings [1892], L. R. 2, Q. B. 443; see supra 752.

By § 8, the Copyright Acts are applied to British possessions, under certain conditions: by § 9, power is given to Her Majesty to declare that any Order in Council shall not apply to any British possession.

Reference may be made to the cases cited by Copinger, pp. 342, etc., to show what view the law of England takes of musical adaptations or arrangements, and in what circumstances it protects them under the Copyright Statutes.

By § 11 of the Act of 1886, a photograph is held to be included under the head of the "literary and artistic work" protected by that statute. The protection given to these works of art in Britain depends on the provisions of 25 and 26 Vict. c. 68.

The United States have never adhered to the Convention of Berne; but by an Act of Congress dated in March 1891, to come into force in 1891, they have protected foreign copyright under certain highly peculiar and characteristic limitations.

It is enacted that all authors, etc., shall have the sole right of publishing, representing, copying, and dramatising their works, on the fulfilment of certain conditions. This right the author has for life, and his widow or children for fourteen years after his death.

The main condition of obtaining copyright is the deposit of two copies of the book, etc. or, in the case of statuary, painting, etc., a photograph of the original, with the Librarian of Congress. These copies must be printed, or that photograph reproduced from types set up, or negatives made, within the limits of the United States. While the copyright subsists it will be illegal to import into the United States any copies not made from type so set up, or negatives so made. In the case of books, English translations of which alone have been copyrighted, this prohibition applies only to these translations, and not to the originals.

§ 13 provides that this Act shall only apply to a citizen or subject of a foreign State or nation when such foreign State or nation permits to American citizens the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as its own citizens, or when that foreign State or nation is a party to an international agreement which provides for reciprocity in the granting of copyright, to which agreement it is open to the United States to become a party. The existence of either of these conditions shall be determined by a proclamation of the President.

The peculiarity of the conditions of this statute needs no comment.

II. LAW OF PATENTS.¹

§ 353. In the law of patents we find the prohibitory character of the originator's right more clearly disclosed than it is in the right of the author of literary and artistic works. An invention does not, as a literary work or a work of art does, unmistakably bear an individual character in its very nature. On the contrary, one and the same invention may be made simultaneously by several persons; it may often be matter of doubt how far an invention is an independent discovery, and its novelty, too, may be disputed, i.e. in fact there may be doubt about its being an invention in the proper sense at all. On all these considerations, however, it is plain that the right of the author of the invention must, in order to be carried into operation, receive a special recognition in the case of each invention. This recognition, again, can only receive sufficient publicity within the sides that the right of an inventor or a patent right is of a strictly territorial limits of a State; and thus there is a consensus of opinion on all territorial character. From this it follows, in the first place, that a patent right granted by any State can only be infringed by some act done within the borders of the territory of that State. Even the commentators on the German statute recognise this, in spite of the general expression used in the statute.² But, for instance, the preparation of anything within the German Empire, with a view to export to another country, is an act done in Germany, and falls, accordingly, under the German patent law.³ It would be possible, too, to forbid the mere transit of articles prepared in another country, which are infringements of a German patent; it may be admitted that this would be unreasonable.⁴

¹ On the history of the law of patents in France and England, see Renouard, Traité des brevets d'invention, Paris 1844 (pp. 1-148).

On the other hand, however, the nationality of the inventor is a matter of no consequence. The only question for consideration is the fact whether or not a patent has been given; and, with the view of smoothing the way for the introduction of foreign inventions into the country, the advantages of which are well understood, the different systems of patent law put the foreigner on precisely the same footing as a native citizen for acquiring a patent right.⁵ But on this point many codes, following the analogy of the treatment of literary (so-called) property, add this rule, that the duration of the patent in the country is conditional on the continued subsistence of any patent right that may have been previously taken out in another country.⁶ Although this would be a more reasonable rule in patent law than it is in the law of copyright, it cannot be recommended as one that should be sanctioned by legislation, as is pointed out by Pouillet, § 343, and by Weiss, p. 387. If we once hold that patents are helpful to the march of industry, we should not allow them to be dependent on what other countries may do. Logic would require, if we were to follow the theory which lies at the bottom of the codes which adopt this rule, that a patent should never be given, if in the country of the original discovery, e.g. in Holland, there is no such thing known as a patent. Again, what is to be the result if—a case to which Weiss specially draws attention—the invention has been already patented in several countries? Is that system which gives the longest duration, or the other, which gives the shortest, to rule? The codes of Italy and Belgium take the former view, whereas in

² [The ruling statute now is of date 7th April 1891; the former was 25th May 1877.] Cf. Landgraf on § 4 of the statute; Gareis on § 4, pp. 97, etc.; Kohler, Patentrecht, p. 112. [It is in this respect identical in the statutes of 1877 and 1891.] The legislation of the individual State must in equity take into view that e.g. carriages, locomotives, ships and their engines, which are only temporarily in the country, cannot well be subjected to its patent laws. See German statute, §§ 5 ad fin. [Identical in both statutes.]

⁴ According to the German statute this is a moot point.

⁶ This rule holds, e.g. in French law, for the brevet d'importation. Logic requires that in such questions attention should be paid, not only to the period for which generally the patent right has been granted in the foreign country, but also to the grounds on which, in the particular case, it may be terminated. This is laid down in a judgment of the French Court of the United States the opposite view is adopted (see Weiss, p. 388, note). The one course, however, is perhaps just as wrong as the other.⁷

The question whether an invention, for which a patent is to be taken out, must be altogether new,⁸ or whether the grant of a patent can only be prevented by the fact that the invention is already in use within the country,⁹ is not a question of international law, but simply a question belonging to the law of each particular country. We should give the same answer to the question whether publication by a foreign patent office prevents a patent being granted in this country;¹⁰ and, lastly, we should say the same thing as to the point whether the holder of the patent must put his patent into working operation within a certain period in the country, in order to avoid forfeiture.¹¹ Questions of succession to a claim for a patent, or to a patent already granted, must be determined by the principles which regulate other questions of succession in international matters;¹² questions of assignment inter vivos must in like manner be determined like other questions of assignment. The State, however, which has granted the patent, may, in accordance with the principles of private international law, require certain special forms to be observed for transferences inter vivos.¹³ Till these are satisfied, the transference or assignment can only have effect as between the parties, e.g. by giving a claim for damages. If a limited transference of the inventor's right has taken place, the general principles of international law are the only matter for consideration, in so far as the question is one as to the ascertainment of the parties'

Cassation of 1864, cited by Pouillet (§ 344). Pouillet himself, in view of the unmistakable difficulties which are, as a matter of fact, involved in such a consideration of foreign law, takes a different view (§ 343). Other systems which have some provision of the sort are the Italian, the Austrian, the Belgian, and the Prussian. See R. Biedermann's summary, "Die wichtigsten Bestimmungen der Gesetzgebungen aller Länder," Berlin 1885. In the recent English statute of 1883 (45 and 47 Vict. c. 57), this limitation, which was imposed by the older law, is designedly omitted (see Weiss, p. 387, note).

⁸ The French law provides to this effect, and it is the sounder view; see Kohler, p. 42.

¹¹ But, as Weiss justly points out, if the law recognises any excuse for delay, it ought to be indulgent to a foreigner, who often finds it more difficult than a native to bring his invention into use.

¹² See Gareis, Deutsches Patentgesetz, p. 117.

¹³ See German statute, § 19 (2), by which enrolment in the register of patents is required.

intentions; in doubt, however, the law of the land in which the assignment or license, as the case may be, is to have its operation, will rule.

The French statute of 7th January 1793, which by its 3rd article created, in the interests, as it was thought, of native industries, brevets d'importations, which were awarded to any one who was the first to introduce a new invention into France, regardless of whether the person who asked for the patent was or was not the inventor, or had or had not acquired the inventor's rights, was a great mistake. These patents, which did much to clog French industry by introducing patents for immature inventions, were done away with by the Act of 1844. They may serve as a proof of the errors to which we expose ourselves, if we let go our hold on well-defined conceptions of law, sanctioned by usage—in this case the conception of the right of the original author—and follow considerations of expediency, which are merely superficial, even in the sphere of law belonging to industrial matters.¹⁴

§ 354. On 20th May 1883 a general international convention for the protection of industrial property¹⁵ was concluded by Belgium, Brazil, Spain, France, Guatemala, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, St Salvador, and Switzerland, and subsequently, under the power reserved to other nations of joining it, by England also.¹⁶ This convention dealt not only with patent rights, but also with the protection of industrial designs and models. Its material provisions show that the law of the territory, in which the patent right is intended to operate as a prohibitory right, ought in substance to regulate questions relating to it, and that any satisfactory agreement on this subject must not merely supply solutions for cases in which there is a conflict of different systems of law, but must to a large extent undertake to set up a body of law that shall regulate all nations alike. Art. 2 (1) gives the subjects of any State belonging to the union the same right to obtain patents within other States belonging to the union as the subjects of these States themselves have;¹⁷ and the same provision is made for the protection of designs, trade-marks, and trade names. Subsec. (2) proceeds thus, viz:—

“En conséquence, ils auront la même protection que ceux-ci (les nationaux) et le même recours légal contre toute atteinte portée à leurs droits, sous réserve de l'accomplissement des formalités et des conditions imposées aux nationaux par la législation intérieure de chaque Etat.”

Art. 5 (2) provides:—

¹⁴ See Renouard, “Traité des brevets,” p. 264, as to these “brevets d'importation.”

¹⁵ See J. xi. p. 652. The German Empire had not become a party to the convention up to October 1888.

"Toutefois le breveté restera soumis à l'obligation d'exploiter son brevet conformément aux lois du pays où il introduit les objets brevetés."

The two most important provisions of the Convention, however, are provisions for the regulation of all nations belonging to the union on like terms. In the first place, art. 4 gives a person who has registered an application for a patent, or for protection of a design or trade-mark, a right of priority as regards the other States for a period of six months in the case of patents, and three months in the case of designs and trade-marks, so that subsequent registration in any of the other States of the union before expiration of these periods shall not be invalidated through any acts accomplished in the interval, e.g. by registration, by publication of the invention or the working of it by a third party, or by the use of trade-marks, etc., etc. In the second place, art. 5 (1) provides: "L'introduction par le breveté dans le pays où le brevet a été délivré d'objets fabriqués dans l'un ou l'autre des Etats de l'union n'entraînera pas la déchéance." Just as in the subsequent convention for protection of literary and artistic property, an international office for the union is established under the superintendence of the Government of Switzerland.¹⁸

NOTE FF ON §§ 353, 354. INTERNATIONAL LAW OF PATENTS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

[The leading provisions of the statute of 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 57) bearing upon our subject are the following. By the 4th section it is provided that any person, whether a British subject or not, may make an application for a patent. The forms A1 and A2 of application for a patent given by the Patent Rules of 1890, apply to the case of the inventor being resident abroad and having communicated to some one in this country his patent, with a view to availing himself of the privilege accorded by section 4 to foreigners, and to the case of a British subject resident abroad.

By the 43rd section of the Act it is provided that a foreign vessel shall not be prohibited by the existence of a British patent from using an invention for the purposes of her own navigation within British waters, nor shall the use of a foreign invention on board of her within these limits be prevented by such a patent, unless that invention is used for the manufacture of something which is intended to be sold in the United Kingdom, or exported from it. This section, however, it is provided, is only to apply to protect the ships of such foreign States as shall give British ships within their waters reciprocal protection for inventions similarly used there. Failing such reciprocity, there would be applied to a foreign ship using an invention, protected by a British patent within British waters, the law of Caldwell v. Van Vlissingen, 1851 (9 Hare, 415), where ¹⁸ The Convention by art. ii. gives foreign manufactures, exhibited at international exhibitions which are officially recognised, a temporary protection as patents, designs, models, and trade-marks.

Dutch vessels were prohibited by injunction from using within British waters propelling apparatus made after a subsisting British patent.

By the 103rd section it is provided that if the Queen makes any arrangements with any foreign State for the mutual protection of inventions, then any person who has applied for protection abroad in any such State shall be entitled to a patent under the Act, in priority to other applicants, if he applies within seven months after applying abroad. His patent is to date from the date of the application for the foreign patent, but he is not to be entitled to damages for infringements happening prior to the date of the actual acceptance of his complete specification in this country. The invention is not to be invalidated by any publication or use of the invention within the United Kingdom during these periods. The application must be made in the same manner as in an ordinary application under the Act: the form of application will therefore be that already described.

The provisions of the section are to apply only so long as the Queen in Council shall direct, and only with reference to the States which Her Majesty in the same way shall specify. As noticed in the text, Her Majesty gave her adhesion, on 17th March 1884, to the Convention of Paris, and the provisions of the statute will therefore apply in the case of the States which adhere to that convention. The general provisions of that convention are set forth in the text.

The laws of various foreign States dealing with patents are given by the Messrs Johnson in their useful treatise, "The Patentee's Manual."

By the 104th section of the statute it is made lawful for the Queen in Council to apply the provisions of the 103rd section to any British possession, if Her Majesty shall be satisfied that the legislature of that possession has made satisfactory provision for the protection of inventions.

III. LAW OF INDUSTRIAL DESIGNS AND MODELS.

§ 355. In some measure industrial designs and models stand in an intermediate position between artistic products and inventions. It will not very easily happen that different persons will simultaneously discover designs and models that are substantially identical. It might thus be possible to give them protection by means of interdict, as in the case of literary and artistic products, without further procedure. But we must set against this, on the one hand, that the trouble and the expense of the inventor are often, comparatively speaking, quite trifling, and, on the other hand, we must remember the enormous number of new designs and models that are made and disappear again from the industrial world in a short time. Our endeavour must therefore be, on the one hand, to diminish to some extent the list of protected inventions, and, on the other hand, to prescribe forms, which will give those engaged in industries the opportunity of informing themselves whether a design or a model can claim the character of novelty.

The result is that we must require the designs or models to be entered in registers,¹ to be kept under public authority, and must adopt the principle that any one who distributes industrial products made in conformity with some design or model, before registering that design or model, thereby renounces his rights as inventor. Although this latter point might, possibly, lead us to recognise the registration which was made in the country to which the inventor belongs, or in which he is domiciled, as operative all the world over, we must remember that the interests of the public and of other manufacturers are distinctly opposed to any such general effect being given to it. No one can fairly be expected, seeing how frequently it is necessary to produce this or that article speedily, to make enquiries in distant countries, and it may be at great expense whether a design or model has been registered there. It is, besides, as we have already said, against the public interest to make the establishment of the inventor's right too simple and too cheap. A man who desires protection in several countries, should fulfil the special conditions appointed by the laws of all of these countries. That does not prevent countries, which lie close to one another, or which stand in very close commercial relations one with another, from enacting that, under certain conditions which facilitate the ascertainment of the true state of the case, registration which takes place at the inventor's domicile shall ipso facto be entitled to protection within the other State which is a party to the arrangement. It is not, however, a matter of course, and if it were to be set up as the rule, it would have a very wide-reaching effect on the international treatment of the law of protection for designs. In the meantime, it seems dangerous to frame a treaty on this principle, and accordingly, in all treaties now in force, so far as I am aware, there is an express clause,² by which subjects of the other contracting State are, no doubt, given the same legal protection as natives, but are required to fulfil the conditions and the forms which are prescribed by the law of the State in which they desire protection.

§ 356. All legislation conceives the protection which it gives to the inventor of designs and models to be a protection given to native industry. We have nothing to do, therefore, with the nationality of the inventor or with that of the manufacturer: the thing we must ensure is that protection shall be found for a trading establishment situated in this country, or for goods which are to be manufactured in this country, or at least that the inventor shall have the goods manufactured in this country. (A foreigner, i.e. one who has neither a domicile nor a trading establishment in Germany, according to the conception of the German statute of 1st June 1891 only enjoys the protection of the German law on condition (1) of reciprocity, (2) of registration in Germany, and (3) of naming a representative in Germany when he registers his design. He is not required to have a manufacturing establishment in the German Empire.)³ International treaties do not maintain this limitation; work, however, which is not independent, but which follows foreign designs, is apt to damage any industry. The limitation is therefore only used to compel a recognition, in treaty provisions, of the necessity of reciprocity.⁴

¹ In 1759 such protection was given in France without the necessity of complying with any such formalities; since the statute of 16th March 1806, it is necessary to deposit plans and sketches. See Blanc, p. 316.

² See, e.g. Austro-German Commercial Treaty of 16th Dec. 1878, § 20. Italo-German treaty of 4th May 1883, § 5. Convention between Belgium and the German Empire for protection of industrial designs and models, of 12th Dec. 1883, § 2. The Convention of Paris of 1883 says in § 6, but only with reference to trade-marks (see infra): "Toute marque de fabrique ou de commerce régulièrement déposée dans le pays d'origine sera . . . protégée dans les autres pays de l'union."

On general principles, again, no act, unless it is committed in this country, can be touched by the right of interdict or prohibition. It is purely a matter for the legal system of each individual State to determine, whether imitation with the intention of distribution or circulation is the thing that should be forbidden, or whether the distribution in the way of trade should in itself be forbidden. To extend the prohibition to acts of subjects of this country when abroad cannot be justified, if we keep in view that our general principles tell us that the innocence of any act is to be determined by the lex loci actus.⁵ Still less is there any practical advantage in the extension, because a prohibition, which in any case can have no sort of effect against foreigners in a foreign country, can do but little good to the industries of this country, and would only serve to prejudice the subjects of this country, who have manufacturing establishments abroad, in their competition with foreigners.⁶

The general principles already laid down, as to the transference of the author's rights by assignation or succession, hold good here also. We

⁵ Dambach, p. 39, takes a different view, so far at least as the old German statute of 1876 is concerned.

must treat on the same footing as an assignation the case in which, in consequence of the true author holding a situation or employment in the service of another, the principal or the owner of the manufactory is regarded by the law as the true author. (See the German statute of 1st June 1891, § 7.)

The question, however, whether it is right to limit international protection in such a way as to refuse all protection in this country to a foreign manufacturer, if he has ceased to enjoy it by the foreign law, is difficult to answer. It is answered in the affirmative by the Austro-German Commercial Treaty of 16th Dec. 1878, § 20, by the Italo-German Treaty of 4th May 1883, § 5 (3), and by § 7 (2) of the German-Spanish Treaty of 12th July 1883. On the other hand, in the Belgian-German Treaty of 1883, nothing is said on the point. This last treaty simply says: "German subjects in Belgium, and Belgian subjects in Germany, shall enjoy the same protection as native citizens so far as designs and models are concerned." An earlier treaty of the German Empire, viz. the Commercial Treaty with Portugal, in 1872, is couched in the same terms. One will not, however, be wrong in saying that if the inventor has allowed his right as inventor to become public property in that country in which he first had an opportunity of claiming protection, if, in other words, he has renounced it, he cannot be allowed even in another State to claim again what he has thus renounced.

The Convention of Paris of 1883, with regard to the protection of designs, as with regard to patent law, left the matter to the judgment of the State in which those rights are to be exercised as prohibitory rights. The only rule of law which is to affect all the parties to it alike, set up by this Convention, is the establishment of the right of priority already mentioned. (See p. 769.)

[The provisions of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-marks Act of 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57) regulate the matter of copyright in designs in Britain. § 47 provides that the comptroller may register a design on application by or on behalf of any person claiming to be proprietor. The design, when registered, is to be protected for a period of five years (§ 50), but (§ 54) if a registered design is used in manufacture in any foreign country, and is not used in this country within six months of its registration here, the copyright shall cease. § 103, quoted supra, p. 771, is applicable to designs as well as to patents, but the application for registration must be, in the case of a design made within four months after the application in the foreign State, in place of within seven months, which is the period allowed in the case of a patent.

The 104th section is applicable to designs as well as to patents. See supra, p. 771.

In construing this statute, it was held in Scotland (Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co. Ltd. 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 511) that the effect of registering a design in Britain, is only to prevent the application of that design to goods in this country, and the sale of goods in this country, to which such a design shall have been applied. The Act is held to have a strictly territorial effect, and the court point out that registration in a British register, set up under a British Act of Parliament, will not be presumed to operate all the world over, or to restrain even a British subject from using the registered design extra territorium. Nor does the statute make any such prohibition in express terms. This decision seems to follow closely the theory of the text.]

IV. LAW OF TRADE-MARK. PROTECTION OF TRADE-NAME.¹

INTRODUCTION. UNFAIR COMPETITION ON THE ONE SIDE, AND] LAW OF TRADE-MARK ON THE OTHER.

§ 357. The laws of France, of England, and of the United States, have for a long time regarded it as a matter of course, that the man who makes goods, and possibly the man who deals in them, by whose interposition and under whose guarantee the goods are brought into general commerce and use, can prevent others from describing their goods with his name. If a man, in order to deceive the public, avails himself without leave given of the same name or of the same trade-name as another to describe his goods, he is open to an action of damages at the instance of the person who is entitled to the name, on the ground of unfair competition (concurrence déloyale). Such an action will lie even although there is no false use of a name in the matter, but if there is some other kind of deceit: if, for instance, the goods are so packed as to induce the public to buy the one man's goods in place of the other's.² It may, in fact, be regarded as an unwarrantable intrusion on a man's personal rights, if something shall be given out as his work, which does not proceed from him at all; if goods which are quite different from his own, and inferior to them, are falsely attributed to his manufacturing and trading exertions, and his credit is thus impaired, if we suppose the goods to be inferior; or, in any case, the extent of his sales, if we suppose that by the excellence of his goods he has a certain prospect of orders, is diminished.³ That is true also of the deceitful employment of signs or marks, which manufacturers and traders have used, since the days of antiquity, to indicate the origin of their goods.

Since there is an inexhaustible number of such marks at any one's command, no one can ever require to use a mark already in use by some one else. It is, however, possible that there should be a bona fide use of the same mark, just as it is possible that several persons of the same name and at the same place should manufacture similar goods. The possibility of the same mark being adopted by more than one person can only be avoided by placing the choice of a trade-mark under public control; in this way any one, by an inspection of public registers, can easily assure himself whether a particular mark has already been selected by some one else. By such an arrangement the mark obtains from the first, and for a certainty, an exclusive character, and it will be possible to give the right in the mark a sanction of a very substantial kind, by the imposition of penalties, an action of damages being a doubtful remedy in many cases. In this way, however, the rights of the individual (Individualrechte), as Kohler not inaptly calls the right to a name, arms, and a mark or sign, which appear as something that each man naturally possesses, are invested with the character of something like a privilegium.

² Cf. Blanc, Traité de la contrefaçon, pp. 389, 611, 612. Kohler, p. 72. In France the action is founded on § 1382 of the code.

³ Under special conditions an actio injuriarum according to the Roman law would lie.

Thus the rights of the individual, belonging to him by nature and for that reason operative universally, are turned to that extent into an artificial creation of the sovereign power of the State, and are operative accordingly only within its territory. The question, then, at once suggests itself—Can such a right be acquired by foreigners as well as by subjects?

THE EXCLUSIVE RIGHT TO A MARK IS AT ONCE AN ADJUNCT OF THE PERSONAL RIGHTS OF THE INDIVIDUAL AND A RIGHT OF PROHIBITION.
PRINCIPLES FOR ITS INTERNATIONAL TREATMENT.

§ 358. We must always keep this in view, that on the one hand we are here dealing with a right belonging to the individual person, although that right may be artificially defined: this right, therefore, in so far as its origin and subsistence are concerned, seems primarily to be subject to the law upon which the rights of the person are dependent. On the other hand, we must keep in view that this right of the individual is in its practical exercise a right of prohibition that controls the public freedom. From these considerations we draw the following inferences for the international treatment of the question:—

First, Every claim in a foreign country for protection of a trade-mark assumes that the claimant has in his own country an exclusive right to it. That it should not be so is of course conceivable, just as one may have copyright, or patent right, in another country, which he has not in his own. But a trade-mark is no such independent product as a literary or artistic work or an invention. It is merely a guide, by means of something that catches the eye, to the particular person, and unless that is clearly and certainly effected in the person's own home by the mark which he has adopted, that mark loses its specific import in every other country also.

Thus (a) a mark which cannot get protection in its own country is not protected abroad, and the fact of its being registered abroad makes no difference.

(b) A mark or a name given to an industrial product, when its exclusive force has expired in its own country,⁴ does not enjoy any such force in any other country.

On the other hand, it is of no consequence whether it is by the operation of some general rule of law or of some special privilege that the mark has effect in its own country.⁵

When we speak of the country to which the mark belongs, we do not mean the country of which the person who has right to the mark is a subject: we mean the country in which the seat of his business is, the country to which, in so far as his trade is concerned, he belongs. The German statute of 30th November 1874 gives all traders, whose firms are entered in the commercial register, a right to be registered, and raises no question as to their character as subjects. By § 20 the possession of a trading establishment in the German Empire is sufficient.

Secondly, On the other hand, a trade-mark which is only registered abroad, can make no claim for the special protection which is conditional upon registration in this country. Publicity abroad is not publicity in this country, and to put foreign registers generally on an equal footing with our own, would intensify the right of prohibition in a way that would be unfair to the public. The treaties on this subject, which have in late years been so numerous, provide accordingly that the subjects of one State, in order to obtain protection for their trade-marks in another, must fulfil the conditions under which the subjects of the latter State enjoy protection within their own territory. Foreign trade-marks, therefore, must undergo a second or accessory registration (according to the German law, § 20 (1) at Leipsic). It is still, however, a matter of much doubt whether foreign trade-marks must, in themselves, in order to be registered, satisfy the requirements of our law, or whether it is enough if they possess the characteristics of a trade-mark, as these are defined by the law of the country to which they themselves belong: e.g. it may be that by the law of the country to which the mark belongs, letters of the alphabet are recognised as capable of registration, while by the law of the other country they are not. A judgment of the old Court of Appeal at Leipsic, on 16th April 1878, which has been much criticised,⁶ answered the question by affirming the latter alternative, and this we find adopted in various treaties.⁷

⁵ See specially Fiore (J. ix. pp. 505, 506), and the judgment of the French Court of Cassation of 23rd May 1874 cited there, Kohler, pp. 434, 435; Austro-German Comm. Treaty of 16th December 1878, § 20 (2). "Protection for trade-marks will be given to the subjects of the other contracting power only to the extent and for the time to and for which they are protected in their use of the marks in their own country." In the same way, in the treaty between the same States of 23rd May 1881, § 11 (2); Norwegian statute of 1884, § 16, No. 3; Swedish statute of 1884, § 16, No. 3.

⁶ Reported by Kohler, p. 532.

⁷ Cf. Franco-Swiss treaty of 23rd Feb. 1882, § 2. . . . "C'est à dire que le caractère d'une marque française doit être apprécié en Suisse d'après la loi française, de même que la caractère in the resolutions of the Congress of Paris in 1878,⁸ and, in the enabling clause of the English statute of 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 57), § 103.⁹

We find it, lastly, in the 4th article of the Convention of Paris of 20th March 1883, which rests upon the resolutions of the Congress of Paris of 1878, and was intended to form a world-wide treaty¹⁰ (see J. xi. p. 651). But a result of this kind cannot, as Kohler thinks, be deduced from any known legal theory without further consideration. If the prohibitory law of this country, of which for all practical purposes the law applicable to foreign trade-marks in this country forms a part, says to the general public, "this and that sign, or these letters of the alphabet, cannot be used as valid trade-marks, so as to found any right to prevent others from using them," it is by no means an obvious conclusion that a jus cogens of that description shall make an exception in favour of foreign trade-marks. Nor, again, does the fact that it would be desirable that the foreign trade-mark should be protected as it stands, whereas, if it is not taken as it stands, international protection would in many instances have to be refused,¹¹ establish the soundness of the law to which we have referred.¹² Besides, in any case, it is perhaps impossible to carry out thoroughly the principle of testing the validity of the trade-mark exclusively by the foreign law which is concerned. For if the foreign mark shall come into conflict with some open mark belonging to this country, the former must, of course, lose all its virtue, and the question whether one mark is sufficiently distinguishable from another or not, must always be decided by the judge in accordance d'une marque Suisse doit être jugé en France d'après la loi fédérale Suisse (see König, J. x. p. 588). Italo-German Comm. Treaty of 4th May 1883, § 5 ad fin. "so that the character of an Italian trade-mark is to be determined by the law of Italy, and that of a German trade-mark by that of Germany."

⁹ Power is thereby given to the British Government to conclude treaties on this subject, "provided that in the case of trade-marks, any trade-mark, the registration of which has been duly applied for in the country of origin, may be registered under this Act."

See German statute on trade-marks, § 3 (2): "Further registration will be refused if the marks consist solely of figures, letters, or words, or if they contain public armorial bearings, or any representations that may give rise to scandal." Of course, too (see Convention of Paris, 1883, § 6 ad fin.), this limitation is to be understood, that registration of foreign trade-marks may be refused, if the article for which registration is asked, or the mark itself, would offend morality or public order.

with the law of his own country, and not of the country to which the mark belongs.¹³ The proposed rule, therefore, would always have to be taken cum grano salis.¹⁴ Putting all these considerations together, we find that the practical merits of this principle, although, as we have said, it was adopted by the International Congress at Paris, and is warmly defended, e.g. by Meili,¹⁵ become very questionable. We can understand how it is that Dambach (in v. Holtzendorff's Handbuch, iii. p. 600) holds it to be a very dangerous principle, and how the German Empire has not up to this time resolved to give in its adherence to the Convention. As we shall show, the end of the principle adopted by the Convention of Paris must be that the whole distinctive law of trade-mark will evaporate, and we shall be landed in results which will be entirely other than those that were expected.

Thirdly, There is a general rule of international law which holds good even as regards real rights (see supra, p. 497), that a right acquired in another country loses all its validity, so soon as it comes into conflict with a right subsequently acquired in this country. Now, as we are dealing here not with any right in a corporeal article which occupies a particular place, a conflict of that kind may arise from the fact that several good legal claims arise simultaneously in several different States. In such a case, the claim arising in this country can never be required to give way to that which arose abroad, if the question is raised here. The truth rather is that both claims are good, each within its own territory. From this it follows that the foreign manufacturer can have no right of registration for his trade-mark, if by registration in this country some one else has already acquired a valid right to it, and if registration gives, as by the German statute it does,¹⁶ a preferable right, even although the person who asks for registration has not been the first to use the mark. The law of this country, ¹³ Kohler (p. 440, note) agrees with this rule, which is laid down in an English decision (see in re Farina, 1879, 27 W.R. 456).

¹⁵ Des Markenstrafrecht auf grund des eidgenossischen markenschutzgesetzes, p. 65.

¹⁶ By the invariable practice of the German Imperial Court, the German statute is interpreted to this effect, that registration has the effect of constituting the legal right to the mark. (Kohler, no doubt, takes the opposite view, p. 262.) It is otherwise by the law of France, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, and England [at least for five years from the date of registration. Cf. 46 and 47 Vict. c. 57, § 76, which provides that registration shall be prima facie evidence of a person's right to the exclusive use of a trade-mark, and after five years from the date of registration shall be conclusive evidence of that right]. In these countries the case put must be decided otherwise.

again, is the only law that can decide the question in how far mala fides may deprive the registration of its effect in a question with the foreigner.¹⁷

A foreigner's trade-mark, in the same way, if it is identical with a mark which any one who pleases may use in this country, a mark which has fallen into the Domaine public, will have no claim to protection in this country.¹⁸ But, as Kohler (p. 440) rightly points out, in this matter caution must be exercised in assuming that the mark in question is an open one, for in many cases it will have been impossible for the foreigner, who has a right in the mark, effectually to resist the unfair competition of his rivals.

It is impossible to reconcile in an entirely satisfactory way the relations of foreign and native trade-marks with the means with which theories of private international law supply us. These marks demand more and more imperatively an universal recognition, at least within the circle of civilised States. That cannot be completely attained without setting up a body of law that shall to a certain extent bind all nations alike, and establishing an international registry office, the organisation of which, and its relations to the courts and the officials of the different States, would certainly be hard to regulate. The International Convention of 1883, already mentioned, to which, however, the German Empire has not as yet given in its adhesion, assigns to the international office, for which it makes provision, and which is to be situated in Switzerland, nothing more, in substance, than the function of an official who shall collect information and statistics. Provision is, however, made for positive enactment, to bind all nations, as in the case of patents and designs, that a period of from three to four months shall be allowed to every foreign trade-mark (every trade-mark registered in another country), within which it shall enjoy a right of priority in this country, and no adverse trade-mark can be effectually registered.

Fourthly, The law of this country must always be the exclusive rule for determining what protection is to be given, in the case of contraventions in this country, to a trade-mark which was first acquired in a foreign country, and afterwards registered here. In so far as the question is one of protection to be afforded by means of penalties, we need hardly examine it further. The protection which we extend to the rights of foreigners in this way is exactly the same as we give to our own subjects, without regard to how the foreigner's own country protects similar rights by means of its criminal measures. But, according to the general rules which regulate claims ex delictis, the same rule must obtain as regards claims of damages. It is in such a question immaterial that the foreigner's trade-mark enjoys a less complete protection in his own country: it is also of no consequence that foreign law does not hold an act to be a contravention of the right of trade-mark, which by our law has that character.¹⁹ But if the more unusual case should occur, of a claim of damages on account of a contravention committed in another country being prosecuted in one of the courts of this country, then the pure claim of damages would have to be tested according to the lex loci delicti commissi.²⁰ In cases of this kind, however, as a general rule, the claim for damages and the claim for penalty will be bound up so that they cannot be absolutely dissociated, and in that case the claim, which is primarily to be tested by the lex loci delicti commissi, cannot be assessed at any higher figure than is allowed by the lex fori.²¹

¹⁸ In this sense see judgment of the French Court of Cassation, of 13th January 1879 (J. vii. p. 193).

Fifthly, Invasions of the right of trade-mark committed in a foreign country are only amenable to the criminal law of this country, if these invasions are, according to the law of the place where they are committed, acts that can be punished, and also if, and only if, the person guilty of them is a subject of this country.²² But it is not enough, as Kohler (p. 458) rightly points out, that the act should be punished by the law of the place where it takes place as a fraud upon the person who buys the goods. The act must be in the circumstances of the particular case, punishable as an infringement of trade-mark, without any reference to the question whether at the place where the act is done there is a system of registration of trade-marks or not.

But the law of this country must decide what acts are to count as real infringements of the right of trade-mark.²³ This much, however, we must

²⁰ See supra, p. 334.

²¹ Kohler (pp. 450, 451) asserts—appealing to the English practice in the case of delicts, and to Westlake-Holtzendorff, § 185A—generally that even pure claims of damages must be ruled exclusively by the lex fori, and that an act which is forbidden in this country must go free in another. His reason is that the courts of this country must assess the value of all our possessions solely according to the standard of our civilisation and culture. But such an absolute assessment as that savours of the criminal court rather than of a civil claim. The appreciation of damages is a relative matter, and one of the circumstances that must specially be taken into account is the place where the injury was done. Besides, Kohler is mistaken in his idea of English practice.

²³ Thus, for example, we may find that "putting into circulation" (in verkehr bringen), which is an offence punishable by § 14 of the German statute, may consist in a man's storing in his warehouse in this country, for the simple purpose of shipping them to another country, goods manufactured and marked in another country. (See Kohler, p. 457, and the decision of the Imperial Court (iii. Criminal Div.) of 3rd April 1884, a decision which referred, no doubt, to the case of an infringement of patent.) It seems still clearer, if we read the words of § 14 of the German statute in their ordinary sense, "if a person knowingly marks goods illegally" (Wer Waaren wissentlich widerrechtlich bezeichnet), that they will attach to any one who, within the German Empire, illegally marks goods with the marks of a German firm, always keep in view, viz. that any person who is to be visited with punishment by the criminal authorities of this country must, at the moment when he commits the act in question, be actually physically present in this country;²⁴ and if the act in itself does not satisfy the conditions necessary to give the courts of this country jurisdiction, it can never be punishable as an attempt to commit an illegal act, or as part and parcel of an illegal act,²⁵ if it is an act allowable by the law of the place where the leading act of the transaction is to take place; in other words, if in that place the trade-mark belonging to this country, or the trade-mark registered in the register of this country, enjoys no protection.²⁶ So, too, the question, on which there has been much debate, viz. whether the criminal law covers the case of the transmission of goods which are marked with an illegal mark, is a question of the interpretation of the criminal law of each particular country. It is only possible to give an answer to it on principle for cases where that law is doubtful: in such cases, our answer must be against the competency of punishment. To carry goods through the country in closed cases or packages is a different thing from putting them into circulation; and I cannot concur with Kohler (p. 448), who arrives at the opposite conclusion, on the ground that a man's right in his trade-mark is a right of the individual which is not limited to the territory of his own State. A man's right in a specially registered trade-mark is, as Kohler himself lays down in other passages, with the view of subsequently selling them in some other country. In the result of the judgment of the Imperial Court (i.) of 2nd Oct. 1886 (Dec. xviii. § 7, p. 28), we must therefore concur. But the very far-reaching grounds on which it is put are highly debatable. It comes to this substantially, that because it is desirable to protect in other countries legal rights belonging to our native polity—(let us rather call them legal interests, and so avoid falling into a petitio principii at the outset on the point of international law)—any act committed abroad, which is prejudicial to those interests, falls under the sway of the powers of repression that are wielded by our State (or at least is liable to the civil remedy of an action of damages, unless legislation has specially provided to the contrary). Just as dangerous is the next argument (pp. 34, 35), according to which no analogies are to be drawn from other statutes of the Empire, because different parliaments (Reichstage) adjusted them. If this argument were sound, it would make it impossible to find any comprehensive legal doctrines in modern legal systems.

²⁵ In my opinion the agent or forwarding agent in this country, who attends to the carriage of the counterfeit goods in this country, may be punished. But, on the other hand, the agent who canvasses in this country for orders for the falsely marked goods, which are intended to be carried out in a foreign country where the mark is not protected, cannot be punished. Kohler, supported by a decision of the French Ct. of Cass. of 5th Feb. 1882, thinks that he may. This country, in the case supposed, is never brought into contact with the goods, and all that the agent has actively done is, by the law of the place in which he did it, innocent.

not an universal right, but is limited by the territory. The result of the French statute (§ 19 of the statute of 23rd June 1887) is different, but that comes from the specific expressions used in the statute (see Clunet on the point, J. v. p. 91.) But the law of any country as to registered marks never does more than make the imitation of a mark registered in that country punishable by its laws.²⁷ This restriction cannot be regarded, as Kohler (p. 459) thinks, as a mere remnant of the old theory of privileges. The incorporeal right which a man has in his name, and still more the right which he has in a trade-mark, is not an absolute, universal, and exclusive right; it is founded on a right of prohibition which is framed more or less as a territorial right only. Kohler cannot help seeing that the restriction against which he struggles on principle has its practical advantages, and enables us to avoid conflicts which could not otherwise be avoided, and which could not, as we maintain, be solved. If a trade-mark is infringed in the country to which it belongs by one of our subjects, who by our law has a good right to use the mark, then, according to Kohler's theory, an insoluble difficulty would arise. But, in such a case, the territorial character of the prohibitory right, which is at the bottom of the whole law of trade-mark, must prevail, and in my view our subject, who used the mark in a foreign country, would be liable to punishment there, just as a foreigner would be liable here, if he used it in our territory.²⁸

Sixthly, On principle a foreigner must, as matter of course, be allowed to register a trade-mark;²⁹ this follows from the fact that we attribute to foreigners the same capacity for legal rights as our own subjects have. This is all the more certainly so, as the law of trade-mark guarantees to the public at the same time a protection against deceits and swindles. But yet the law of most States³⁰ does not, as a matter of course, allow a foreigner to claim protection for his trade-mark, or to claim to have it

²⁷ But it is different in so far as the act may be made the subject of a civil suit or a criminal proceeding, as "Concurrence illegale." See, for instance, the English statute of 1887 [50 and 51 Vict. c. 28, § 3, etc.].

³⁰ The consideration which dictates this limitation of the right to protection has generally been that it was desired to have a means of inducing other States to join in reciprocal treaties for protection. If we assume that foreigners acquire right to register their marks solely by virtue of some treaty published so as to have statutory effect, then any registration made before such publication is null, and can have no operation after the publication takes place: it must be re-registered. See Trib. corr. Seine, 13th August 1875: Pouillet, § 333, who is, however, inclined to save registrations made after the treaty is concluded, but before it is published.

registered.⁸¹ The determinant consideration, however, is not the nationality of the person, but the seat of his manufactory or trading establishment. If a foreigner has such an establishment in this country, he can claim a trade-mark; if a subject of this country has his manufactory abroad, he cannot. It is enough if a person has an establishment, in the true sense of the word,⁸² in this country; he may have other establishments at the same time abroad. The moment we find a trading or manufacturing establishment in this country, the trade-mark registered in our register is a trade-mark belonging to our country, and is to be tested by our law absolutely: it is not a mere accessory mark, whose legal character is dependent at the same time upon the foreign law.⁸³ The right of the person to the trade-mark itself is, however, acquired by use of it by the person concerned: by the registration he only obtains a special kind of protection. Hence it follows that the conditions necessary for this protection must be in existence at the moment at which any infringement, for which redress is demanded, takes place. A man who transfers his establishment to a foreign country, accordingly loses this protection, and the man who transfers his to this country acquires it, provided always that he registers his mark. But, of course, a right to damages, once vested, still stands, while an act done in prejudice of another's rights in a trade-mark will not be liable retrospectively to punishment, but the liability to punishment will continue if once it existed. The subject of this country, who acquires a trade-mark by assignment, may register it.⁸⁴ Juridical persons, corporations, and companies belonging to a foreign country, enjoy the same protection as physical persons.⁸⁵ But although, for want of an international treaty, a foreigner cannot sue a subject of this country for using a foreign mark, that subject, on the other hand, who so annexes the foreign mark, cannot acquire any right to it, since his act is an act of unfair trade competition. He has no right, therefore, to prevent any other competitor in trade from using it (Pauillet, Traité des Marques, § 335), and a mark so wrongfully used, even by a number of persons, does not become a piece of common property which any one may use. Thus, if a treaty for

the protection of trade-marks is subsequently concluded, the foreigner who has right to the mark, may have it registered, and proceed against the subjects of this country if they shall make any further use of it. Pouillet (§ 336) very truly says: "autre chose . . . est la tolérance, qui finit à la longue, par devenir . . . une preuve d'abandon volontaire; autre chose l'impuissance d'agir."³⁶

INTERNATIONAL TREATIES.

§ 359. A large number of treaties now secure to the subjects of foreign States the right of registration. The man who has an establishment in any State counts as one of its subjects for the purposes of these treaties. It seems doubtful whether this needs to be the leading establishment, as Kohler (p. 430) thinks,³⁷ since the rights of a subject may be fully constituted although the establishment is only a subsidiary one.

It may be that, even without a special treaty on the subject, the law³⁸ of some countries should allow foreigners to claim registration for their trade-marks, if in other States a like measure of protection is reciprocally extended to their subjects. This reciprocal protection may either be given by treaty, or simply by statute, or secured as a matter of custom by a course of usage. The protection does not need to be precisely the same in both countries; but there is no reciprocity if the foreigner may be refused leave to register at the pleasure or at the uncontrolled discretion of the officials of the other country. By the law of Germany, reciprocity will be proved as a fact by notice given by the Imperial Government. This notice is the only recognised means of proof in a German court on the matter of reciprocity: the German courts have not to decide the question of reciprocity as a matter of fact, and considering the peculiar difficulties which often surround the question, this is a good practical rule.

³⁶ This was the opinion of the French Avocat Général (Bédarride), and the law of Belgium is to this effect. (Pouillet, § 337.) But the French judgments cited by Pouillet, and art. 28 of the Franco-Dutch treaty of 1873, take the opposite view. But for the view adopted in the text, see Ct. of Cass. at Turin, 3rd March 1880 (J. ix. p. 93, and Fiore, J. ix. p. 507). See, too, Norwegian statute of 26th May 1884, § 15 (6). "If the trade-mark of some foreign trade is refused registration in respect of the provisions of § 4, No. 5, i.e. prior registration of the same or a similar work, and if the foreign applicant shall prove in the process against the owner of the mark already registered, that this mark was a mark originally used by him (the applicant) which was appropriated by the other in knowledge of the facts, he may be declared, by a judgment of the court, entitled to have the mark registered, with exclusive right to its use for the kind of goods for which he was using it when the other person got protection. The action cannot be raised after the expiration of six months from the date when protection was given to the other." This enactment is only operative if it is applied by royal proclamation to some particular foreign State which makes corresponding concessions on its side. To the same effect is the Swedish law of 5th July 1884. (Translated and communicated by Pappenheim in Zeitschr. für des gesammte Handelsr. xxxiv. pp. 212-220.)

³⁸ See Kohler's accurate discussion, at pp. 424 and 462, of the question of reciprocity and treaties.

Lastly, all foreigners must be allowed the protection which the law gives against fraudulent imitations, without requiring any registration at all. This distinction is very sharply and very soundly taken by the law of the United States. The civil protection of their Equity Jurisdiction is given to all foreigners without distinction,³⁹ whereas the special protection given to foreigners by the Registration of Trade-Marks Act of 8th March 1881 is only available for persons domiciled in the United States, or in a country which guarantees similar rights to citizens of the United States. In German law little heed is as yet paid to any such protection of the individual's rights which is not given to him by the statute,⁴⁰ a fact which is rightly deplored by Kohler both often and keenly.

PROTECTION FOR GOODS DESCRIBED OR MARKED WITH A NAME OR A FIRM.

§ 360. We have already noticed (p. 216) that the name of a person must in international law be regarded as something with which nature has endowed him, and not as the outcome of a privilege which is limited to a territory. But this assertion will only escape contradiction in so far as the name is intended to serve as a means of distinguishing persons and families one from another, and not in so far as the use of it or the imposition of a trading firm upon goods is intended to protect them from imitation. In this latter aspect the French Court of Cassation,⁴¹ by an unbroken course of practice, has refused the protection of the law of France to those who cannot claim a right to enjoy droits civils in the sense which that term bears in France,⁴² while the marking of goods with names or with firms is treated on the same footing as marking them with trade-marks in the proper sense. At the same time, it has always been recognised that in so marking goods falsely with the name of a foreigner, apart altogether from questions of protection which rest on treaties, a deceit is practised upon the public, the buyers of the goods; and that therefore, although the foreign manufacturer

⁴⁰ By a French statute of 26th Nov. 1873, one who is proprietor of a trade-mark may have an official attestation of the mark appended to the goods prepared by him and marked with the mark in question. Then, by the law of France, any one who counterfeits this mark with the official attestation, in whatever country he does so, may be prosecuted in France, because what he has done is to counterfeit an official mark (see Pouillet Traité des Marques, § 340). It may be doubtful whether it is desirable to follow this French legislation. The extension of criminal measures to the acts of foreigners in a foreign country must be confined within very narrow limits. The true advantages of an international treaty cannot be reached in so simple a way.

⁴¹ See Pouillet, § 451. The inferior French courts often took the opposite view, and so too, apparently, did the practice in England. [“Every subject of every country . . . has a right to apply to this court to have a fraudulent injury to his property arrested,” Collins Co. v. Cowen, 3 K. and J. p. 428; Sebastian, pp. 74, 75.]

or trader has no independent right of action, and damages cannot be awarded to him, still, under certain circumstances, official criminal procedure for fraud or deceit upon the public or the particular purchaser (tromperie) may be instituted against a man who has illegally used the name of a foreign manufacturer in order to describe his goods. The French law has likewise properly recognised that a Frenchman who has acquired right from a foreigner⁴³ to use his firm,⁴⁴ can take proceedings for any misuse of this name or firm just in the same way as if the name or firm had originally belonged to him. The rule "nemo plus juris in alium potest transferre quam ipse habet" does not apply to the case. The foreigner had full right to the name, but could only make it available in certain directions.⁴⁵

If we give foreigners protection for trade-marks in the proper sense, which are plainly more of an artificial creation of the law, we must also give them such protection as is known to our law in the exclusive use of their names and firms for describing their goods. The right to bear the name and to use the firm must then be decided by the foreign law, i.e. the law of the State to which the foreigner belongs, or of the State in which the firm has its trading seat, as the case may be. In such a case, if some subject of ours have a good right by the law of this country to bear the same name, the foreigner's right may become inoperative.⁴⁶

CONVENTION OF PARIS, 1883, AND PROTOCOL OF ROME, 1886. THE ENGLISH MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT OF 1887. FINAL REMARKS.

§ 361. In conclusion, we must again revert to the International Convention of Paris and the protocol drawn up at Rome in connection with it.⁴⁷ We shall be helped to appreciate these arrangements on the one hand by the English Merchandise Marks Act of 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 28), which has been passed since this date,⁴⁸ and, on the other hand, by Meili's new work, although I cannot altogether agree with him in the value which he sets upon this Convention. Meili (p. 66) calls attention to the fact that Switzerland, and, if she should give in her adhesion to it, the German Empire also, will be compelled e.g. to give protection, in accordance with the rules of French law, to French tickets or labels in contradistinction to trade-marks in the proper sense, while Swiss and German tickets or labels are not protected in Switzerland and Germany respectively. We should be transgressing the limits which are necessarily imposed upon us, if we were to go into an enquiry whether Switzerland and the German Empire would find it expedient to do away with the distinction between labels or tickets and trade-marks. Let us assume this to be so, and that for the future, therefore, no objection can be taken to the general International Convention on the ground of any such miscarriage.

⁴³ But the name of a foreign manufacturer will receive in France the same protection as the firm-designation of Frenchman, if the foreigner has an authorised domicile in France, or if a diplomatic treaty makes provision that he should have it, or if (§ 9 of the statute of 26th Nov. 1873) Frenchmen enjoy by law this same protection in the country to which the foreigner belongs. See Lyon-Caen et Renault, Dr. civ. ii. § 3342.

⁴⁴ A French agent who merely represents the foreigner will not have this right.

But this Convention, and in particular the protocol drawn up at Rome for supplementing it, go much further. Art. x. of the Convention provides that any industrial product falsely bearing the name of any locality as indication of the place of origin may be seized on importation into any State of the union, on this condition, viz.: that this shall only be done "when such indication is associated with a trade-name of a fictitious character, or assumed with a fraudulent intention." This qualification was deleted by the protocol drawn up at Rome. Accordingly, as Meili very rightly points out, the Convention has become to some extent an universal criminal statute directed against commercial dishonesty, or, as we may term it, a general statute against false pretences in trade.

That state of matters has important aspects, especially if the Convention sanctions the municipal law of any of its members in detaining goods, the marking of which seems to offend the provisions of the Convention, on an order from the Attorney General's office (Staatsanwaltschaft), without any application having been made by any injured party, or, as the English statute provides in the case of offences against its provisions, by the officers of H. M. Customs as part of their ordinary duties. It is hardly possible that in such matters subordinate officials should not make mistakes, which may, in the most irritating way, injure foreign manufacturers and dealers. Thus, by an overstrained measure of protection, the door will be opened to deceptions, extortions, and possibly to bribery, and what seemed to be an advantage for honourable manufacturers may turn out to be to their prejudice in a way that was not dreamed of. The matter is confined within definite limits, if all that is forbidden is, as in the case of the English statute [50 and 51 Vict. c. 28, § 17], the importation of foreign goods bearing to be of British manufacture, and it is only goods which are suspicious in this sense that are to be seized by the Customs officers. But how are English officers to ascertain with certainty what is the place of origin of all other kinds of goods, so as to determine their genuineness? A perfectly general law of that kind must operate differently in different places, according to the spirit which animates the officials of the different States. It goes so extraordinarily far into the general theory of criminal law, as the new British statute shows, and affects so vitally trade and commerce in general, that an International Convention which is responsible for such measures of seizure, seems to have very serious and dangerous aspects indeed.⁴⁹

⁴⁹ Unjustifiable seizures and more sweeping measures, alleged to be for the better carrying out of the Convention, may damage importation more than a protective duty would do.

The course on which the Convention has embarked leads ultimately to an universal criminal enactment against the misdescription of goods in commercial dealings, which would make any special protection of trade-marks a superfluity.

Such a criminal enactment is in truth a matter for the municipal law of each State, but does not belong to international law. The only matter of international interest is that the imitation of foreign products should be made liable to punishment in the same way as the imitation of our own products is punishable, or at least that such imitation shall not escape punishment, solely on the ground that the product which has been imitated is a foreign product, although it may be that practical considerations will prevent foreign and native products from being treated exactly alike. But because the matter thus in question is substantially a matter of domestic criminal legislation for each particular State, everything that sails under the flag of an "International Congress" is not on that account to be at once accepted as desirable. Again, new and far-reaching criminal enactments and regulations of matters of procedure, which limit the freedom of trade, should not be allowed to escape from the ordeal of a thorough test within each individual State on the ground that as "international" measures they are expedient. We regard, however, the recommendation⁵⁰ that counterfeit goods (i.e. in practice goods which are alleged to be or which seem to be counterfeit) should be seized,⁵¹ as a direct invasion of the domestic law of the individual State.

Powers of this kind will turn out to be something quite different in an absolute State, where officialism is paramount, and in which legal remedies against officials are narrowed or shut off altogether, from what they will be found to be in a country where the official system is subject to a jurisdiction that is really independent.

NOTE GG ON §§ 357-361. TRADE-MARK AND TRADE-NAME.

[The Act of 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57) provides for the registration of trade-marks as well as for that of patents and of designs. § 62 (1)

⁵⁰ The words used in the Convention—somewhat hesitatingly—are "may be seized," and not "shall." But we can trace in the language a recommendation that they should be seized.

⁵¹ An addition to art. x. of the Convention, which was made at Rome on the motion of the Belgian delegate, shows what may be the results in such congresses of keeping in view exclusively the wishes of the interested parties. The clause provides that manufacturer A of country X may order goods of manufacturer B of country V, and with B's consent mark them with his own (A's) name and place of residence. No subjective legal wrong, it is true, is in such a case suffered by the parties. But the fraud upon the public and their losses, and the injury done to competitors, may be all the worse. The French and Prussian delegates properly protested against this addition. If manufacturers and merchants wish to enjoy special protection under the sanction of the criminal law, they must not combine to cheat the public. See judgment of French Court of Cass. 23rd February 1884 (J. xi. p. 398). Of course, the case is different if the person who gives the orders puts his name on the goods as a dealer merely, and not as the manufacturer, Ct. of Toulouse, 8th December 1886 (J. xiii. p. 723, and Clunet, ibid. p. 724).

provides that the comptroller may register a trade-mark, on the application of any person, or on behalf of any person claiming to be proprietor of it. § 103, to which reference has already been made (supra, p. 771), makes provision for the registration in Britain of trade-marks already registered in such foreign countries as shall be included in an Order in Council made by Her Majesty under the provisions of the statute. The third subsection provides that the application for registration must be made "in the same manner as an ordinary application under this Act; provided that, in the case of trade-marks, any trade-mark, the registration of which has been duly applied for in the country of origin, may be registered under this Act." This subsection seems to introduce an important change in the law; it had formerly been held that it was for the courts of this country, when application was made to them for registration, to decide whether the mark was of a kind that could be registered. In the case of Farina (2), 1879, 27 W. R. 456, Vice-Chancellor Hall refused to allow the registration of a mark, because in his opinion it bore too close a resemblance to a mark previously registered, and this he did although the German court, which was the court of the domicile of both parties, had held that the similarity between the two marks was not so close as to prevent registration of the second. But this new enactment has been said (per Mr Justice Stirling, in re Californian Fig Syrup Co. 1888, L. R. 40, Ch. D. 620) "to relieve the foreigner who applies in this country for registration from certain of the liabilities of subjects in this country." This Mr Sebastian (p. 412) interprets to mean that the qualifications of a trade-mark for registration are to be gathered, not from British law, but from the foreign law of the place of the original registration, and in a more recent case (in re Vignier, 1889, L. T. Reps. N. S. p. 495) some encouragement is given to this view.

The law of England and that of Scotland had always afforded to foreigners the same protection for their trade-marks, either by way of actions of damages or by injunction, i.e. interdict, as was secured to native subjects. (Collins Co. v. Brown, 1857, 3 K. and J. p. 423, and Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Kimball & Morton, 1873, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. xi. p. 267.) But by the 77th section of the Act of 1883 it is provided that "a person shall not be entitled to institute any proceeding to prevent or to recover damages for the infringement of a trade-mark unless, in the case of a trade-mark capable of being registered under this Act," it has been so registered. This section would seem to apply (1) to all trade-marks belonging to countries with which Her Majesty has made arrangements under § 103, and (2) to all trade-marks belonging to other foreign countries which have the characteristics required for registration in England, since, under § 62, any person, without distinction of country, may apply for registration. Such persons will have no remedy without registration; but in the case of a foreigner whose mark has become well known in this country, if we suppose that he does not belong to one of the favoured countries, and, in addition, that his mark does not satisfy the conditions for British registration, he will not necessarily be deprived of remedy. If the infringement amounts to a fraud, he will be entitled to proceed against the person infringing at common law, just as one might do if the character of the infringement complained of were, instead of being the use of a trade-mark, the adoption of a particular style of packing or "get-up." See the cases quoted by Mr Sebastian, p. 389.

British agents for a foreign firm will be prevented from selling in England goods manufactured by their foreign principals, if they bear a false mark, to the injury of other manufacturers (Siebert v. Findlater, 1878, L. R. 7, Ch. D. 801), and an injunction will be granted against foreign manufacturers and their agents to prevent them from sending to Britain, or to India, or to any country with which the person complaining has an established trade, goods bearing an imitation of a British trade-mark, fraudulently adopted by the foreign manufacturer.

By the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28) stringent provisions are made for the punishment by the criminal law of offences connected with trade-marks. By § 2 every person who forges a trade-mark, or sells or has in his possession for sale, or for trade or manufacture, any goods marked with a forged trade-mark, or with a mark so closely resembling a trade-mark as to be calculated to deceive, shall be guilty of an offence against the Act, and to forfeiture of the "chattel, article, instrument, or thing, by means of or in relation to which the offence has been committed." On the ordinary territorial principles of criminal law, this section will be applicable to acts done in Britain, whatever may be the nationality or domicile of the person who commits them.

§ 11, however, provides that any person who, being within the United Kingdom, procures, etc., or is accessory to the commission, without the United Kingdom, of any act which, if committed in the United Kingdom, would be a misdemeanour under the Act, shall be guilty of that misdemeanour as a principal.

Again, by § 16, on the narrative of the expediency of making further provision for prohibiting the importation of goods which, if sold, would be liable to forfeiture under the Act, provision is made for the seizure at the Custom House of the goods liable to forfeiture under § 2, and of all goods, which are truly of foreign manufacture, but bearing a name or trade-mark which is the name or the trade-mark of a manufacturer, dealer, or trader in the United Kingdom, unless such name or trade-mark is accompanied by a "definite indication" of the country in which the goods were made. The powers of seizure are carefully fenced by a series of subsections.]

Tenth Book.

LAW OF SUCCESSION.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES. SUCCESSION ab intestato.

THE VARIOUS THEORIES AND THE GROUNDS ON WHICH THEY REST.
PERSONAL LAW OR lex rei sitæ FOR IMMOVEABLE PROPERTY. THE IDEA OF AN UNIVERSAL SUCCESSION DECISIVE IN FAVOUR OF THE PERSONAL LAW.

§ 362. The law of succession prescribes how the property of one person on his death passes to another. This transmission we may conceive as being regulated either by (1) the law of the place in which the different assets of property actually are at the death of the person who owned them, or (2) by the personal law of the late owner.

In support of the lex rei sitæ, apart from the old argument of the statute theory, (according to which it was said that the question was one as to how things were to be acquired, and that no law but the lex rei sitæ could settle questions about things,) it has been urged, on the one hand, that the law of succession is a purely positive law, created by the State or the community, and that its validity cannot therefore be extended beyond its own territory,¹ and, on the other hand, that every statute which deals with succession has a political and social import, and that therefore these statutes are pre-eminently jus publicum. It is said that the social, and therefore the political, circumstances of a country are in no small measure dependent on the shape which the law of succession takes. As instances, we may notice the rights of the oldest child, the legality or illegality of entails, the contrast between full powers of testamentary bequests and limited powers. But, as matters of fact, these considerations are only cited in support of the supremacy of the lex rei sitæ over immoveable property. Succession in moveables has universally, ever since the days of the Middle Ages, been determined exclusively by the personal law² of the deceased at the time of his death, while the logical consequences of the general principle are kept intact by the application of the fiction "mobilia ossibus inhaerent."

But, as regards the former of these considerations, it is simply got rid of by remarking that acquisition by way of succession no more and no less belongs to the positive law established or, more properly, guaranteed by the State, than does acquisition by sale and tradition. Indeed, it is an absolute necessity that property should pass from one generation of mankind to the following, and the law of succession, taking the different shapes which it does take in different countries, does no more than regulate this transmission, which is in itself necessary, in different ways. The truth of the second argument, however, we may allow. But it can never prove that the State should subject to its own laws of succession the estate, belonging to one who was not its subject, which happens to be within its bounds. It can never have so strong a social or political interest as to induce it to do so. If the deceased and his family belong to another country, there is no such interest to be discovered at all. What concern is it of this country, if a foreign family, owing to the stupid division of the estate that belonged to the head of the family, be the question one of testament or intestacy, is ruined in its prospects? Is it not the most convenient course for this country to be content with what the other State provides for its own subjects?³

To this it has of course been replied, "That is quite true of moveable estate; but the ownership of the land constitutes the very foundation on which the State is built: in this matter, to recognise the operation of foreign law is to contradict the very conception of the sovereign power of a State." But if the State, in its laws dealing with succession, treats moveable and immoveable estate on exactly the same principles, if, even as regards real estate, it recognises as authoritative any purposes you please expressed by the deceased in his last disposition, if, again, it further permits any division you like of the moveable estate, what justification can we find for introducing that distinction, as a matter of principle, between moveable and immoveable estate into the system of law that is to guide us? How can we deny to a foreign law, which perhaps may be defended on very substantial considerations, what we concede to the will of the individual in support of which perhaps very little can be said?⁴

The distinction is not one that can be drawn from the abstract idea of sovereignty: moveables are, just as much as immoveables, subject to the sovereign power of the State, so long as they actually are within its territory. If private international law is to treat moveable and immoveable property on different footings, then the systems of municipal law which are in question, be it that of the State to which the deceased belongs, or that of the State in which the immoveable property happens to be, must themselves make a fundamental distinction between moveable property on the one hand, and immoveable on the other. That is of course quite possible, and is not unfrequently the case, and was still more frequently the case in the Middle Ages. This circumstance teaches us to understand on the one side the historical development that has taken place in the international treatment of the law of succession, and, on the other hand, the justification in certain circumstances of the theory, which upholds the validity of the lex rei sitæ to the present day, limited as the extent of that justification must be.

This is shown by the following considerations, which in our view must govern the international treatment of the law of succession:—

First, It might be the case that nothing but the actual assets belonging to the estate of the deceased and his rights should pass to the successor, and that all debts should be discharged by the death of the person to whom they originally attached. Such a rule, which would make succession merely a form for acquiring particular things and particular rights, could never be satisfactory, except in a very low state of civilisation—a state in which claims and debts existed for a limited time only, where payment followed immediately upon delivery, and in which credit was unknown: the existence of any claim would depend entirely upon the uncertain length of the debtor's life, and the heir would no more be under an obligation to pay the debts of his ancestor than the person who had got any article from that ancestor by purchase or by gift.

Secondly, The estate might pass as a whole to another person, who would possess it precisely as the ancestor possessed it, and therefore take over the debts with it⁵—in other words, so possess it that the legal personality of the ancestor would be revived in the successor. This is the rule of the Roman law, the system of a pure universal succession, and its result is the greatest security possible for the creditor, because the existence of the debt is quite independent of the life of the debtor,⁶ in so far as there is any one to take over the inheritance of the deceased as heir.

Lastly, We may figure an intermediate system: Certain articles included in the succession, such as real property is shown by its nature to be, are not affected by the debts; other assets of the succession are affected even after the debtor's death by his liabilities, but in such fashion that the things themselves are alone responsible, and the persons who take them by virtue of the law of succession, are only bound to discharge the debts in so far as their share of the succession will suffice. This intermediate rule is the rule of the older German law;⁷ and it may be reconciled, too, with a more advanced stage of civilisation, in which it is not uncommon that claims of debt should exist for a considerable time, while the creditor must have some security against the event of the debtor's death. The creditor may trust his debtor absolutely to the amount of the value of the property which is subject to be affected by debt after the death of the debtor, and still greater security is given if, as is the case in more modern times, it is competent, under certain conditions, to affect with liability for debts the specially important property in immoveables. If the rule of the Roman law ensures in the highest degree the creditor's safety, and gives his estate the greatest elasticity, the rule of the Germanic law, without overlooking the protection which the creditor needs, has at the same time in view the protection of the successor against a perpetuation of the liability for all time. The rule of the Roman law, which is quite unnecessary for the protection of the creditor, that all the successor's own resources and his own separate estate, against which the creditor could have no claim at the time the debt was contracted, should be made available to the creditor, is not retained: but the heirs and the family of the ancestor will not lose their right to the important estate, which, as a rule, no ancestor desires to withdraw from them, unless there shall be some special arrangement previously made to affect them. In other words, there is in the German system what is partly a particular, partly an universal succession: the latter exists for the moveable,⁸ the former for the immoveable succession; but still particular debts may pass along with the immoveable succession, if they are specially attached to it, and are in a certain measure made real rights.

⁵ A new view recently proposed is that of Heusler in his Institutionen des D. Privatr. (1886), p. 533. He sees the distinctive peculiarity not in the liability of the heir for his predecessor's debts, but simply in the fact that "the mass of his property passes to him by virtue of a legal title." Heusler meets the obvious criticism that in that case a sale, e.g. which includes a number of articles, must involve an universal succession, with the remark that in such cases "the title in each transaction must be independently constituted." I cannot, however, succeed in discovering any tenable distinction between succession on the one side and sale on the other, as regards the unity and independence of the title under which the property is taken. A sale, under which several articles are sold for a lump sum, is certainly just as much one transaction as a testament, by virtue of which the heir takes several assets. The title given by the testament is, as regards the acquisition of the articles which it covers, no less and no more independent than the title given in a sale is for the article sold. Of course, the heir need not be liable for each and every debt of the deceased: there may be exceptional classes of debts, which expire with him. But as a general principle an universal succession implies liability for debts, although not necessarily to a larger amount than the value of the estate.

⁶ It is no essential of universal succession that the heir should be answerable beyond the amount of the succession. The truth rather is, that the succession is regarded as a purely arithmetical quantity, which may just as well result in a minus quantity as a plus (cf. Savigny, System, i. 383). The conception of an universal succession is satisfied if the heir performs exactly those prestations which the ancestor, if he had lived, was able to perform; that this is so is shown by the association in Roman law of the beneficium inventarii with an universal succession. Just as the hereditas jacens represents the ancestor, although there can be no notion of responsibility beyond the amount of the succession, so, too, does the heir, who represents the ancestor only to a limited extent. According to Roman law, if the heir enters upon the succession that implies at once a new and independent obligation on the part of the heir, quasi ex contractu, to pay the debts of the succession, and this liability no one can incur, unless he is of status such as to be able to bind himself by legal transactions.

⁷ Cf. Beseler, ii. pp. 486, 487; Landlaw of Saxony, i. art. 6, § 3; Stobbe, Jahrbuch des D. Rechts, v. p. 293.

It is a necessary result of regarding the position of the heir as an universal succession, by means of which the legal personality of the deceased passes over to his heir, that this transmission can only take place in conformity with the law of the land to which this legal personality of the deceased belonged at the time of his death—that is, the law of the last domicile which he had.⁹

On the other hand, if his position is regarded as a particular succession, then, as in the law of things generally, it is the law of the place to which the thing belongs that must be applied.

On the other hand, it is a mistake to refer the law of intestate succession to what, it is presumed, would have been the will of the deceased, and thus to establish the universal validity of the lex domicilii, as if the deceased must have known what this law was, and tacitly taken it to regulate his succession.¹⁰ But a proof to the contrary is the existence in Roman law of heirs that must be recognised¹¹—a provision by which an order of succession is introduced which not merely runs counter to the presumed will of the deceased, but is contrary to his plainly expressed will.¹² A further proof is that by older Germanic law testaments and dispositions mortis causa were not known, and the ancestor could not as a rule defeat the rights of his nearest heirs in heritage without their consent, even by a disposition inter vivos.¹³ Besides, we may possibly find it asserted—and by Wharton, § 557, we actually do find it so asserted—that the person who leaves the estate may in the case of real estate, e.g. have had the lex rei sitæ in his mind.

⁸ Laurent (ii. § 129) thinks that the older German law had the idea of an universal succession to its full extent, and on this point he attacks Schäffner and me. His argument is the well-known brocard, "Le mort saisit le vif." The true reason for the sharp attack is (see § 131) that Laurent thinks that he sees me involved in the bonds of feudality, a spectre so familiar to his view.

Savigny modifies this reasoning in this direction, that he does not seek to establish the order of intestate succession upon what may be presumed to be the wish of particular persons for their own individual circumstances, but bases it upon a general presumption to which the law of each different territory gives a different expression, according as it conceives the nature of the relations of the various members of a family requires. In this general sense, however, every rule of law rests upon what it is reasonable to suppose is the wish of the person concerned. There is no peculiarity or characteristic specially belonging to the law of succession, and that view will not support the application of the lex domicilii to that department of the law unless the lex domicilii is also to be applied to every rule of law.

Further, the application of the lex domicilii cannot be supported on the ground that the law of succession depends upon the personal properties of the one man concerned, and is, in fact, a law of status, or an enlargement of the personality of the ancestor.¹⁴ There is nothing to show either that the law of succession is part of the law of the ancestor's status, or that everything affecting status is, as a rule, to be settled by the lex domicilii. All rights may be represented as constituting an enlargement of personality,¹⁵ and the lex domicilii, therefore, would have to be applied in every case.¹⁶

But, in the third place, there is no more force in the assertion that the State in laying down rules of succession has persons only, and not property,

¹⁰ So, too, Bartholom. de Saliceto, in L. 1, C. de S. Trin. No. 14, and in more recent times, Glück, Intestaterbfolge, pp. 159-164; Gunther, p. 733.

¹² See in my favour, Schäffner, p. 171, and Asser-Rivier, § 62.

¹³ See Walter, D. Rechtsgeschichte, ii. § 469. It is strange, and perhaps to be referred to Germanic principles in the law of succession, that questions of succession in Spain, where the point is whether the law of Spain or a foreign law shall be applied, are settled by the personal law of the deceased, but, when the doubt is between the provincial or particular systems with Spain itself, the lex rei sitæ is looked upon as decisive. See Torres Campos, p. 288, and the judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Spain, of 8th June 1874, there cited.

in view; and that the laws of succession, therefore, affect only the subjects of a State, but affect them in all questions pertaining to their property.¹⁷ It might just as reasonably be said that these laws affect things only, and that the lex rei sitæ should therefore be applied.

No other ground can be found for assigning the law of succession to the regulation of the personal law of the person deceased than that succession is an universal succession.¹⁸ No other ground is tenable, and therefore we must admit that there is something to be said for the application of the lex rei sitæ, if and in so far as the principal of an universal succession is rejected. This gives a key to the historical development of theories of the international treatment of the law of succession, and to the contrast which exists up to the present time between the jurisprudence of the Continent of Europe on the one hand, which is spreading more and more, and the jurisprudence of England [of Scotland] and of the United States on the other.¹⁹

HISTORICAL EXPLANATION OF THE DIVERSITY OF LEGAL DOCTRINE IN DIFFERENT COUNTRIES.²⁰ NECESSITY FOR THE RECOGNITION OF THE lex rei sitæ TO A CERTAIN EXTENT.

§ 363. In the Middle Ages, and up to the beginning of the last century, even the Romanistic school of law lay under the influence of Germanic law. The full bearings of the doctrine of an universal succession were not yet understood, and therefore at this date the preponderance of opinion in Germany, the Netherlands, and France, was in favour of disposing of immoveable property by the rules of the lex rei sitæ.²¹ In later times

¹⁷ Wächter, ii. p. 198.

¹⁸ This ground is taken by older writers—e.g. Barthol. de Saliceto, in L. 1, C. de S. Trin., and is urged by most of the more modern German authors.

¹⁹ I am glad that this exposition has found approval with such an expert in legal history and in German law as Stobbe (§ 34, note 40).

(On the other hand, see Foote, p. 183, on the recognition of the lex domicilii in matters of moveable succession.) Brocher, i. p. 432, in so far as the existing French law is concerned. See, however, a well-reasoned judgment of the Trib. Civ. at Havre, 28th Aug. 1874 (J. i. p. 182), on the thorough those jurists, in whose country the doctrines of Germanic law and feudal principles bear sway, adhered to the lex rei sitæ, while in other quarters, in which the law of Rome began more and more to govern the whole theory, the determination of questions in succession law by the lex domicilii pressed further and further to the front.²² We can thus explain without difficulty how it is the German jurisprudence that takes the lead in the recognition of the lex domicilii, and how, again, in French jurisprudence, the traditions of the eminent writers on the Germanic *coutumes*²³ are for a while used in defence of the lex rei sitæ. But we can also understand how since the enactment of the French Code,²⁴ in which feudal systems are entirely thrown application of the personal law. The passages cited from the Roman law, L. un. l. ubi. de hered. 3, 20, Nov. 69, cap. 1, deal only with jurisdiction, and prove nothing as to the application of the local law of the thing. In Russia, too, the lex rei sitæ rules real property (v. Martens, § 76, note 4). He says, however, "the maxim is entirely at variance with the leading ideas of the law of succession."

In British India the lex rei sitæ rules the real property, the lex domicilii the moveable. (See Lyon, The Law of India, 1873, cap. v. § 5.)

In Austria, by a decree of the court of 22nd July 1812, and still more plainly by a law of the 9th August 1854, it is distinctly recognised as the duty and the right of the Austrian courts to take up the regulation of the real estate of a foreigner, and the lex rei sitæ is applicable by direct legislative enactment. The most puzzling complications must result from this confusion, for the idea of an universal succession is deeply rooted in the Austrian Statute Book, see § 531. (Law of 9th August 1854, § 2: "The administration of the real property of a deceased foreigner, which is situated in Austrian territory, belongs entirely to the Austrian courts, to which the law assigns such questions where its own citizens are concerned, and therefore the rights of all concerned must be attended to in accordance with Austrian law." See Unger, i. p. 199, and Vesque v. Püttlingen, on the conflicts which arise from this rule of law.) On the other hand, in a new Austro-Servian treaty, the national law of the predecessor is declared to be the exclusive rule. (See Paulovitsch, J. xi. p. 28.)

²³ From this comes, as Bouhier, chap. xxiii. No. 12, chap. xxvi. No. 71, with some sadness says, the ancien préjugé enraciné of the older French authors, que toutes les coutumes sont réelles. Bouhier, as President of the Parliament at Dijon, stood closer to the Roman law.

aside as regards succession, and since the rules of universal succession, without any distinction in principle being drawn between moveable and immoveable property, have come to be generally recognised, the most modern French jurisprudence, like the new Italian school, has gone over with flying colours, and taken up its position on the exclusive application of the personal law.²⁵

Schäffner rejects the view we have adopted, although he admits it to be logically correct, and announces that he is in favour of the lex rei sitæ, because, on the one hand, so simple a thing as the law of intestate succession should not be made dependent upon such distinctions; and, on the other hand, because, if the lex domicilii is to be the rule, there must be a new exception when we have to deal with a prohibitory enactment. The latter difficulty has no application to the view we have adopted, and the former we can meet by remembering that the question, whether the lex rei sitæ regards succession as universal, is easily answered; and, where the lex domicilii and the lex rei sitæ both regard it as universal, it is only when we propose to apply the lex rei sitæ that difficulties arise. Savigny (§ 378; Guthrie, p. 288) gives the following illustration with reference to this matter: An inhabitant of Berlin dies intestate, leaving a widow and several near relations of different degrees; the estate consists of landed property near Berlin and in Silesia, a house in Ehrenbreitstein, and a house in Coblenz; besides that, the deceased has many personal debts, which, of course, affect all parts of his estate. According to the theory of our opponents, no fewer than four different systems of law must regulate the succession to these parcels of real property, and each of them may give its parcel to a different heir; there would, in truth, be four inheritances, regulated in the Mark of Brandenburg by the Joachima of 1527, by which corporeal articles. Prussian practice is fixed: it applies universally the lex domicilii. See Forster-Eccius, i. § 11, No. 7, who approves of this practice.

But see, for the application of the personal law of the deceased, L. Renault (J. ii. p. 329); Laurent, i. § 294; ii. § 123; vi. § 128; Durand, § 186; Weiss, p. 834 ("la territorialité des lois successorales engendre des difficultés pratiques inextricables"). Despagne, § 490; Asser-Rivier, § 62; Labbé (J. xii. p. 14) declares that, so far as future legislation is concerned, the loi nationale of the deceased should be the exclusive rule. In Belgium the rule of practice has been hitherto, as in France, to apply the lex rei sitæ. See Haus, Dr. Priv. § 131; Picard (J. viii. p. 487).

Preliminary art. 8 of the Italian Code enjoins the observance of the national law of the deceased in the most thorough fashion. A decision of the Sup. Ct. of Spain in 1868, which enjoys statutory force, makes the national law of the deceased the rule. (See Salmeron, J. ix. p. 407, who describes the adoption of this principle as one of the most important advances in legal science.) See judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Spain, again, on 6th June 1873, J. i. p. 40. Calvo, ii. § 849, gives a review of the jurisprudence of various countries.

the widow has right to one half of the combined estate of herself and her husband,—in Silesia by the Allgemeines Landrecht, in Ehrenbreitstein by Roman law, and in Coblenz by French law. We shall thus in truth have four separate successions.

§ 364. If, on the other hand, universal succession is not recognised by the personal law, or, it may be, by the lex rei sitæ, and while therefore some debts are seen to be a special burden upon the real estate, while others have nothing at all to do with it, the greatest confusion would arise if the lex domicilii were generally applied, just in the same way as if, in the case of a feu, feudal and allodial debts were all thrown together.²⁶ No doubt, if we found a case—which according to the principles of Germanic law explained above, could only be counted an abnormal state of matters—where there was no universal succession, but yet the debts fell alike upon the moveable and real estate, then, in this case, the only expedient left would be a taxation and apportionment; but that would be due not to any error in our theory as to the collision of legal systems, but solely to the individual territorial system.

The following cases may serve to illustrate our meaning. By the law

²⁶ Cf. Vattel, ii. ch. 8, § 100: "Les biens qu'il (l'étranger) délaisse en mourant, dans un pays étranger, doivent naturellement passer à ceux qui sont héritiers. Mais cette règle générale n'empêche point, que les biens immeubles ne doivent suivre les dispositions des lois du pays où ils sont situés." Renaud, i. § 42, ii. 3; and Kierulff, 79, 80, take our view. And so too does Stobbe, § 34, note 44; so too the practice of the Sup. Ct. of Oldenburg (Seuffert, xxiii. § 4). Muheim, for instance, goes wrong, because he does not take into account the possibility of a rule of singular succession prevailing by the lex rei sitæ but with liability for certain debts. He has, however, altogether misunderstood my meaning if he thinks (pp. 246, 247) that in my first edition I defended the application of the lex rei sitæ in the case of French and Swiss law. Of the Swiss law I said not one word. Preliminary Art. 8 of the Italian Code also goes too far in regulating the succession by the national law of the deceased, "of whatsoever nature the estate is, and wheresoever it is situated." It is also entirely wrong to say (like Muheim, p. 247) that the recognition of the lex rei sitæ is a consequence of the incapacity of foreigners to enjoy rights. A decision of the Court of Cass. at Turin, of 4th Dec. 1870 (Pallavicini v. Gavotti), has very properly recognised that the principle of the Italian Code cannot be carried out without certain modifications. Fiore (p. 633) criticises this decision unfavourably, and at the same time defends the literal sense of the Italian Code. But he is wrong. The question does not, as Fiore thinks, turn upon the fact that the Italian judgment will not receive an exequatur abroad, but rather on the consideration that in certain circumstances the Italian Court will have to declare certain real rights to be existent, which as a matter of fact do not exist, because the lex rei sitæ does not recognise them (e.g. shares in a trust estate which is indivisible). Two later judgments of the same court meet Fiore's argument excellently well (J. viii. p. 228); Esperson does not approve of these. So too the Court of Cass. at Florence, on 15th June 1875, decided in the same spirit (Gianzana, ii. § 178) that the lex rei sitæ must prevail if it claims to regulate the succession to different parcels of property.

Many modern treaties confirm our view that a certain respect to the lex rei sitæ may be required. If in country A the lex rei sitæ is strictly adhered to as the rule of succession—on what ground it matters not—then country B, in concluding a treaty which shall regulate the succession of the subjects of both countries, cannot but adopt the lex rei sitæ, notwithstanding that in country B the personal law is generally taken as the rule of succession. See Art. x. of the Russo-German treaty of 12th Nov. 1874, and Art. xix. of the Servian-German consular treaty of 6th Jan. 1883. Russia still insists strictly on the lex rei sitæ. See Durand, p. 525, on the Franco-Russian treaty of 1st April 1874.

of Scotland heritable bonds, which are obligations for payment of money secured by the hypothecation or the creation of some other real right over heritable estate,²⁷ fall upon this estate primarily, while in England the law makes the moveable estate liable in the first place for the payment of such obligations. If then a domiciled Englishman, who owns real estate in Scotland, has granted such an heritable bond over it, our theory will make the Scottish heir in heritage answerable without recourse against the English representative in moveables. By the terms of the bond the obligation is closely attached to the heritable subject, and becomes a real burden, which has the character of a personal debt only in a subsidiary sense. It has been so decided in England, upon what is certainly a singular ground, viz. that the disability of the Scottish heir to require the heirs in personalty to relieve him of the debt follows him to England.²⁸ Conversely, if the real estate is by the lex rei sitæ not primarily answerable for payment of debts, this is explained by the fact that the heir in heritage was originally only responsible for debts which had been created a real burden upon the estate, but that in later times he took the position of a cautioner, himself bound along with the principal debtor. He has, therefore, recourse against the foreign executor in solidum, even although the foreign law would allow the debt to attach to both moveable and immoveable estate; just as a successor in a feu, who pays what is subsidiarily a debt upon the feu, has recourse against the heir who takes the allodial estate.²⁹

²⁹ In the result, Story, § 489c, and Pothier, des Successions, ch. 5, § 1; Burge, ii. p. 85, iv. pp. 724, 725, 732, 733; Merlin, Rép. Dette. § 3, iv.; Bouhier, ch. 29, No. 59, ch. 24, No. 186, are agreed. Story, § 486, reports the following case: "A person domiciled in England died intestate, leaving real estate in Scotland. The heir, who was one of the next of kin, claimed a share of the personal estate. To this claim it was objected that by the law of Scotland the heir cannot share with the other next of kin in the personal property of an intestate except on condition of collating the real estate; that is, bringing it into a mass with the personal estate, to form one common subject of division. It was determined, however, that he was entitled to take his share without complying with that obligation." This decision, too, is right. The Scots and English estates form two distinct and separate subjects, which stand to one another just as the succession to two different persons would. See, too, Westlake-Holtzendorf, §§ 110 and 152: "No law for the regulation of the claims of creditors or legatees, which is binding in the country in which the mass of a deceased person's estate is being administered, can ever throw a heavier burden upon his landed estate, with the object of satisfying the creditors upon the succession, than the lex situs allows, even although the deceased was domiciled abroad." [See Westlake, § 162.]

Art. vii. of the resolutions of the Institute of International Law passed at Oxford in 1880, reserves in the same way (Ann. 5th year, pp. 54, 55) the possibility of an application of the lex rei sitæ, if, that is to say, by that law or by the personal law of the deceased there could not be said to be an universal succession. The article runs thus: "Les successions à l'universalité d'un patrimoine sont, quant à la détermination des personnes successibles, à l'étendue de leurs droits, à la mesure ou quotité de la portion disponible ou de la réserve, et à la validité intrinsèque des dispositions de dernière volonté, régies par les lois de l'état auquel appartient le défunt, ou subsidiairement dans les cas prévus ci-dessus à l'art. ii. par les lois de son domicile, quels que soient la nature des biens ou le lieu de leur situation."

NOTE HH ON §§ 363, 364. PRINCIPLE OF SUCCESSION IN BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.

[The general principle followed, as the author correctly states, in England, Scotland, and America, in questions involving rights of succession, is that, if the subject be real estate, the lex rei sitæ prevails; if, on the other hand, moveables are the subject in hand, the law of the domicile of the deceased at the time of his death will decide.

Thus, too, as regards the incidence of debts, it is held that, while the creditors of the deceased must be satisfied out of any estate he may have left, be it moveable or be it heritable, the executor, if he pays an heritable debt, may have recourse against the heir, and in the converse case, the heir who pays a debt which is not truly an heritable debt, may have recourse against the executor. But although the two estates inter se are primarily liable each for its own liabilities, the executor who has paid away, or is in course of paying away, the executry estate, cannot be made liable to relieve an heir who has, out of the heritable estate, paid what was truly a debt upon the executry (Erskine, iii. 9, 47).

While, therefore, the creditors have a right to demand payment out of any estate they can find, each parcel must, in a question between the heir and executor, bear its own liabilities, and the lex rei sitæ will determine whether a debt has been well constituted against the heritable estate, so as to affect the heir rather than the executor. The law of England and of Scotland applies the lex rei sitæ so exclusively in regard to real property, that the law of the deceased's domicile will be entirely ignored in its apportionment of debts and legacies as between the personal and real estate. The latter is not affected unless the lex rei sitæ pronounces it to be (Westlake, § 162, and Harrison v. Harrison, 1873, L.R. 8, Ch. App. 342), and the heir taking it is not bound in any obligation of relief unless his own law, i.e. the lex rei sitæ, so provides (Balfour v. Scott, 1793, H. of L. 6, Bro. P.C. 550, referred to by Sir William Grant, M.R., in Brodie v. Barry, 1813, 2 Ves and Beames, 127). If he has by accident paid personal debts, he will have recourse against the executor, who is administering in the other country, by the laws of which an heir has no such right of relief. (Winchelsea v. Garetty, 1838, 2 Keen, p. 293.) Again, according to the authority cited by Story, and referred to in the text (Drummond, 1799, 6, Bro. P.C. 601, also referred to by Sir William Grant in Brodie ut supra), a Scottish heir will be liable to pay an heritable bond secured over the estate in Scotland which he takes, and will have no right of relief, that being the law of Scotland, although by the law of the deceased's domicile, viz. England, he would have had recourse against the executor.

For the law of the United States, which on this matter is the same as those of England and Scotland, see Wharton, §§ 560, 561.]

PRESUMED INTENTION OF THE DECEASED? IS NATIONALITY OR DOMICILE TO RULE THE LAW OF SUCCESSION? COERCITIVE LAWS.

§ 365. Many writers³⁰ base the general recognition of the personal law of the deceased, in questions of succession, upon what may be presumed to have been his intention. We have already declared ourselves against any such basis for the doctrine. It has this further drawback, that, so long as we found on it there is just as much reason for taking the lex domicilii as the law of the nationality as the personal law which is to guide us, whereas on our theory, which is also the theory of the modern Italo-French school, the latter law, i.e. of the nationality, must alone be applied. For the law of the family and the law of succession stand in close connection one with the other,³¹ and if the law of the nationality is held to be regulative of the former, the law of succession, unless in so far as it falls in exceptional cases under the lex rei sitæ, must also be under the guidance of the law of nationality.³²

All are, however, agreed that the personal law which the deceased had at the time of his death must rule, while nothing whatever depends on the place where he happened to be temporarily at the moment of his death. But in the case of married persons a sharp line must be drawn between what is really succession, and what is the operation of the community of goods involved in marriage, either continued after the death of one of the spouses, or coming into existence then for the first time. Questions as to this community are to be determined by the law of the first matrimonial domicile (or by the national law of the spouses at the date of the marriage, as the case may be). Thus a judgment of the German Imp. Ct. (iii.), of 8th January 1886 (Bolze, Prac. ii. § 1184, p. 306), which is in my judgment sound, holds that the right of the surviving spouse, by the law of Lübeck, where the marriage has been enriched by succession, to remain in occupation of the estate, is merely a continuance of the right of property that is part of the married relation, and that the law of the last domicile of the deceased spouse, through whom the property came, does not regulate the matter. But a fiction of the death of any person (such as so-called civil death, often made part of a criminal sentence), which by the personal law of that person must have full operation, will have no effect in any other State, whose laws know nothing of such a fiction. No one can, in a foreign country, be put in possession of the property of a person who is actually still alive, by pleading any such personal law. If the person affected by the sentence is actually under the jurisdiction of the State which pronounced the sentence, it will be necessary to appoint a curator to him in the foreign country.³³

³² In Germany, of course, the ruling opinion is on this subject also in favour of the lex domicilii; but see supra, p. 203. See an interesting judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Celle, reported in v. Bülow and Hagemann, Prakt. Erörterungen, vi. p. 140, and judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Lübeck, on 21st March 1861 (Seuffert, xiv. § 107). The Imp. Ger. Ct. (i.), on 7th July 1883 (Dec. xiv. § 43, p. 183), has lately decided in this sense; so, too, the French Ct. of Cass. 7th November 1826 (Sirey, xxvi. i. p. 350), and the Saxon Code, § 17. In the same way, in England and the United States, domicile is still accepted, in so far as the moveable succession is concerned. In Austria the principle of nationality is recognised, but an exception is made in case the State, to which a foreigner who has died in Austria belongs, does not recognise the same rule (v. Püttlingen, § 83). The Italian Code, prelimin. art. 8, expressly declares that the law of nationality will rule in Italy. (See Fiore, § 394; Renault, J. ii. p. 329; Laurent, vi. § 128.) Treaty of the Spanish American States of 1878, §§ 20, 21. But subjects of these States have the same rights on the estate of a foreigner which happens to be in their country, as they would have if the deceased had himself been a subject. Asser-Rivier, §§ 62, 64; Durand, p. 387; Weiss, ut cit. French practice (see Ct. of Pau, 22nd June 1885, J. xiv. pp. 479, 485) as a rule puts the moveable property under the law of the domicile. French writers, however, seem nowadays to incline somewhat to the law of nationality. See indications of this given by Fiore, p. 619, and the Austro-French treaty of 1866, § 2 (J. ii. pp. 427, 428), in favour of a decision by the loi nationale.

The case is otherwise where the question is one as to a presumption of death, where the exact moment of death cannot be fixed; in such questions the law which rules the succession in other respects must prevail (see Brocher, i. p. 414; Weiss, p. 847). If, however, two persons perish together in consequence of the same event, and if in such a case the personal law of A presumes that B lived longer than A, and proceeds on the footing that B thus became A's heir, while B's personal law rejects this presumption, or perhaps sets up the contrary presumption, viz. that A was the survivor, then A's nearest of kin must be B's heirs, and B's nearest of kin must be A's heirs, the order of succession among the respective nearest of kin being, however, in the former case determined by the law which prevails in A's country, in the latter case by the law of B's country. Thus each law will have its effect within its own jurisdiction.³⁴

An exception is not unfrequently made, and Fiore (§ 396) makes it, from the consistent application of the national law of the deceased, in cases in which the public interest would be injured if it were applied, e.g. if the foreign law rests upon some privilege of rank, or upon the advantage of being the first-born, etc., while the native law entirely rejects such privileges. Such an exception is on the one side, in theory, unsound, and on the other, in practice, unnecessary. It is unsound in theory, because, as we have seen, all systems of succession are founded on some political or social consideration or another, or at least are supported by such considerations. Thus we should very soon reach the total exclusion of the national law of the deceased. Again, the exception is in practice unnecessary. For all the doctrines which we thus endeavour to exclude from our native soil, rest upon the principle of some kind of separate succession, and thus lead to the exclusive application of the lex rei sitæ. But it is impossible to put absolutely out of view such doctrines, confined to a foreign country, or to declare that they are entirely invalid. Are we to ask e.g. an Italian judge, if an Italian falls heir to an entailed estate in Germany [entails of this kind being forbidden by the law of Italy] to declare, either that the German entail is invalid, a declarator to which we could not expect the German courts to pay any attention, or that the Italian, in respect of preliminary article 8 of the Italian Code, should renounce the German entailed estate? If a law, which proceeds on the principle of an universal succession, prefers the first-born to the whole estate, what concern has Italy with the fate of an estate, with which up to that moment it had nothing to do, even if, in the case on hand, it is an Italian who takes benefit by the state of the foreign law?³⁵

³³ To the same effect Weiss, p. 847.

The question whether any particular thing is to be held moveable or immoveable (see supra, p. 505) is to be determined by the personal law, if that is the law that regulates the succession, but by the lex rei sitæ in the opposite case;³⁶ in the latter case, the question must be whether it is to be held to be a pertinent of some other thing, in which case of course the lex rei sitæ must be applicable.

CAPACITY TO TAKE. JURISTIC PERSONS IN PARTICULAR.

§ 366. The capacity of foreigners in matters of succession, both on its active and its passive side, is now more and more admitted in all civilised States. Some States no doubt only admit it on condition of reciprocal treatment which must be shown to exist. But still, limitations of legal capacity have survived longer than in other matters in the shape of a right of deduction (Jus detractus, Abschoss) where successions pass out of this country into the hands of foreigners, and in the shape of the jus albinagii (droit d'aubaine) where a foreigner has left an estate in this country. A long series of treaties between different States and territories abolished these dues and confiscations in their mutual dealings. Then, too, the late German Bund (art. 18 of the Bundes Acte and Resolution of the Bund of 23rd June 1817) entirely swept away all such dues in the States of the Bund, in so far as the subjects of the States belonging to it were concerned.³⁷ In France, the statute of 4th July 1819, "Sur l'abolition des droits d'aubaine et de détraction," gives foreigners full capacity of succession, making, no doubt, a certain limitation, with a view to obtaining

³⁶ Most authorities make the lex rei sitæ the general rule here (Story, § 447). This is not quite accurate; if, for instance, the succession is universal both by the law of the domicile and the lex rei sitæ, but the lex domicilii provides that the real estate must go to some privileged heir for a consideration, the lex domicilii must decide whether the heir may take any particular thing for this consideration.

³⁷ For the present day, see art. 3 of the Imperial Constitution, and Stobbe, §§ 42, 43.

reciprocity, which is obscurely expressed, and has accordingly given rise to a multitude of controversies.³⁸

It does not, however, as a matter of course, follow from the admission of the legal capacity of foreigners for succession that foreign juristic persons and corporations will have the same rights of succession as such persons and corporations belonging to this country have.³⁹

Although at any given moment the property of a foreign foundation, for instance, may really serve the same objects as some institution in this country which bears the same or a similar name, we have no guarantee that that will continue to be so in the future, and all foundations are obnoxious to serious invasions by public authority under certain circumstances. For instance, a State might allow ecclesiastical or charitable foundations to flourish luxuriantly, in order that it might from time to time confiscate them for its own behoof, or for behoof of its political communities. And if the law which governs the succession requires a sanction from the State before a succession or a legacy can be taken by a foundation or by any juridical person, we can at least never find an equivalent for this sanction in the sanction of the State in which that foundation or juridical person is situated.

§ 367. Capacity to take by succession is, as itself a part of the general doctrine of capacity to have legal rights, subject, according to the principles already expounded (p. 304), to the law which rules the succession for other purposes, i.e. to the lex rei sitæ or the personal law of the ³⁸ On the different theories, see Weiss, p. 404. The Code Civil (§§ 726 and 912, also 11) required, as a condition of the capacity of a foreigner to take by succession, that Frenchmen must have the same privilege in that foreigner's own country by virtue of a treaty. The statute of 1819, without paying any attention to the requirement of reciprocity, provided that, in case there were French co-heirs in existence, these "prélèveront sur les biens situés en France, une portion égale à la valeur des biens situés en pays étranger, dont ils seraient exclus à quelque titre que ce soit en vertu des lois et coutumes locales." The last words suggest the interpretation that the French co-heirs should levy their præcipuum upon French estate, even although it was not solely in their character as French subjects, i.e. foreigners, that they were excluded in the other country, but because of the order of succession there recognised. This would be nothing short of an invasion by the French law of the domain belonging to a foreign law. Accordingly Weiss, e.g. proposes to restrict the præcipuum of the French co-heirs to the case in which the succession is in itself subject to the law of France. This interpretation would seem, however, to be wrong, and to be rejected in practice. See e.g. Renault (J. iii. p. 15, and J. v. p. 611) on some further difficulties in the statute. See, also, criticism in Laurent, vi. § 164, although he says (§ 65) in his pompous way of this unfortunate statute, "La loi de 1819 . . . inaugure l'avènement du droit international privé." The Belgian statute of 27th April 1865 (Laurent, iii. §§ 370, 371) provides simply and soundly, "Les étrangers ont le droit de succéder, de disposer et de recevoir de la même manière que les Belges dans toute l'étendue du royaume." See the statute of the Netherlands, 17th April 1869. See Calvo on the French statute, ii. § 850.

deceased, as the case may be.⁴⁰ Many persons⁴¹ are deceived by the word "capacity" (fähigkeit), and are in favour accordingly of calling in the personal law of those who are to take. But the law, in declaring one to be "incapable" of taking by succession from another, simply means that this person shall not be the successor, although all other conditions necessary to his taking may be present: the law which decides all other questions connected with the succession, can never commit the decision of this point to any other law; this is only one special point in the general chapter of the succession. If the law of country A, for instance, declares that persons who are unconceived at the date of the predecessor's death, or children who are not viable, are incapable of taking by succession, the consequence of this rule is, under certain circumstances, to introduce an entirely different order of succession ab intestato or ex testamento from what would follow if there were a declaration to a contrary effect. We must, no doubt, keep in view that where the personal law of the successor would deprive him of the inheritance the moment he had taken it, it cannot reasonably be supposed that the law which would otherwise regulate the succession [i.e. the personal law of the predecessor, or, in exceptional cases, the lex rei sitæ] is to take no account at all of this. For in such a case the successor would in truth be a third person, e.g. the foreign State eager to confiscate the property, a monastery, or some other favoured institution. The State to which the predecessor belonged had no desire to give these bodies anything to the disadvantage of near relations of the deceased. It may then often happen that, in order to ensure that the law of succession shall be at once and completely worked out, capacity to take, both by the personal law of the successor and by that which in other respects regulates the inheritance, shall be required.⁴² The former, however, need not be regarded if the successor is in a position as a matter of fact to withdraw himself from the prejudicial operation of his personal law, which he has incurred in consequence e.g. of his residence in a foreign country. The impediment which exists in the personal law of the heir or legatee must be considered rather as a question of fact. We shall take it into account [and refuse to hand over the succession] if the refusal to take it into account would assist some institution with which our own law will have nothing to do, e.g. will further confiscation by a foreign fisk, or an annexation by the law of mortmain of monasteries, churches, etc.⁴³ (But in many cases, in particular in cases in which the incapacity to take is not rested, by the personal law of the person who is called to the succession, upon any exercise of his will, and so does not imply a renunciation of it by him, some assistance may be given by setting up a curatory.) The impediment, on the other hand, is not to be taken into account [and the succession is to be handed over] if the result of taking it into account would be the reverse, e.g. would involve the spoliation of persons who are persecuted on account of some political or religious profession.⁴⁴ Those, however, who commit the decision to the personal law of the successor, generally take the edge off the unpleasant consequences of their theory,⁴⁵ by having recourse to the coercitive character of this kind of law, to the plea of ordre public,⁴⁶ with which we are so familiar, and thus they refuse after all to give effect to such provisions, although they occur in the personal law of the successor.⁴⁷ Weiss, who (p. 847) treats the subject with a thoroughness which deserves recognition, has not made it absolutely clear what consequences must ensue if the successor is by his personal law excluded as unworthy or incapable, while he is recognised by the personal law of the predecessor. It is not possible without a complete contradiction to hold the principle of an universal succession, but still to say that a Frenchman, who would by his own law be indigne (see Code Civ. § 727), is e.g. in the very same succession to be successor to the estate which may be in Russia or Italy, while he cannot take what is in France. I am not aware what Weiss proposes to do in such a case about the discharge of debt. Even the public conscience will in the end fail to justify a legal contradiction.

⁴² In this matter I have altered the opinion I once held. Boullenois, i. p. 66, holds that the successor can only take, if he has capacity both by the law of his domicile and by the law which regulates the succession. See, too, Wharton, § 579.

We cannot allow ourselves, as Weiss allows himself (p. 849), to make too extended a use of the principle of ordre public. Where, for instance, the law of country A only allows illegitimate children, enfants naturels in the meaning of the French law, to take a limited part of their father's succession, that rests of course upon a consideration of morality: but such a consideration of morality is only applicable in the case of successions which are dependent on the law of that country, A. The enfants naturels are not treated as members of the family with the full rights of such members. But the law of that country, A, need have no concern about successions, which come

⁴⁵ So Savigny ut cit.; Fiore, § 397; Weiss, p. 848; see, on the other hand, for the correct view, Muheim, p. 253.

⁴⁶ Laws as to incapacity to succeed have the character of coercitive laws, if any laws in the region of private law have that character, and belong to ordre public. Accordingly Savigny holds that the lex fori should be applied in all such cases.

⁴⁷ There are other intermediate views. Walter, § 43, says: "By the law of his own country a monk cannot take by succession; this has no effect in the country where the institution of monasticism is positively rejected, but it has where it is known, although this incapacity may not be attached to it." Stobbe, § 33, notes 52, 53, proposes that in general the lex domicilii of the successor should decide. But if the question be whether a particular person is capable of succession as to a particular predecessor, then, according to Stobbe, the law of the predecessor shall decide as to his capacity to take, just as it will determine the order of succession. This latter proposition is in all cases sound, but as Muheim (p. 253) rightly remarks, must be regarded not as a rule of capacity, but as a rule of priority.

to the bastard from without. If the law of the predecessor allows him to a more complete extent the rank of a member of the family, the law of country A is not charged with the duty of attending to the predecessor's morals, or of protecting his family from an intruder, who will prejudice their rights.⁴⁸ The law of country A would have no object in interfering, unless it entertained the principle that no bastards should take by succession, or at least that they should not become rich people. This shows us the fallibility of the argument of ordre public, even although it is elevated to a higher rank, with the title of ordre public international.

The law which regulates the succession in general will determine also what is the degree of kinship to which the statutory order of succession will extend. This will be the personal law of the predecessor in all the countries which recognise the principle of an universal succession.⁴⁹

II. Mortis Causa DISPOSITIONS AND CONTRACTS AS TO SUCCESSION.

CAPACITY TO MAKE A TESTAMENT.

§ 368. Mortis causa deeds and contracts as to succession are in truth operations of the will of the testator upon the statutory order of succession, whether it be that the legal heirs are thereby entirely excluded, and an arbitrary series of heirs instituted, or that subordinate provisions modify in isolated points the statutory order of succession, which would but for them take effect. The result of that is, that testate succession is admissible when the law which regulates the succession ab intestato permits this operation to take effect, and so mortis causa deeds will depend upon the personal law of the testator or the lex rei sitæ, according as the law which would regulate intestacy speaks of an universal or a particular succession.

The question of capacity to make such a deed—i.e. the recognition by law of a deliberate settlement of succession, expressed in some particular form—has been left to the determination of the law which in other respects regulates the succession,¹ i.e. to the lex rei sitæ or the lex domicilii, according as the author dealing with the subject holds that intestate succession is determined by the one or by the other.²

Some authors, however, moved by the expression “capacity” (habilitas, capacitas, capacité), have been led illogically to apply the lex domicilii in all

² The following support the lex rei sitæ: Bartolus, Nos. 38-41; Burgundus, i. 45; P. Voet, de Stat. iv. c. 3, § 12; Huber, § 15; Hert, iv. 22; Gaill, Observ. ii. observ. 125, No. 12; Stockmans, Decis. Brabant. decis. 125, No. 10; Rodenburg, ii. 5, § 7; Vinnius, *Select Juris. questions of this class,³ although in other respects they are in favour of the lex rei sitæ. Some assistance has no doubt been given to this tendency by the fact⁴ that, on the one hand, if the territorial system which regulates the succession makes the capacity to execute a will dependent upon freedom from paternal control, the lex domicilii must, of course, determine whether such control exists or not; while, on the other hand, many authors go so far as to apply the lex rei sitæ to the conflict of systems of law, both of which treat succession purely as an universal succession; the testament, which in its nature is intended to dispose of the whole estate left by the testator, can only be upheld so as to have that comprehensive operation, if the lex domicilii is taken as the determinant of the capacity to test.

Legal capacity to act in a general sense is not to be confounded with the capacity of making a testament.⁵ The laws which set limits upon the former exist solely for the advantage of the incapax, but laws as to testamentary incapacity have in view the security and the advantage of the heirs ab intestato.⁶

That this view is false is, lastly, demonstrated by the fact that, if one law is to regulate testamentary capacity and another intestate succession, then we may have testacy and intestacy co-existent in the same instance; for if intestacy and its rule of succession are not excluded, they must receive effect, and nothing can exclude them except the law which is to regulate their operation.

When German systems come into conflict with the Code Civil, or when one of these systems is in conflict with another,⁷ our theory will make the stranger of immoveable property are to be determined by the law of Austria, and that as much in questions of capacity as in reference to their substantive provisions." See v. Püttlingen, p. 278.

The following the lex domicilii: Hofæker, De eff. § 24; Molinæus, in L. 1, C. de S. Trin.; Bouhier, chap. 24, No. 91; Alder, Mascardus, Concl. 6, No. 42; Holzschuher, i. p. 80; Wächter, ii. p. 365; Thöl, Einl. § 79; Savigny, § 377; Guthrie, p. 282. It is indisputable that the capacity of testing on moveables must be determined by the lex domicilii. See Burge, iv. p. 580; Seuffert, Comm. i. p. 259.

Those who take nationality as the determinant make it the rule, of course, in these matters also. See Laurent, vi. § 184; he thinks capacity to test is a statut personnel.

³ For instance, Bald Ubald, in L. 1, C. de S. Trin. No. 79; D'Aguesseau, Œuvres, iv. p. 539; Fœlix, i. § 88, pp. 198, 199 (Demangeat on this passage, and i. pp. 64-65); Schäffner, p. 180; Hugo Grotius (Epistolæ, Amstelod. 1687, No. 464); Boullenois, i. pp. 486, 488, 714. Some of these authors with this further absurdity, that if a person is incapacitated by the lex domicilii, he must be held to be so everywhere; but if, on the contrary, the lex domicilii give him capacity, while the lex rei sitæ denies it, the testament is of no effect as to the real estate in question ("the capacité de tester is personnelle réelle.") Schmid, p. 98, and Asser-Rivier, § 64, are the modern representatives of this class.

⁴ Cf. Merlin, Rep. Testament, sect. 1, § 5, art. 1, iii.

⁵ See e.g. judgment of the French Ct. 30th Aug. 1820 (Sirey, xx. i. p. 447).

⁷ There are, for instance, differences between the Prussian A.L.R., which gives the prodigal a limited capacity of testing—viz. over one half of his estate—(i. 1, 13, i. 12, § 37), and the common law of Rome, which declares him quite incapable; in the same way, between the Prussian A.L.R. ii. 2, § 201, i. 12, § 16, and the law of Hamburg (Baumeister, ii. p. 51) on the personal law provide the general rule; while, if one of these systems comes into conflict with the common law of England, the lex rei sitæ must determine questions as to the succession to real property.

§ 369. If a change of domicile or of nationality, as the case may be, has taken place, the last personal law is that which rules, in so far as it is that personal law which supplies the rule;⁸ but a testament which is bad from the beginning cannot be made good merely by a subsequent change of domicile. The capacity to test must therefore be present according to the personal law at the date of death, and also according to the law which was the testator's personal law at the date when he made his testament.⁹

That is the result of the following reasoning. If any one is incapable of executing a testament, he cannot test in any form;¹⁰ the testament which he executes is just as invalid as if it were null from some defect in form. In the latter case, no one would hesitate to say that it continued to be invalid. But we may reach the same result by another chain of reasoning. If the testament is null by the personal law which the testator enjoyed at the time he made it, it is certainly not made good by a simple change in the personal law of that testator. If, conversely, it is null by the last personal law he enjoyed, i.e. at the date of his death, to uphold it would result in an insoluble conflict with the rights of the heirs ab intestato, who would say with good reason that their rights must be determined by the last personal law of the testator and by no other law. This view¹¹ is supported by analogous provisions of the Roman law which treat of the change of the legal relations of a person under the dominion of the same system of law.¹²

If the testator has full capacity by the law of his last domicile and of that which he had at the time he executed the deed, but is incapax by the one side, which give children in familia the right of testing, and the common law of Rome on the other side, which denies it to them. Further, the English Wills Act of 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, see Lehr, Droit civil anglais, § 919) makes persons under 21 years of age incapable of testing. By the common law of Rome, on the other hand, puberes can test, and so by the law of France can persons over 16 years of age, but not to the same extent as persons of full age. [By the law of Scotland a minor pubes can test on moveables, but not on heritage.]

⁸ If incapacity to execute a testament were a special kind of incapacity to act, the law of the domicile which the testator had when he made it could alone be applied.

(iv.) to a different effect on 10th Nov. 1887 (Dec xviii. No. 59, p. 315) is founded on the peculiar provision of § 13, Pt. i. tit. 12, of the Preuss. Allgem. Landrecht., which regulated the validity of the testament in question, because the testator had his last domicile within its territory.

¹¹ Cf. L. 19, D. 28, 1, § 4 J, quibus modis test. infirm. 2, 17.

law of some domicile which he has in the interval acquired and lost, his deed must be sustained.¹³

NOTE II ON §§ 368, 369. CAPACITY TO TEST.

[In Scotland, capacity to dispose of moveables by testament is regulated by the law of the domicile. By the third section of Lord Kingsdown's Act (24 and 25 Vict. c. 114) it is provided that no will "shall be held to be revoked or to have become invalid . . . by reason of any subsequent change of domicile of the person making the same." This would seem to have the effect of making the question of personal capacity dependent on the law of the domicile at the date of the execution of the deed. Such a result seems to be in accordance with good sense, and is laid down by Wharton as the true result (§ 570), although Westlake (§ 86) makes the question of capacity dependent on the law of the last domicile exclusively. Whatever the law may be, it is the same in England, Scotland, and the United States (see Jarman on Wills, pp. 2 and 4).

As regards real estate, again, in these three countries an incapacity existing by the lex rei sitæ must receive effect. There seems to be some doubt as to whether an incapacity existing by the law of the domicile should receive effect, as well as any that exists by the law of the situs. Lord McLaren thinks it should (Wills and Succession, i. § 44), but Wharton, §§ 570 and 572, and Westlake, § 165, confine themselves to a consideration of the rule of the lex situs, the former approving the doctrine of the text.]

FORM OF mortis causa DEEDS.

§ 370. The form of the testament must be determined on the same principles. All those systems of law, however, which look upon succession as an universal succession have, by force of custom, incorporated the rule "locus regit actum," both in moveable and in real succession, without drawing any distinction in this respect between judicial and extra-judicial forms.¹⁴

All systems of law, whether the succession be universal or not, have done so as regards moveable succession.¹⁵ The result is that it is sufficient to observe either the lex loci actus or the lex domicilii, provided that there is no doubt that the testator intended to make a will.

It is quite in keeping with the permissive character of this rule,¹⁶ that the law of England and that of the United States should hold the form of the testament, in so far as succession in moveables is concerned, as governed by the law of the domicile, primarily, and that in earlier times it should have done so exclusively.^{17 18} We can also understand how it comes to pass, since the principle of universal succession has not, as yet, fully made its way into these systems, that, in countries in which English common law prevails, real estate is held to be solely governed by the lex rei sitæ. For, as we have seen, the rule "locus regit actum" does not apply to the acquisition of real rights over particular things.¹⁹

The Hanoverian order of 29th Oct. 1822 gives validity to the testamentary dispositions of Hanoverian subjects executed abroad before a foreign court, and in a foreign form. It cannot be inferred from this that the rule "locus regit actum" would be excluded, if a legal transaction, which in Hanover must be entered upon in court, did not need that formality abroad. Fiore, § 494; Laurent, vii. § 411, but see below; Brocher, ii. p. 39; Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 278; v. ¹⁵ Thöl, § 83, note 4, seems desirous of confining the rule to public testaments. That is undoubtedly counter to the communis opinio. See Felix, i. § 69.

¹⁸ A person who has lost British nationality cannot make a valid testament in English form abroad (J. xii. p. 120). [Bloxam v. Favre, 1884, L. R. 9, P. D. 130. See also Re von Buseck, 1881, 9 P. D. 130.]

The personal law of the testator may exclude the application of the rule "locus regit actum" either altogether, in which case subjects of one country living in another would often be prevented from executing any settlements, or to a certain extent.²⁰ (E.g. it may do so in some such fashion as by refusing to recognise private settlements even although they are made abroad.) The code of the Netherlands, for example, has excluded the rule partially in its 962nd article, and by a decision of the Russian Senate in 1875,²¹ purely verbal testaments made in a foreign country by a Russian are not recognised. Accordingly, if we go strictly to work, we must, if a question is raised about the settlement of a foreigner made in the form of the lex loci actus, first ascertain that his personal law does not contain any such prohibition.

Since the personal law which rules matters of succession is the personal law which regulated the personal interests of the testator at the moment of his death, the testament, if it is to be maintained by reference to the personal law, and is not to be supported by the rule "locus regit actum," must, as regards its form, comply²² with the personal law which the testator had at his death. If the rule "locus regit actum" is applied, then, of course, a testament which has once been validly executed in conformity with the lex loci actus will not be invalidated by any change of domicile,²³ although one which is not in conformity with the forms required by the law of the place where it was executed, but is according to the forms of the domicile of the testator at that time, will be invalidated if the law of ²⁰ Thus Asser-Rivier, p. 138, note 2. On the other hand, the Sup. Ct. of Spain, in an interesting judgment of 6th June 1873, declared the validity of a holograph testament made by a Frenchman, even with reference to real estate situated in Spain, recognising the personal law as regulative. See Torres-Campos, p. 292. All the treaties as to jurisdiction reported by Krug contain this rule: All legal transactions inter vivos and mortis causa, must, in so far as their validity in form is concerned, be ruled by the law of the place of execution." But to this provision we always have this addition, "so far as the act is not executed there in order to escape the prohibitive law of another State," or this, "if the validity of any act is, by the conception of the legislation of either of the States concerned, made dependent upon its being executed before some particular official body, this direction must be observed." Now such additions go to show that the rule "locus regit actum" merely confers a power, for if it were founded upon purely legal deduction, and if, therefore, the form of any instrument were necessarily regulated by the law of the place where it was executed, then it would be quite out of place to speak of an exception, in cases, that is, where the law of any State expressly desired to exclude the rule.

²¹ Serebrianny, J. xi. p. 363.

²² See Picard (J. viii. p. 487): "La volonté du testateur n'ayant son expression définitive que par la mort."

²³ Fœlix, i. p. 263; Schäffner, pp. 195, 196; Supreme Court of Berlin, 3rd April 1857 (Striethorst, 23, p. 353). "The formal validity of a holograph will made under the rule of French law is not lost if the testator shifts his abode into the territory of Prussian law, taking the will with him, and dies there; but in order to revoke the deed, those forms and acts required by the law of the new domicile must be observed."

his latest domicile requires some different form.²⁴ This logical deduction is broken through by Lord Kingsdown's Act of 6th August 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 114), applicable in England and Scotland. By it the testaments of British subjects are held to be well executed, if they are in conformity either with the law of the testator's domicile at the date of execution, or with the law of the domicile of origin, or with the lex loci actus. It is expressly provided at the same time that a change of domicile shall never invalidate a testament which has once been validly made. These provisions²⁵ are very useful in practice for a country, the subjects of which travel so much, but they are by no means obviously correct.

NOTE KK ON § 370. FORM OF MORTIS CAUSA DEEDS.

[The law of England and Scotland is settled as regards moveable estate, for persons dying after 6th August 1861, if they are British subjects, by Lord Kingsdown's Act (24 and 25 Vict. c. 114): that statute provides, by § 1, that any will or testamentary instrument made out of the United Kingdom shall be held to be well executed by English, Scottish, or Irish courts, whatever the domicile of the person making it at the time of death may be, if it is executed according to (1) the lex loci actus, (2) the lex domicilii, or (3) the law of the domicile of origin: the common law of England held before the passing of this Act that the character and validity of any document propounded must be tried by the law of the last domicile of the testator; in Scotland, on the other hand, the lex loci actus had always been sufficient to render a will dealing with moveables effectual (Purvis' Trustees v. Purvis' Executors, 1861, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiii. 812), the law of the testator's last domicile being also admitted as regulative of his testamentary dispositions of moveables. The second section of Lord Kingsdown's Act extends this principle to the three parts of the United Kingdom; the third section provides that no change of domicile shall render a testamentary deed once regularly executed invalid, nor alter its construction. As regards wills executed by persons who are not British subjects, the law of England will continue to require observance of the law of the last domicile (Bloxam v. Favre, 12th February 1884, L. R. 9, P. D. 130), even although they may have been so at one time and have lost their nationality, e.g. by marriage: the law of Scotland will recognise the lex loci actus as well as that of the domicile.

With regard to real estate, the rule in England and Scotland formerly was that the form of testamentary deeds was regulated by the lex rei sita

²⁵ See on this Act Westlake-Holtzendorff, §§ 81 et seq.; Lehr, Dr. Civ. Aug. § 927; Wharton, § 586.

solely, and in England this is still law. In Scotland, by the terms of 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, § 20, the law applicable to deeds of a testamentary character conveying heritage has been assimilated, in so far as regards the formal requisites of such deeds, to that applicable to deeds dealing with moveables, and hence the provisions of the lex loci actus, if observed, will sufficiently establish the validity of such a deed. In Connel's Trustees v. Connel (1872, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. x. 627) it was held that under the terms of this Act an English will containing a conveyance of Scots heritage, which would not have been received in Scotland prior to the Act as a probative deed, was sufficient to convey that heritage as having been validly executed as a testamentary deed in England. American law is the same as the common law of England.]

EXECUTION OF A HOLOGRAPH TESTAMENT.

§ 371. It is doubtful, and has been made matter of debate, whether the 999th article of the French Code declares merely that the rule "locus regit actum" is a rule that may be used by any one who pleases, and thus simply applies that rule as a permissive rule of law, or whether it ties up a Frenchman, who wishes to test in a foreign country, to a choice between the holograph testament of French law and the authentique or public or official testament of the country in which he happens to be, so that testaments which are not executed by public officers or notaries, and are not holograph, must be declared invalid, e.g. testaments made before seven witnesses in a country where the common law of Rome prevails. The article of the code in question provides: "Un Français qui se trouvera en pays étranger pourra faire ses dispositions testamentaires, par acte sous signature privée, ainsi qu'il est prescrit en l'article 970, ou par acte authentique avec les formes usitées dans le lieu où cet acte sera passé."²⁶ The literal sense of ²⁶ Cf. judgment of the Cour de Paris, 30th November 1831 (Sirey, 32, i. pp. 51-58). See provisions of a similar kind in articles 992, 982, of the Code of the Netherlands, and in a Grecian statute of 1830 (Schäffner, p. 194). It is only an apparent exception to the rule "locus regit actum," if by the law of any place in particular, testamentary forms are confined to the subjects of a country or the citizens of a town, a case that seldom occurs nowadays. Cf. Schäffner, p. 190. The older French law (see Bouhier, cap. 28, No. 20; Boullenois, ii. pp. 75 and 97; Merlin, Rép. Testament, § 2, 4, art. 1) gave the inhabitants of these provinces in which holograph testaments were known before the days of the Code Civil, the right of testing in this form in a foreign country, although on the erroneous ground that the question here was one as to a personal capacity which accompanied the individual abroad. Against this see the text, supra, pp. 295, 302. It cannot be said to be by any special kind of legal capacity that the inhabitants of one country have the power of expressing their testamentary wishes in this or in that form. Thus, for instance, the special provisions enacted by the Prussian A. L. R. for the execution of testamentary instruments by minors under eighteen years of age (A. L. R. x. 12, § 17), will not apply to testaments executed by Prussian minors in a foreign country. The disposing will of the minors is recognised. This is sufficient to exclude any question of personal incapacity which would have to be recognised abroad. The position is just the same as if the special provisions which at present apply solely to minors were extended to all the natives of the country. Brocher (ii. p. 39) takes a sound view. If, the article seems to be that the Frenchman's choice is restricted as we have stated.²⁷ But it looks as if the authors of the Code Civil had thought of the holograph testament of French law as something which is in contrast with the testament public—a variety of which is the testament mystique, mentioned in the 967th article—and then as in contrast with the testament authentique (arts. 968 and 999). Then we should understand as included in the term authentique every testament executed in a form which any foreign country might have prescribed for the protection of all concerned, such, e.g. as a testament made before witnesses; ²⁸ and in truth a holograph testament, which, so far as form goes, is very simple, may be described, in contrast with testaments hedged with such formalities, as non authentique. Again, it is very difficult to draw the line between forms which constitute a testament authentique, and those which do not, and thus we are landed in doubts and difficulties, which are all excluded, if we look upon the 999th article as simply being an application of the rule "locus regit actum."

LIMITATIONS ON THE RULE "locus regit actum."

§ 372. Further, we cannot approve of the view which a few authors adopt that a testament made abroad, in accordance with the forms there recognised, by a subject of this country, will only be held valid if the testator has not found opportunity subsequently in his own country to use the forms prescribed by its law.²⁹ We can conceive such a provision existing, and indeed in one old system of law³⁰ we know that it actually did exist. But the universal law of custom, which lies at the root of the maxim "locus regit actum," decidedly rejects such a limitation, and it is all the more impracticable as, in each particular case, the fact as to whether there was or was not opportunity will be very difficult to ascertain, while, according as individual opinions on this question of fact may vary, the legal interests involved are exposed to the greatest uncertainty.³¹ This besides, we regard the law of the nationality as the law which must in principle regulate questions of succession law, then it, and not the law of the domicile, must decide whether one can validly test in holograph form abroad. Judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Madrid, 6th June 1873 (J. i. p. 39).

²⁷ Laurent, vi. § 411, and the author of the discussion in J. vii. p. 381, especially p. 387. The practice seems doubtful. See Despagnet, § 516.

²⁸ The paper cited in the last note reaches the conclusion that a testament subscribed by the testator and two witnesses in the English form should be held to be a testament in forme authentique. The preliminary article 8 of the Italian Code simply recognises the rule "locus regit actum" in its facultative sense as applicable to all deeds "di ultima volontà."

²⁹ Alderflycht, Privatr. der Stadt Frankfurt, i. 511.

³⁰ Lübisches Stadtr. ii. tit. 1, art. 16: "If one of our citizens die abroad, having made a testament according to foreign law, that testament will be recognised by our law. But such a testament must be executed under the presence of approaching death, and not fraudulently and of set purpose to defraud heirs."

theory rests undoubtedly on the proposition, which we have already refuted, that no legal transaction can be entered into in a foreign country, even though it be in conformity with the forms recognised there, if it is in fraudem legis domesticæ.³²

There is, lastly, just as great error in the theory,³³ that, if the legislature, by appointing some particular form for testaments, has endeavoured to defeat forgery and falsification, this form must be observed even in a foreign country, and the rule "locus regit actum" can have no application. But almost every form which is appointed by any legislature for the execution of testaments has this object in view; the necessary result of this theory, therefore, is to deny all force to the rule "locus regit actum" in so far as testaments are concerned, and indeed, since we may well suppose that the forms required in all other legal transactions have a similar object, the result would be that this rule, so useful to commerce and in many ways quite indispensable,³⁴ would be swept away. That is certainly not the theory of the Prussian Legislature, as the treaties concluded by Prussia with other States show.³⁵

DISTINCTION BETWEEN FORM AND SUBSTANCE OF A TESTAMENT.

§ 373. It may at times be doubtful whether a provision of the law has to do with the form of a testament, in which case the rule "locus regit actum" is applicable, or whether it is a proposition of substantive law, e.g. affects the capacity of the testator, in which case his personal law, or in other cases the lex rei sitæ, would be the only rule for guidance. The tests for distinguishing one class from the other, in their true legal sense, which we worked out in § 121, may guide our judgment on this matter.³⁶

We cannot regard a provision that a testament, in order to be effectual, must be executed a certain time before the death of the testator, as a formal provision. A provision of that kind means to enact that, if a testator does not survive the execution of his testament some definite period,

³³ Koch on § 23 of the Introduction to the Prussian All. Landrecht. (See, on the other hand, Förster-Eccius, § 11, No. 7 ad fin. i. 12, § 17, § 66, § 139. In § 17 it is provided: "Persons who have not yet passed their eighteenth year cannot execute testamentary deeds except as under guardianship in judicial form." By § 66: "Every testament or codicil must as a rule be laid before the court by the testator himself, or published in judicial form.") the deed, however executed, shall not be recognised as a declaration of his will. This purpose is not consistent with the notion of a mere formal provision.³⁷ And accordingly, so early as 1734, a French ordinance (arts. 74, 75) declared that the trois mois de survie of the testator, which were required by some provincial laws, constituted a statut réel to which the rule "locus regit actum" could not be applied.

³⁴ For instance, by the Prussian A. L. R. a testament cannot be made without the co-operation of the court. In France no court is competent to undertake such a proceeding. Quid juris, if a native of Berlin falls sick in France, and must make his testament there? See Demangeat on Félix, i. p. 168; Savigny, § 382; Guthrie, p. 328.

³⁵ Savigny as cited.

In the same way we do not count it a mere formal provision that the heir-at-law must, as modern Roman law requires (Nov. 115), be expressly instituted or disinherited. These provisions give the heir-at-law material rights, and it may be possible to discover in them a coercitive provision to regulate the interpretation of testaments, a matter which must, in its turn, be dependent on the personal law. On the other hand, it is much debated, whether the provision of the 968th article of the French Code, which declares testaments made in common to be null, is to be regarded as a provision on a matter of form, which in view of the rule "locus regit actum" may be left out of account, when a testament is executed in another country.³⁸ I should be inclined, in agreement with the preponderance of practice,³⁹ to hold it to be a merely formal provision in the true sense of the word, since nothing prevents the testator from making the operation of his own testament dependent on that of another person, if he does so expressly and in a separate testament of his own.⁴⁰

EFFECT TO BE GIVEN TO THE CONTENTS OF mortis causa SETTLEMENTS.
LIMITATIONS PUT UPON THE TESTATOR'S INTENTIONS. PROHIBITION OF BENEFITS TO PARTICULAR PERSONS.

§ 374. The law which rules the succession generally will on the contrary, of course, be the primary rule for determining the effect to be given to the contents of mortis causa settlements: that law, apart from cases in which the lex rei sitæ affects the matter, is the personal law of the testator. Benefits given by such deeds, the institution of an heir and the gift of legacies, are valid only in so far as the testator was at liberty to leave something to the person whom he mentions. Thus a legacy by a Frenchman would be invalid, left by him, contrary to art. 909 of the Code Civil, to the doctor who attended him in his last illness, or to the clergyman who ministered to him, although neither of these persons was French. We give no general solution of the question which arises in the converse case, whether a doctor or a clergyman of French nationality would be barred from taking anything, where the benefit was given to them by a foreign testator, whose personal law says nothing to the contrary. Weiss thinks ³⁸ On this controversy see Laurent, vi. §§ 314-319.

⁴⁰ To this effect Aubry et Rau, v. p. 598, and Brocher, ii. § 144. Laurent takes a different view. He thinks the personal law of the testator should decide.

(p. 860) that they would take nothing. The question, however, turns on the consideration whether we are to find in the prohibition a mere protective measure in the interest of the heirs-at-law, and of course in the interest of the testator himself, to protect him from importunity; or whether it is to be held absolutely incompetent that any clergyman or doctor should on such a title, we do not merely say receive anything, but, if he has received anything, should keep it. The 909th article of the Code Civil cannot be said to go so far as that against the doctor or the clergyman. If the heirs-at-law have voluntarily made over the legacy, they will not be entitled to demand repayment. The most that can be said, then, is that on a literal reading of the 909th article⁴¹ the law of France declares that no such legacy can be claimed, that the doctor or clergyman cannot demand the legacy in a French court. Thus the legacy is not absolutely invalid: the persons favoured may sue for it, e.g. in the courts of the testator's own country, if his personal law contains nothing to the contrary. A provision such as we find in art. 907 of the Code Civil, which withdraws from minors the power of making mortis causa dispositions in favour of their guardians, will, on the other hand, only be capable of being enforced, if it is contained in the personal law of the minor whose succession is in question. The question here is a question simply as to a rule for the protection of the heirs-at-law or of the persons who would otherwise have been favoured by the minor; a rule of that kind may be left to the testator's personal law.⁴² Nor can it be said that the guardian by demanding the legacy or claiming as heres institutus, commits any offence against morality or decency, even if his own law should say that he does. His administration has been under the personal law of the ward, and this may very well take the view that, through some other enactments of its own, e.g. the oversight of officials charged with the superintendence of curatories, or the necessity of minors being somewhat more advanced in life [proximi majorennitatis] before they can make valid testaments, or the imposition of special forms in the case of minors, any improper actings by the guardian are rendered impossible.

The case stands otherwise if the law forbids bequests to particular classes of juristic persons, e.g. churches, etc., or will only allow them to receive effect on special license being given by the sovereign authority (see Code Civil, for instance, § 910). In such cases, the object aimed at is a double one: an estate shall not be withdrawn from the next-of-kin, or shall not be withdrawn from them for inadequate causes; and, on the other hand, the property of the "dead hand," as it is called, shall not be augmented at pleasure. A juristic person, therefore, takes only if it has capacity to do so both by the law of the testator and by its own law.⁴³ If the one law, like the other, makes the acquisition of the property dependent on special authorisation by the State, then this double authorisation must be procured.⁴⁴ If real estate is the subject of a bequest, and that real estate lies in a third country whose law again makes a special authority necessary to legalise the acquisition of real estate by any juristic person, or by the kind of juristic person in question, then, if the favoured foundation desires to possess these estates in natura, a triple authority must be obtained.

NOTE LL ON § 374. LIMITATIONS ON THE TESTATOR'S POWERS.

[The English law of mortmain, whereby real estate may not be devised by will to charitable institutions, depends on the statutes 9 Geo. II. c. 36, re-enacted by 51 and 52 Vict. c. 42, which are confined in their operation to England. These statutes have been interpreted to the effect that their provisions have no application in a case in which a charitable bequest payable to an English charity is to be satisfied out of real estate, which does not lie in England (Beaumont v. Oliveira, 1868, L. R. 6, Eq. 534). But, on the other hand, English land will not be allowed to be taken by a foreign charity (Curtis v. Hutton, 1806, 14 Ves. 537). As stated by Westlake (§ 165, p. 191), "all questions concerning a restraint on the alienation or disposition of immoveables are to be decided by the lex situs." The Mortmain Acts go further than a mere prohibition against charities taking the testator's lands in specie. It is equally impossible under their provisions, e.g., for Scots trustees to realise the truster's estate in England and hand the proceeds in cash to Scots charities (see opinion of Mr Justice Kay furnished to the Court of Session in the case of Hewitt's Trustees v. Lawson, 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 793).]

The Scots court, in the case of Boe v. Anderson, 1862 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiv. p. 732), held that the validity of a bequest for charitable purposes must be determined by the law of the testator's domicile. If invalid by that law, it could not receive effect in a foreign country. The ground of the decision is that, as the legatees take their interest, if any, under the law of the testator's domicile, that law must be examined to see if their title to claim their legacy is good. If that law gives legatees of their character no title, then their claim must be rejected.

Again, the case may well occur that a person makes an universal settlement, disposing of both moveables and heritage situated in different countries. He gives by this settlement certain benefits out of the moveable estate to the person who would, failing a settlement, take his foreign heritage by the law of the country where it lies, but disposes of that heritage to some other beneficiary. His settlement is found according to the lex situs to be inoperative as regards the foreign heritage. Is the heir in that heritage entitled to take the benefits given to him by the settlement, and also urge his right to take the foreign heritage ab intestato? Or is he compelled, if he shall approbate the settlement by taking under it, to forego his right to the foreign heritage?

The principle adopted both by the law of Scotland and England is that the law of the domicile of the testator shall give the rule, that the settlement, executed in accordance with its provisions, shall receive full effect, and that the heir shall be called on to make his election. Thus the foreign real estate, if the heir gives it up, will go to the beneficiary favoured by the deed which was inoperative, although, no doubt, it disclosed, plainly enough, an intention on the part of the testator. In this way the law of the domicile may be said to affect indirectly real estate situated in another country (Dundas, 1830, H. of L., 4, W. and S. 460; Ker v. Wauchope, 1819, H. of L., 1 Bligh, 1; Trotter, 1829, H. of L. 3, W. and S. 427, Westlake, § 125).

But if the person who takes the double benefit under the will shall not, by his renunciation of his right to the foreign heritage, give it up to the uses of the will; if the foreign law, e.g. by the Mortmain Acts, withdraws the heritage, on the renunciation of the heir, from the operation of the will altogether, then the heir will not be called on to elect: he will be allowed to take both his provision under the deed, and the heritage ab intestato (Hewitt's Trustees v. Lawson, 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 793).

LIMITATIONS ON THE POWERS OF THE TESTATOR. PROHIBITION OF SUBSTITUTIONS AND OF ENTAILS.

§ 375. Limitations on the power of the testator freely to give effect to his wishes as regards mortis causa dispositions are of course effectual for international purposes if they are recognised by the law which regulates the succession generally. Thus, in so far as the principle of an universal succession is recognised, such limitations, if in accordance with the personal law of the testator, will be effectual even as regards estates situated in another country.⁴⁵ It will, therefore, be out of the question to apply the rule "locus regit actum."⁴⁶

⁴⁶ Rodenburg, ii. c. 5, § 8; Hartogh, pp. 134, 135; cf. judgment of the Supreme Court of

This rule is applicable to the question of the competency or incompetency of conditions, substitutions, and entails. Accordingly, a French testator—in so far as the lex rei sitæ does not recognise succession as a singular succession⁴⁷—is bound by the provisions of articles 896-899 of the Code Civil, which forbid entails or substitutions, as the French law calls them, even as regards real estate situated abroad.⁴⁸ Such a prohibition has, however, at the same time, an immediate real effect: the law will not allow any such limitation on the right of property. Accordingly, even a foreign testator cannot leave his real estate in France to any one under the restrictions of an entail. An entail will thus be prevented, whether it be incompetent by the personal law of the testator or by the lex rei sitæ.⁴⁹ The same rule holds if by the lex rei sitæ a liferent cannot Appeal at Wiesbaden, 16th October 1822 (v. d. Nahmer, ii. p. 155), and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Cassel cited in the previous note (Strippelmann, ii. p. 109); Schäffner, p. 198. In the case suggested by several writers (e.g. Wächter, ii. pp. 366, 367) that the law of the place where a landed estate lies enacts that such estates shall not be capable of transmission mortis causa, as a rule, and in accordance with our own view, the lex rei sitæ must be applied. Such provisions do not as a rule exist unless there is in that country in reference to such property a modified form of particular succession in use, Rodenburg, ii. c. 5, §§ 3, 4; Hert, iv. 23; D'Aguesseau, Œuvres, iv. p. 637; Wächter, ii. p. 386; Judgment of the Court of Cassation at Paris, 3rd May 1815 (Sirey, 15, pp. 1, 532). The rule "locus regit actum" is rejected in this case. There may, however, be figured cases in which, according to an established system of universal succession, property acquired by inheritance cannot be diverted from the heirs-at-law; in such a case the lex domicilii decides. These cases, although historically a remnant of Germanic theories of law, constitute nowadays an enlarged right in the heredes legitimi, who, in the division of the succession, are secured not merely in the value of the property which they take as heirs, but must get the particular items of which it consists.

⁴⁷ Very often this exception is disregarded.

⁴⁹ Aubry et Rau, i. p. 84; Savigny, ut cit.; Schmid; Bouhier, cap. 27, §§ 91-93; Weiss, p. 865, note 2; Wharton, § 598; judgment of the Rhenish Ct. of Cass. at Berlin, 9th July 1823 (Volkmar, p. 235). [Freke v. Carbery, 1873, L. R. 16, Eq. 461.] (reported by Westlake, Rev. vi. p. 390). The rule of English law, by which the testator can direct the accumulation of the rents of his property for a limited time only, is applicable to the landed estate of a foreign testator situated in England. See v. Martens, § 76, p. 323; Laurent, vi. § 328 ad fin. is indistinct. If the entail is lawful, but only with the license of the Government, then in certain circumstances a license from the Government of the testator's country may be required, in addition to one from that of the lex rei sitæ. In doubt, the latter only is required, except in so far as the rights of persons entitled by law to a share in the estate are concerned. The law of the place where the estate lies, however, will always and exclusively regulate the competency of executing a family deed of entail which is not testamentary—i.e. which cannot be recalled by the voice of the maker himself—and if it is necessary, besides, to obtain the approval of Government, the Government in question will not be that of the entailor's domicile, but that of the country where the estate lies. For the execution of a deed of entail in such a case divides the estate so entailed from the rest of the property before death, while in the former case—i.e. of a deed mortis causa—the trust for entail, like any other bequest, depends upon the same destiny as regulates the whole inheritance. Stobbe, § 34 ad fin. gives the same result for the case of an entail by mortis causa deed, except that of course he insists upon the rights of heredes legitimi, and those who are by law entitled to claim a share of the succession being recognised. But a prohibition of

be constituted in favour of several persons in succession one to the other. If, by the personal law of the testator, moveables can be made the subject of an entail, it matters not that such an entail is, by the law of the place where this or that particular thing at the moment happens to be, illegal. The validity of the settlement is not affected. An article is incapable of alienation only if the law of the place where the thing is recognises that it is so, and a change of situation will remove this peculiarity.^{50 51}

If the legatee cannot take some specific thing that has been bequeathed to him in consequence of a provision of the law of the place where the thing is—a case which will occur but very rarely in these days when the principle of the equality of foreigners and natives in the eye of the law is almost universally recognised, and when the adherents of different religious professions are all treated alike—the question whether the legatee is entitled to the value of the thing must be decided by the intention of the testator, i.e. as a rule by his personal law.⁵²

An obligatory duty laid upon any person by a testament is invalid if the law of the place where the duty is to be discharged forbids it.⁵³

NOTE MM ON § 375. VALIDITY OF TESTAMENTARY PROVISIONS.

[The validity of a condition in restraint of marriage was held by the House of Lords to be determined by the law of the testator's domicile (Ommaney v. Bingham, 1796, 3, Pat. App. 448). The limitations imposed upon testators by the Mortmain Acts and other similar rules have already been considered, supra, p. 822.

It has been held in Scotland that, although by the law of that country moveables, e.g. jewels, cannot be entailed, there is nothing to prevent the will of a domiciled Scotswoman, who has directed such moveables to be settled along with English real estate (the law of England recognising the possibility of settling moveable property in that way) from receiving effect. The principle of the decision seems to be that the intention is not unlawful, but fails in Scotland from want of legal machinery to carry it out: if England can supply this machinery, there is nothing in public policy to prevent it (Marquis of Bute v. Lady Bute's Trs. 1880, Ct. of Sess. Ca. 4th ser. viii. 191).

If the law should, for reasons of public policy, forbid a testator to make this or that disposition of his property, e.g. forbid him to direct entails, conceived as it is in the Code Civil (see also Italian Code, § 899), goes further: an entail directed by the settlement of a Frenchman, or an Italian, is invalid, even although those particular rights are not affected.

⁵⁰ Wächter, ii. p. 368.

⁵¹ Brocher, i. p. 422, is on this subject opposed to the absolute invalidity of a foreign entail in France, but gives no distinct solution of the question.

⁵² See the provisions of the law of Rome for the case that the legatee has not commercium in the thing bequeathed: L. 49, §§ 2, 3, D. de legat. ii. L. 40, de leg. i. The case is most likely to occur in the case of a legacy ad piam causam. The view of the English law agrees with what is said in the text. See Westlake-Holtzendorff, § 184, note.

⁵³ Cf. supra the law of obligations, §§ 248 and 255.

accumulation beyond a certain period, as by the Thelluson Act the law of Britain does, and fences its prohibition by declaring any such directions to be null and void, such a law must receive effect if the domicile of the testator is in Britain, or if the testator, being himself a foreigner, is disposing of the rents or produce of real estate situated in Britain (Freke v. Carbery, 1873, L. R. 16, Eq. 461).

Where the law of the domicile of a deceased person forbids one of the successors in moveables, if he is also heir in heritage, to claim his share of the moveables without bringing the heritage into the common mass, yet, if the heritage be in a foreign country, it will not be affected by this rule, and the heir will take it without thereby putting himself under any such obligation. So, too, in the converse case, where the heritage is in a country which applies the rule of collation, he will take both, since the law of the succession generally, the law of the domicile, knows no such law (Balfour v. Scott, 1793, H. of L., 3 Pat. App. 300; Robertson v. Macvewan, 18th Feb. 1817, Fac. Coll.]

RIGHTS OF heredes legitimi AND OF PERSONS ENTITLED BY LAW TO SHARE IN THE SUCCESSION.

§ 376. The right of heredes legitimi, and of those persons to whom the law itself gives a right to claim a share of the succession⁵⁴ (in the law of France the Réserve of the heirs-at-law, on the one hand, and the quantité disponible on the other) [in Scots law rights of legitim, etc.] must, of course, depend on the same law as regulates succession ab intestato. For these are simply rights in certain privileged heirs ab intestato, which cannot be defeated by the testator, or can only be defeated by him on certain conditions. According as we propose to apply the law of the domicile or of the rei sitæ to intestate succession, we must also apply either the one or the other to questions of this kind.⁵⁵ Of course, ⁵⁴ See, on the querela inofficiosa donationis, supra, § 235.

therefore, if we proceed on the principle of an universal succession, we must take into account, in estimating the shares to which these heredes legitimi are entitled, real property which is situated abroad, just as much as real property which is situated in this country;⁵⁶ and in cases where donations are challenged as encroachments on the rights of these heirs, our computation must proceed in the same way. We must not, however, confuse the rights of a surviving spouse proceeding upon a marriage contract, or given by force of a law which directly regulates the relations of married persons in questions of property, with the rights of these heredes legitimi. The personal law of the testator or predecessor regulates the latter;⁵⁷ while the former are dependent on the law, which, once for all, settles the relations of the spouses in matters of property.⁵⁸ The provision of the Code Civil, for instance, by which a husband who contracts a second marriage is limited in his testamentary rights, forbidding him to leave his second spouse more than a specified proportion of his property, is a provision in the sphere of succession law.

In accordance with this doctrine, it is not the national law of children of a former marriage,⁵⁹ who may own allegiance to a State to which the testator does not belong, that will rule, but it is the testator's last personal law. So, too, the right of the poor widow by Roman law to the fourth part of the estate which is left, must be treated either as a true succession or as a legacy provisione legis,⁶⁰ and therefore as dependent on the last personal law of the deceased husband. This right, therefore, may, however inequitable such a result may seem to be in the circumstances, be lost by a change in the husband's personal law.^{61 62}

Zacharia, Franz. C. R. iv. § 586, notes i. and ii.), it can only be the lex domicilii and not the lex rei sitæ, as in the case of the old coutumes, that is to be applied in cases of conflict between the Code Civil and a system which holds the theory of succession as an universal succession; because the provisions as to the quantité disponible, contained in the Code Civil, are no longer limited to family estates or real property, but apply to all property, heritable or moveable. French authors, however, seem to regard the rights of the héritiers à réserve as a statut réel upon the same grounds as were assumed by the older authors. Demangeat on Fœlix, i. p. 63; Fœlix, i. p. 129; Aubry et Rau, i. pp. 84, 101, 102; and the decisions cited by Weiss (p. 866); judgments of Ct. of Cass. 22nd March 1865 (Sirey, i. p. 175), and 4th April 1881 (J. ix. p. 87); Trib. Civ. Seine, 6th December 1882 (J. v. p. 164). See Laurent, vi. § 273, on this traditional view. The more modern French school favours the application of the national law of the testator. Laurent, ut cit.; Asser-Rivier, § 65; Clunet (J. v. p. 165); Weiss, p. 866. Since the publication of the new Italian Code, all the Italian authorities take this last view. See Fiore, § 408; Despagne, § 530.

NOTE NN ON § 376. HEREDES LEGITIMI.

[The laws of England and Scotland adopt the doctrine of the text; for the former, see Westlake, § 122, p. 132; for the latter, the leading case of Hog v. Lashley, 1792, 3 Hagg. CONSTRUCTION OF TESTAMENTS.

§ 377. No general rules can be laid down for the interpretation of mortis causa deeds—i.e. for ascertaining the true meaning and intention of the testator. There is no doubt that in all questions as to the regulation of his family affairs, the author of a deed will be presumed to have had the law and the forms of expression recognised in his own country in view much more readily than in questions as to obligatory contracts; there is no necessity, as in transactions inter vivos, where one has to observe the good faith on which the other party relies, to demand that the forms of expression in use at the place of execution should be observed;⁶³ and accordingly the appropriate interpretation is as a rule that which the language in use at the testator's domicile, be it ordinary colloquial language, or technical language, requires.⁶⁴ We can, however, imagine cases in which the testator may express himself in the language of the place where the thing in

⁶⁴ The following support the interpretation according to the terms and language of the domicile:—Hert, iv. 25; Molinæus, in L. 1, C. de. S. Trin.; Jo. a Sande, Decis. Ins. iv. tit. 8, defin. 7; Feelix, i. p. 262; Burge, ii. 857, iv. 591; Story, § 479 et seq. A will executed in Scotland by a born Scotchman, who had settled in England, was interpreted according to the language of English law. Story, 479*f.* Illustrations: A legacy made by the will of an Irishman is in dubio to be held to be in pounds of Irish currency (Story, 479*b*); the persons indicated by the lex domicilii of the testator are those who must be presumed to be instituted under a destination to heirs-at-law (Burge, ii. pp. 857, 858; Story, § 479*h*). An heir, instituted by a testator domiciled in Berlin, need not, although the estate which he is to take lies in a country subject to the common law of Rome, or the testator, during a short stay in such a country, has executed his testamentary disposition before its courts, or had it recorded there, wait for the purification of the condition attached to his institution. question is situated,⁶⁵ or may be presumed to have used that of the place of execution—e.g. if he has lived for some time at the place of execution, and has conceived his testament in the language of his temporary home and not of his domicile.⁶⁶

It will often be matter of doubt, whether we are to construe the language used by reference to the forms of expression known at the domicile, or those known in the native country of the testator. The whole scope of the testator's language must be taken into account, and we must also consider the circumstance whether the testator has or has not had for a long time the same domicile furth of his native country. If we take a man's national law as the law which on principle should prevail, we must in doubt construe the provisions of his last will in the sense which this law puts upon them, and construe his expressions as the language of his native country would be construed. When a man is making his last arrangements for the affairs of his family, he will generally be more likely to think of the country of his nationality, than he would be in making a contract of ordinary everyday life.⁶⁷

We should not, however, feel ourselves constrained, in a pure question of construction, where a change of domicile or of nationality had taken place, to regard the last personal law of the testator and the language in use at his last domicile as the proper test. The testator has declared himself in the language of the personal law which at one time was his, and has used its expressions. If he had desired to alter anything subsequently, he could have made a new will.⁶⁸

Older writers interpreted a man's testament as regards immoveables by the lex rei sitæ, and Wharton (§§ 592 and 597) still represents this point of view. We can only assent to this principle of construction in special circumstances. Although Wharton seems desirous of giving a preference to the law of the last domicile in cases in which, according to his view, the ⁶⁵ How is the case to be decided where a testator, belonging to country A, leaves to B, who belongs to another country, a legacy payable on B attaining majority? Is it the law of A or of B that is to determine the date of majority. In English practice it has been held [in re Hellmann's Will, 1866, L.R. 2, Eq. 363], that the court will recognise as major one who is major by the law of his foreign domicile, though still minor by the law of England, but will not pay a legacy to a father as the guardian of foreign infants, although the law of their foreign domicile authorises such payment. In my opinion, the question would be whether the postponement of payment was intended to confer an advantage on the person burdened with the payment, or to ensure the interests of the legatee, the legacy not to be entrusted to his guardians. In the former case the law of the testator, in the latter that of the legatee, will rule.

⁶⁶ Boullenois, i. p. 503; Savigny, § 377. Guthrie, p. 283, upholds the interpretation in most cases according to the law of the last domicile.

⁶⁸ So, too, Laurent, vi. § 308. If the testator provides that the succession shall take its course as by law, the course of succession is that which prevailed at the domicile which the testator then had, and a subsequent change of domicile will make no change upon the law which is to be followed (so decided by the German Imp. Ct.; see Stobbe, § 34, note 55). This decision cannot be applied in every case in which the testator says that he leaves his succession to be ruled by the law.

domicile is the consideration which is to guide the decision, he seems by that to mean no more than that coercitive rules of construction on the one hand, that is, provisions which are in truth directly made by the law itself, must be applied according to the rules of the law of the last domicile, and that, on the other hand, a construction put upon a testament by a court of the last domicile must be recognised in other countries.⁶⁹

NOTE 00 ON § 377. CONSTRUCTION OF TESTAMENTS.

[In Scotland the law of the last domicile will regulate the construction of testamentary deeds as to moveables, unless the frame of the deed, and the circumstances of its execution, and the history of the testator, point to another law as intended by the testator to be taken as the canon of construction (Mitchell & Baxter v. Davies, 1875, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. iii. p. 208). These questions were under review in the recent cases of Brown's Trs. 1890, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xvii. p. 1174, and that of Smiths, 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 1038. In the former of these cases, Lord Fraser held that the presumption in favour of the law of domicile at the date of death, was displaced by the facts that that was a derivative domicile taken by the testator, as a married woman, from her husband; that the settlement was executed in another country, by a lawyer of that country, in his own terminology, and created a trust the domicile of which was also in that country. In questions as to real estate, the law of Scotland holds that the lex rei sitæ will rule, but it has been decided that the terms of a foreign deed, executed by a domiciled foreigner, dealing with Scots heritage, and using technical terms of foreign conveyancing, will receive effect in Scotland in such a way as will most nearly give effect to the intention of the maker of the deed, although the technical language used may be unintelligible to Scots conveyancers (Studd, 1880, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. viii. p. 249). The import of this decision seems to be that, although the lex rei sitæ will be presumed in cases of real property to be the test for the interpretation of ordinary, non-technical language, or of words which have a technical meaning in the law language of the situs, still, if technical foreign words are used, these must be translated with the help of foreign lawyers, so that the intention of the testator shall receive effect. If words are used which have a technical meaning both in the language of the situs, on the one hand, and in that of the place of the execution or of the drafting of the deed, or of the testator's domicile, or whatever may be the law which comes into competition with that of the situs, on the other, then the whole circumstances of the case must be scanned, in order to arrive at the testator's intention, the court being, however, always guided by the presumption in favour of the lex situs in cases of doubt.

⁶⁹ The question whether a legacy, which has not been reduced into possession by the legatee himself, falls to his heirs, or rather to the heirs of the testator, or to the person who would be liable to pay it as a burden, must be determined by the personal law of the testator. Laurent, vi. § 313, who seems to reach the same result that it is a question of the construction of the testator's intention (question de volonté). That may be the case. But in many instances the testator will not have made the thing clear to himself (see art. 1039, of the Code Civil, and art. 890 of the Italian Code, which to some extent takes a different view).

The principles of the law of England, both as regards moveable and as regards heritable property, seem to be identical with those that have been applied in Scotland. For the rule in the case of moveables, Westlake, § 123, and Bradford v. Young, 1885, L. R. 29, Ch. D. 617, may be consulted. As regards heritage, see Westlake, § 170, and cases there cited.]

EXECUTORS OF A WILL.

§ 378. The powers of executors nominate must, logically, be determined by the testator's intention, ascertained, it may be, by construction, and by his personal law, in so far as this latter law is held to be regulative generally of questions in the succession. It would lead to intolerable contradictions if the rights of executors were to be determined by one law, while the rights of heirs and legatees were determined by another.⁷⁰ Even the provision of the 1031st article of the Code Civil,⁷¹ which only empowers the executor of a will to realise the moveables in exceptional cases, cannot be applied if the personal law of the testator gives the executor wider powers. It will be impossible to say that in such a case the question is one as to imposing a limitation on property, which is not sanctioned by the lex rei sitæ (see Code Civil, art. 541). The freedom of property situated in France will not be permanently prejudiced by such sales, and it is certain that commerce will not be impeded. The only matter in question is the right of the heirs. The opposite view would give rise to the most irritating complications. Of course, however, the executor, even when named by the testator, is bound by the general restrictions which the lex rei sitæ imposes on the assumption of the possession of the assets belonging to the estate (see below, § 383).

NOTE PP ON § 378. POWERS OF TRUSTEES.

[The powers of an executor will by the laws of England and Scotland be determined by the laws of the deceased's domicile, any express powers conferred on them by the deceased being, of course, recognised, unless these are against public policy. Where, however, a testator has appointed a continuing trust with a local habitation in another country, e.g. for the establishment of a system of charitable education there, then the law of that country will regulate the conduct of the trustees appointed for the management of the bequest, and will interpret according to its own rules the succession to the original trustees prescribed by the truster. If he has used, for instance, the term "heirs" of the original trustees, the law of the place of administration will read the word "heirs" in its own sense.

⁷⁰ In this connection, see Laurent, vii. § 168.

⁷¹ Laurent (ut cit.) is, by his theory of ordre public or lois de police, forced to declare this 1031st article to be a Statut réel. See the Dutch decision reported by Hingst (Rev. xiii. p. 408). "If by the Dutch law, the lex rei sitæ the executor needs a special authorisation for realising immoveables, then in every case an authorisation granted by the court to whose jurisdiction the testator belonged is sufficient."

(Att. Gen. v. Lepine, 1818, 2, Sw. 181; Emery v. Hill, 1, Russ. 112; Ferguson v. Marjoribanks, 1853, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xv. p. 637; and Lord Deas in Boe v. Anderson, 1862, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiv. at pp. 755 et seq.)

The law of the situs will determine the powers of trustees of a domiciled foreigner vested with heritable property.

But while the powers of the trustees will, like other questions as to the import of the will of the deceased, be determined by the law of his domicile, or of the situs of real estate, as the case may be, the courts of any country in which trustees can be personally made liable, by reason of their presence within the jurisdiction, may interfere at the suit of a beneficiary to compel the trustees to do their duty, and may for that purpose entertain whatever process is most suitable. In England, the fact of the presence of trustees will justify what is known as an administration suit.

But while courts have jurisdiction, in such circumstances, to see that trustees carry out the trust committed to them, it may very well be that they should refuse to exercise the jurisdiction, because the courts of some other country present a more convenient forum.

While these statements are true of trusts with continuing powers of administration, they are not applicable to the case of executors; the jurisdiction to appoint them and to control their actings is purely territorial. See Orr Ewing's Trs. 1885, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xiii. (H. of L.) 1, and infra, pp. 839, 840, and also pp. 937, 938.]

REVOCATION OF mortis causa PROVISIONS.

§ 379. The recall of a mortis causa provision, by a final act of the testator himself, e.g. by his selling something which he had bequeathed as a legacy (cf. Code Civil, § 1038), is, of course, to be submitted to the test of the law which regulates the succession generally, without any regard to the place in which the act involving the recall was done.⁷² The rule "locus regit actum" is, however, the rule applicable to a recall effected by some special formal document.⁷³ But, since it is by no means necessary that an act which destroys some legal relation should have this destructive effect by the lex loci actus; since indeed it is quite sufficient—unless where in the case of real rights the lex rei sitæ has to be observed—that the loss of the legal relation in question should follow according to the rules of that law which regulates the material import of the legal relation; the recall of a testament, e.g. by a deliberate cancellation of the document, will be effectual, if the personal law of the testator recognises such a cancellation, and in spite of the fact that this form of cancellation may be unknown at the place where the cancellation took place.⁷⁴ If a subsequent testament validly executed recalls a prior testament, then, in virtue of the rule "locus regit actum," the same effect must be produced by a subsequent testament executed in another country and valid by its law.⁷⁵ The cancellation of a testament by some particular events,⁷⁶ e.g. the subsequent birth of children, is in the same way to be decided by the law which regulates the succession generally.⁷⁷

CONTRACTS AS TO SUCCESSION.

§ 380. Contracts as to succession are substantially to be dealt with according to the same rules as testaments. Thus, unless the lex rei sitæ in some exceptional cases falls to be applied, the last personal law of the testator will rule. In mutual contracts the law of the first decessor will govern.⁷⁸ Of course, by an alteration in the personal law, it may be brought about that a contract as to succession which was originally valid, should become invalid or at least challengeable, if, for instance, the last personal law of the testator rejects such contracts altogether, or if it gives heredes legitimi larger rights of challenge. But the freedom to change one's domicile, to emigrate, and to change one's nationality, cannot be impaired by virtue of a contract as to succession, which cannot in any case be presented as a perfectly secure right of property.

III. TAKING UP THE SUCCESSION AND REDUCING LEGACIES INTO POSSESSION.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

§ 381. Special difficulties may be raised in connection with the taking possession of successions and legacies, or with the renunciation of them,¹ on ⁷⁴ Despagnet, § 521 : App. Ct. Hamburg, 12th April 1883 (Seuffert, xlviii. No. 202).

⁷⁸ So Savigny, p. 314 ; Unger, p. 205 ; Schmid, p. 100 ; Stobbe, § 34 ad fin. ; Wharton, § 600.

¹ The possession and the renunciation of a succession must necessarily be subject to the same law. The latter is simply the negation of the former.

the other.² In the first place, it may be said without fear of contradiction that a succession can only be taken up by satisfying the requirements of the law which regulates the succession itself. This is a plain deduction from the fact that by taking up the succession a man excludes all remoter heirs and eventual legatees, while it must necessarily be the law of the succession in general that is to regulate the order in which these heirs are to be called and their rights.³ It was therefore quite logical in the older writers, who looked upon the lex rei sitæ as the general law for regulating the succession in immoveables (e.g. Burgundus, ad consuet. Flandr. ii. 16, Merlin, Rép. voc. Dette, § 4, note 1), to hold that the lex rei sitæ must regulate also the entry on the succession.

At the same time, the rule "locus regit actum" in its permissive sense must also be applied, if special acts, e.g. declarations of acceptance of the succession, are necessary and must be expressed in certain prescribed forms. Of course, if the idea of the succession as a singular succession is the prevailing theory of the law, the rule "locus regit actum" is then necessarily excluded,^{4,5} and, as in other cases, it may be excluded either expressly or by implication by the law which regulates the succession in its material aspects. On the other hand, doubts may easily arise of a real intention on the part of the heir or legatee to take up the succession or the legacy, if the law of the succession,⁶ or the law of the place where the heir or legatee resides, requires some particular form,⁷ e.g. a declaration in writing, while all the declaration that is made is an informal declaration.⁸ The rule that the law of the succession must be applied will suffer an additional exception, which is, however, an exception in appearance only, where that law prescribes special protective rules in ² At the same time the matter has, as yet, been very little discussed; the most thorough-going discussions are by Laurent, vi. § 373, and Brocher, i. § 129. The former's exposition is arbitrary, and not very satisfactory.

³ As the rights of creditors on the succession against the heir in all cases depend upon whether he has entered on the succession or not, i.e. really become heir or not, it follows that, no matter where these creditors are domiciled, or where their claims have arisen, they will have to recognise a renunciation of the succession which satisfies the law of the succession, i.e. as a general rule the personal law of the deceased.

⁴ To this effect Boullenois, i. 237, 238; Burge, iv. p. 641.

⁷ E.g. the 778th article of the French Code requires a written acceptance by the heirs-at law.

taking up or in renouncing a succession, which are applicable to certain classes of persons only, obviously with the object of protecting these persons specially from a hasty decision which may be prejudicial to them, or with reference to their family relationships, as, for instance, in the case of a married woman. These are limitations on the capacity to act,⁹ and consequently it is not the law of the succession, but the personal law of those who take, that will regulate it.¹⁰

§ 382. It cannot, however, very well be that a person who belongs to another country, and who is resident there, should be bound simply in virtue of the law of the succession, which is quite unknown to him. Thus, for example, the heirs who take are only liable to creditors, if both the law of the succession and the personal law of the person taking, concur in holding that there is ground for that liability. We may infer that such a liability exists in the case of a foreigner, who, at the time when the succession opens, is resident in the country whose law governs the succession. But any such inference would be unfair, in the case of foreigners, from whom we cannot expect an adequate knowledge of the rules of a law of succession which is strange to them.¹¹ But a declaration of acceptance, whether it be valid on the principle "locus regit actum," or in conformity with the law of the country of the person who takes, if it satisfies at the same time the law of the succession, subjects the person who makes it, in accordance with the quasi-contract involved in the taking up of the succession, to the law by which that succession is regulated, as regards all the consequences of acceptance; e.g. the beneficium inventarii will be that which is known to this law. If there is to be an appeal to this beneficium, all the provisions of the law which regulates the succession must be observed.

⁹ Cf. e.g. Code civ. §§ 776 and 461.

¹¹ If the heir is domiciled in a country where Roman law rules—e.g. in the town of Hanover—he will not come under personal liability, although he allows the period which the Prussian law assigns (A.L.R. i. 9, §§ 384 and 421) for deliberation and making up of inventories to pass by without taking any steps, unless during this period he resides in Prussian territory. It is at variance with the principles of international law that inhabitants of one country should be put under obligations by the law of another country without their consent, and without having left their own territory (cf. judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 1st Nov. 1850, Decis. 20, p. 204). All that the courts of Prussia or the next heirs and the creditors could do would be to require the heir domiciled in Hanover to make his election within a definite time, and if that elapsed without his taking any step, then the consequences provided for such a case by the Roman law would follow, unless the Prussian law is more favourable to the heir in the event of his taking up the inheritance. This latter limitation is explained by the consideration that the heir cannot be put under any further obligations than those which are imposed on him by the law under which the succession falls.

In particular, the liability of the person who takes for the debts of the succession is regulated by the law of the succession; this will determine e.g. whether he is liable in solidum, or only pro rata, personally or only to the amount of the value of the estate which he takes; it will determine his liability to collate,¹² and the dues payable on the succession.¹³

Some lawyers¹⁴ propose that on all these questions the law of the place where the greater part of the inheritance lies should rule. This proposal rests upon an erroneous application of the provisions of the Roman law as to jurisdiction in Fideicommissa, provisions which have nothing to do with local law.¹⁵

Others propose that the law of the last domicile shall be applied to all questions under this head, although for all other questions of succession they regard the lex rei sitæ as regulative. The reason on which they justify this view¹⁶—viz. that the obligations of the heir arise from a quasi contract, which must be held to have been entered upon wherever the last domicile (domus mortuaria) may have been—is condemned and refuted by their own general theory, by which succession is held to be a mere transmission of the various assets of property to the heir. Their mistake is accounted for in this way, that they apply the lex rei sitæ to cases of conflict between territorial laws that hold the theory of an universal succession; accordingly the grossest inconsistencies in questions as to the taking up of the succession and the liability of the heir are found to arise in attempting to apply this general theory.

TAKING POSSESSION OF THE SUCCESSION. LAW OF ENGLAND IN PARTICULAR.

§ 383. The actual taking possession of the different assets of the succession is, however, subject to the lex rei sitæ, and this rule is not confined to the case of immoveables.¹⁷ Accordingly, it may well be that, in cases of succession which, so far as the order of succession goes, are subject to the law of some other territory, the rule may hold good that the articles which belong to the succession cannot be taken into possession without some authorisation from the Government of the country in which they are, and that no debts due to the succession can be sued for—the law of the debtor being in this matter regulative—unless some such authority has been obtained. This is the case in England and the United States.¹⁸ The heir must obtain authority from a competent court to enter upon possession of the moveable estate—letters of administration—and then pay the creditors of the deceased and his legatees in mobilibus, under the superintendence of this court. This rule is applied to any moveable estate of a foreigner which may happen to be in England.¹⁹ The title of the heir to obtain letters of administration is, however, regulated by his lex domicilii, and this procedure takes place not only when the whole aggregate of a succession is in question, but even when a claim is made before the court to some one asset falling to the heir. Its object is to give security to the creditors and legatees, and its application to the moveable estate of foreigners situated in the country must be held, according to the principles of international law, to be as sound as to determine the rights of preference among the creditors according to their own law.²⁰ The carrying out of these principles in detail present a variety of difficulties. But as these involve for the most part matters of English law, it will be better to refer to English authorities for an exposition of them (in particular to Westlake and to Wharton).

It seems doubtful, and it is, in view of the multiplicity of commercial relations, a question of interest, whether one who has paid to a foreign heir in bona fide, before he has obtained letters of administration, is discharged of his debt.^{21 22} If, however, a foreign heir has once taken possession of an asset belonging to the succession according to the law of the foreign country, he needs no further authorisation to entitle him to vindicate this article if it is subsequently taken from him in England: he sues in his own name.²³ The administrator of an Englishman—or, if we take the lex domicilii as regulative of the personal law, of a person domiciled in England—appointed in England, will be treated in a foreign country as having a title to take possession of articles belonging to the succession, and to raise actions for debts due to the estate.

INTERPOSITION OF COURTS OF LAW IN MATTERS AFFECTING SUCCESSIONS.

§ 384. The interposition of the courts in matters of succession takes very different shapes in different countries. In particular, there are important differences in the conditions under which the courts ex officio assume the regulation of such estates, and specially again in their

(ii.) 29th December 1886 (Bolze, iv., note 17, p. 5); the law of the domicile of the deceased held regulative of the extent of the liability of those persons who, on the strength of their presumptive rights as heirs, have taken possession of the estate, and are called to account by the true heirs, although they have taken and held possession at some other place.

procedure with reference to successions belonging to foreigners.²⁴ In recent consular treaties, consuls are, in many cases, invested with the right to assist in the regulation of successions belonging to subjects of the State which they represent. The extent of the powers so conferred is, however, very different in different cases. It is impossible, without encroaching on territorial rights of jurisdiction, to commit to consuls the task of satisfying creditors or settling disputes connected with the succession. On the other hand, the principles of international law contain nothing that need prevent them from having committed to their superintendence measures which are purely for preservation and for the division of the estate among heirs and legatees, all of whom belong to the same nationality as the deceased. (See e.g. Italo-German consular treaty of 1869, § 11; German-Brazilian consular treaty of 1882, § 18; Greco-German treaty of 1882, § 15; treaty between the German Empire and the United States in 1871, §§ 10 and 11.)

In England, the leading principle is that an heir, in so far as the moveable estate is concerned, must, as a matter of form, always be looked upon primarily as an "administrator": i.e. he must first be named administrator by the court, at one time the ecclesiastical court, now the Court of Probate (see Lehr, Dr. Civ. Anglais, § 1003). This holds even in the case of one who inherits from a person domiciled abroad, if he takes into his possession things which happen to be in England, or if he proposes to sue in England for debts due to the estate. But in such cases the English court will accept as authoritative the certificates and decisions of the court of the domicile, and will entrust the administration even of the English estate to the foreign administrator appointed by the court of the domicile. So far will this be carried, that if the court of the deceased's domicile recalls any declaration it may have made as to the title of an heir, the administration which was granted in England will also be recalled, and will be given out anew to the person who has a title under the sentence of the foreign court. But the powers of the administrator in England will be determined by the law of England. They can, however, in no case be wider than they are by the lex domicilii of the deceased: they will e.g. be limited if the lex domicilii limits them, as the law of Germany limits the powers of an executor, to interim measures. These arrangements and conceptions of English law lead to many doubts on matters of forms and relaxations of the strict rules.

If any special forms, such as entry in a register of securities, are required for taking up a real right bequeathed as a legacy, by the law of the place where the thing in question is, if, that is to say, the full right cannot be created or be transferred by the mortis causa disposition alone, then the legatee acquires by this mortis causa disposition no more than a right of action for this real right.

²⁴ F. Böhm's Handbuch der Internationalen Nachlassregulirung (Augsburg 1881) is principally dedicated to an exposition of the manner in which the courts of different civilised countries interpose, and of the rights and duties which fall upon the different parties affected. Of course, rules of private international law and of civil procedure have often to be applied, and the author gives a short sketch and a table of the order of legal succession for each one of the States, whose system he takes into consideration. See the detailed exposition of the treatment of the successions of foreigners in Austria in Starr's Rechtshülfe in Oesterreich, pp. 76-226.

NOTE QQ ON §§ 383, 384. ADMINISTRATION IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

[Personal property situated in England cannot be taken up by an executor, nor will an executor have any title to sue in England, unless he has obtained an English grant of probate. So, too, in Scotland no executor will have an active title to sue the debtors of the deceased without confirmation. In both countries the jurisdiction of the court in matters of administration—using that word in its narrow sense of the procedure by which the representative of a dead man takes up his moveable property for distribution—is strictly territorial. But the courts to whom it falls to appoint executors will always respect the title already conferred upon a particular person by the court of the deceased's domicile, and will incline to appoint him to the office (in re Stewart 1838, 1, Cur. 904; in re Oliphant, 1860, 30 L.J.N.S., P. and M. 82 (Preston v. Melville, 1841, 8, H. of L. 1 and 2 Rob. App. 80) unless he is unfitted by reason of some circumstance (e.g. minority), which is viewed as a disqualification by the English or Scots courts (Duchess of Orleans, 1859, 1, S. and T. 253). So far is this principle of comity carried that, where an administrator had been originally appointed in England, the country of an ancillary administration, and a different person was appointed by the court of the country of the principal administration, the English appointment was recalled, so as to bring the administration in England into conformity with that in the foreign country. Enohim v. Wylie, 1862, 10, H. of L. 1.

When administration is granted to one on account not of a nomination by the deceased, but on account of a beneficial interest in the succession or of kinship to the deceased, it is to the law of the domicile of the deceased that we must look to determine the beneficial interest or kinship. (Westlake, § 75; Alexander on the practice of the Commissary Courts, p. 44.)

The statute of 1858 (21 and 22 Vict. c. 56) provides a simple and expeditious method of obtaining confirmation within the different jurisdictions of the courts of England, Scotland, and Ireland, but preserves intact the right of each country to dispose of the moveables situated within its territory by an order of its own courts.

When administration, in the sense already defined, has once been granted in any country, it must proceed in the country in which possession under that grant is taken (Preston v. Melville, ut supra). That is to say, the executor appointed by the courts of that country is not in safety to part with any of the assets taken up by him till the debts of the estate due to creditors in that country are paid, not even if he proposes to pay them over to trustees appointed by the deceased for permanent purposes in another country. Creditors belonging to the country where an executor has been appointed, whether in the course of the leading administration or of an ancillary administration, are entitled to seek payment from him in the courts of that country, and, if necessary, to institute an administration suit so as to take accounts of the estate vested in that executor, and ascertain what sum, if any, remains to be handed by the executor to the permanent trustees, who belong to another country (Orr Ewing's Trs., 1885, Ct. of Sess. Reps., 4th ser. xiii. (H. of L.), 1. See Lord Chancellor Selborne, at p. 10, in explanation of the case of Preston v. Melville).

Where there is administration in another sense, i.e. a continuing administration by trustees, the courts of the country in which the trustees are personally present have jurisdiction to enforce the due performance of the trust at the instance of any beneficiary, and will exercise this jurisdiction, if it is shown that the trustees are evading an accounting in the country to which they are primarily subject. See Lord Watson's opinion in Orr Ewing's Trs. ut supra.]

DISTRIBUTION OF THE SUCCESSION.

§ 385. The distribution of the succession must in general be subject to the law of the succession. Most of the difficulties which arise in applying the provisions of the law of France on this subject are caused²⁵ by the fact that the law of France on this point, again, is in reality founded on the principle of an universal succession, while the tradition of French lawyers nevertheless tries to combine with it, so far as immoveable estate is concerned, the lex rei sitæ. It must, however, be kept in mind that provisions, the object of which is to extend to particular classes of persons, such, for instance, as minors, a special protection,²⁶ are not to be applied to foreigners belonging to these classes, if their own domestic law does not look upon such a measure of protection as necessary. Conversely, however, foreigners cannot make any such protective measures available, if they are not known to the law under which the distribution of the estate takes place.²⁷ Provisions, by which real rights are affected, and in particular affected in their relations with third parties, can only be carried out in so far as the lex rei sitæ allows it to be done. In these matters subtle distinctions often require to be made. Although, for instance, the law under which the succession itself falls, permits the testator to put off the distribution of the succession under certain conditions for a certain time (see Italian Code, § 984), a provision of that kind by a testator has no effect upon things which happen to be in another territory, where the rule is that every co-owner of a thing may at all times force a distribution, and where even an agreement to the contrary has no effect.²⁸ Although, again, the law of France (Code Civ. § 883) sets up the principle that, as it is generally expressed, the right which the co-heirs take has at the date of the distribution a declaratory effect, that is to say, must be regarded as if the co-heir, who eventually takes, had taken the whole subject directly from the testator, so that all rights in the thing created in the meantime by other co-heirs shall receive no effect, while the rights which the co-heir, who eventually takes, has created, receive effect over the whole subject; this rule cannot claim to receive effect in another country, e.g. in a country where the common law of Rome prevails, or in Spain, where the heir, who takes the thing at the period of distribution in its entirety, receives it as regards the shares apportioned to the other co-heirs as their singular successor.²⁹

²⁵ See specially Laurent, vii. § 13, who labours unprofitably in this subject, with his theory of the universal validity of the testator's intentions on the one hand—the testator has frequently not thought on the subject at all, and has therefore had no intentions on the point—and with the theory of the statut réel in the sense in which he uses the term. Brocher, i. § 133, and Weiss, p. 869.

²⁶ See Laurent; Weiss, p. 870.

A rule like that of the French law is very highly prejudicial to the rights of third parties, who may in the meantime have acquired real rights over the thing in question from the other co-heirs. It attacks the very system on which property and real rights as such are based. On the other hand, it would be a complete contradiction to apply that rule to some of the things which belong to the succession, while it would not be applicable to the rest of the articles that go to make up the same succession.³⁰ Thus it will only operate when the succession as a whole falls under the law of France, or under some other system which is similarly expressed, i.e. it only operates for the assets of a French succession which happen to be within a territory that is subject to the French law.

The same principles must regulate the obligation to collate (rapport in the law of France³¹): this obligation cannot have a direct real effect with retrospective operation (see Code Civ. § 865), unless the law of the succession and the lex situs both attribute these virtues to it [see supra, p. 826, as to the law of collation in England and Scotland].

²⁹ Weiss, pp. 872, 873, agrees with me. Laurent's inference (§ 28), that the intention of the party is the basis of art. 883, is entirely perverse and impracticable. Of course, parties always desire what the law of France enjoins, and thus everything and nothing can be proved.

³¹ See Laurent, vii. § 30.

LIABILITIES OF THE SUCCESSION. RIGHT OF SEPARATION. TRANSFERENCE OF THE SUCCESSION OR A PART OF IT.

§ 386. We have already, in expounding the general principles which regulate the law of succession, disposed of the incidence of the debts of the succession as a matter of principle. If we are not embarrassed by any of the special principles which cast the burden of particular debts on the real estate according to the lex rei sitæ, in which case there may well be an exception from the system of an universal succession,³² the only course which we can possibly take is to hold all who take under the succession liable in proportion to the value of their shares.³³ If we start with the principle that the personal law of the deceased shall be the only rule for the regulation of the succession, then without any further trouble we shall find in it the order of liability. That law, too, must decide whether and under what conditions those who take are liable beyond the amount of the succession with their own means, and whether they can save themselves from this further liability by taking and special precautions (e.g. beneficium inventarii). The heir cannot appeal in this matter to his own personal law. The law allows him to choose whether he will take up or renounce the succession, and allows him nothing more. The same principles must determine his right to recall his resolution to take up the succession.

The so-called right of separation enjoyed by the creditors on the succession, introduces a kind of bankruptcy procedure. In so far, then, as isolated groups of assets are made the subjects of particular [as distinguished from general] processes of this kind, the law which regulates each of these processes must decide as to the creditors' rights of separation. The primary object is to extract what was, as a matter of fact, the property of the deceased from the mass of property belonging to his heirs, and that has, as a rule, to be done in a question with the creditors of these heirs in bankruptcy, the rights which these creditors enjoy in respect of the bankruptcy being limited, as it is maintained, by this right of separation. But, since the lex rei sitæ is the law that must regulate particular bankruptcies, even as regards moveable property, this right of separation must also be ruled by that law.³⁴ On the other hand, the creditors of the succession have no other rights than those which are given to them by the law which rules the succession generally. This right of separation, then, only operates in so far as both systems of law concerned recognise it.

³³ Wharton, § 620 ad fin. See, too, Brocher, i. § 135, p. 432. He thinks that, for a satisfactory solution of these questions, treaties will be required. If the estate cannot meet its liabilities, and if therefore a kind of process of bankruptcy is set on foot—a character which the English procedure and that of the United States always have, and which other States have where the succession is taken up cum beneficio inventarii, then the principles of the international law of bankruptcy must apply. See Wharton, §§ 621 et seq.

The question as to the effect of the transference of a succession as a whole, or of an imaginary share of it, the share e.g. falling to one of the co-heirs, must, on the other hand, be dependent on the law which rules the succession. For the ultimate question in such cases is whether the person who takes from the original heir is himself to be recognised as an universal successor, i.e. as having come in place of the heir. Accordingly the 841st article of the French Code Civil, which deals with the retrait successoral, and gives the co-heirs a right to buy out any one to whom one of these co-heirs has sold his share of the succession, on payment to him of the purchase price which he has paid or agreed to pay, will apply to all successions which depend on French law, successions to a Frenchman, but to such successions only.³⁵

ESTATE TO WHICH THERE IS NO HEIR. Hereditas jacens.

§ 387. The question to which State property is to fall where there is no heir, whether to that in which it is situated, or to that to which the last possessor belonged, is dependent upon whether the right of the State to succeed is to be considered to be a right occupationis or a right of consolidation belonging to the feudal superior,³⁶ or as a true right of succession. In either the first or second case, the property will go to the State where the property is situated; in the last case it will fall to that of the domicile of the deceased, in so far as both States hold the theory of an universal succession, or as the estate is made up of moveables.³⁷ The theory which is in conformity with modern ideas of law, which is more deserving of our respect, and which undoubtedly now prevails as the theory of the law

³⁶ So in real estate by the law of England (Blackstone, ii. p. 243; Stephen, vol. i. p. 433).

in Germany,⁸⁸ is that, if there is no one nearer in blood to be called to the succession, a man's fellow-countrymen must be regarded as his heirs. This view is supported by the fact that it is the State to which a man belongs that fixes the circle of those who are entitled to succeed to him as heirs, drawing it more or less wide, as it pleases; while, on the other hand, it has more or less of the air of robbery for a State to seize on the moveable estate of a deceased person, who was by mere accident resident there at the moment of his death. Thus the State whose subject and citizen the deceased was, will be entitled to succeed to him. But, beyond Germany, the other rule still prevails, and each State seizes the moveables which happen to be within its borders.⁸⁹

The law which governs the succession generally must regulate the question of curatory of an hereditas jacens. Thus, if an universal succession is the prevailing theory, the personal law of the deceased will determine the power of the curator to realise the estate, and to raise actions in connection with it, and the officials of the State to which the deceased belonged will name the curator. Any State, of course, within whose territory assets of the succession are found, may set up a provisional curatory for an hereditas jacens.

⁸⁸ See Windscheid, Pandekten, iii. § 622, note 1; Unger, Das österreichische Erbrecht, § 90, note 10.

⁸⁹ So in particular the law of France, on the ground that the question is one as to sovereign rights: if we consider it closely this is a petitio principii. See Laurent, vi. § 255: he approves of the French rule; so, too, Weiss, p. 850. Yet there are not altogether wanting defenders of the view taken in the text even in France; Laurent himself cites Antoine, "de la succession légitime et testamentaire," p. 89; Fiore pleads the right of occupatio (§ 402).

Wharton (§ 693) favours the view that immoveables must fall to the fisk rei sitæ; he very properly distinguishes countries in which an universal succession is recognised from those in which it is not.

In Bavaria, according to Roth, the principle of occupatio prevails.

The Austrian fisk, on principles which Unger describes as being universally regulative of succession in its international aspects, will appropriate the estate left by a foreigner who has no heirs, so far as it is immoveable and locally situated in Austria, and the whole estate of an Austrian who has become domiciled abroad, and who dies without heirs, in so far as it is situated in Austria.

Eleventh Book.

LAW OF PROCESS.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

THE PROCESS AS A WHOLE.

§ 388. When any legal relation is made the subject of competition or dispute in court, it assumes a new shape. It is submitted for ascertainment and constitution by some particular sovereign authority, or by its courts. From what has already been laid down (p. 79), it necessarily follows that it is submitted to the operation of the law of the court which is charged with the process, but, from the nature of the case, in so far only as the provisions of that law on the matter of procedure are concerned; it is not submitted to any rules that may be found in that law dealing with the legal relation as such, and apart from its aspect as the subject of an action. Again, since the decree in a process may itself be regarded as an independent legal relation, which will no doubt react in its turn on the substantive legal relation, we reach this proposition, viz. the rules of procedure to be applied in any process are always to be found in the law of the country to which the court belongs, the lex fori.¹

¹ See, in particular, Foote, p. 500: "No principle of private international law is more certain in itself, than the rule that the form of remedies or modes are regulated solely by the law of the place where the action is brought." On the other hand, it is a mistake to apply to the constitution and the procedure of courts of arbitration no law but the law of the country to which the contract of submission in itself belongs (see Ger. Imp. Ct. (i.), 2nd July 1884, Blum, Ann. i. No. 1). This decision bears that the 857th section of the German Civilprocess-ordn. contains substantive provisions of law [and is not a mere code of procedure], and that, therefore, in certain circumstances it is not to be applied by German courts. The section deals with the case in which circumstances may require that an arbitration process should be facilitated by the nomination of an arbiter by the competent court. By the older common law of Germany it was incompetent to do anything of the kind, unless special provision were made for it in the contract of submission. It must also be kept in view that some summary form of procedure is allowed by reason of the assent of the debtor as implied in the terms of his contract: it can only be put in force if the lex fori and the lex loci contractus concur in holding that the contract is to be so construed (see e.g. Colerus, de proc. execut. ii. c. 3, §§ 21-23).

We reach the same result in another way. The process with all its forms, and all the procedure by the parties and by the judge, has this object, and this object only, viz. to create in the mind of the judge a persuasion that the rights which are in question do or do not exist. Just as, in the case of an individual, persuasion can only be effected by attention to the peculiarities of his character, the State, in the same way, represented by its courts of justice, will only allow itself to be persuaded according to the peculiar regulations under which it has placed itself.²

PARTICULAR STEPS OF PROCESS. APPLICATION OF THE lex fori.

§ 389. It may, however, happen, in the course of what may be a long series of different steps of procedure which go to make up a process at law, that some of these steps of procedure must necessarily be taken outside the State to which the court that is to decide upon the whole case, belongs. Are we then to follow the law of the place where these isolated steps of procedure take place, or the law of the court in which the action has been brought, and by which the decision in the action, i.e. the decision as to the legal relation which has become the subject of a dispute, is to be pronounced?

In this case, too, it is a matter of no difficulty to find the answer, which follows from the logical application of the principle which we have already recognised.

The steps of procedure which fall to be taken in a foreign country are simply conditions and preliminaries for further procedure in the court in which the process is pending, and in which the decision upon the main question in the case is to be given, and in particular they are necessary conditions of the decision which is eventually to be pronounced there. If in the circumstances of any case it should be necessary to cite a party, or take the evidence of a witness, or make some inspection, or refer some point of the case to oath in a foreign country, the court where the leading process depends must be guided by its own law in determining whether the act that has been done in another country will warrant it e.g. in proceeding with a hearing in the absence of the persons who have been cited, or in going on to give judgment on the truth or falsity of the averments of parties.

The opinion which we have pronounced as to steps of procedure taken in a foreign country is, however, liable to serious modification, if we have to consider a case, in which the court where the principal process is in dependence requires some magisterial or judicial procedure to be gone through in a foreign country, or a case where the rule "locus regit actum" may be applied.

A magisterial or judicial act can never be performed by the functionary charged with it, except in the mode which the law of his own State imperatively enjoins as the mode which in all cases must be observed. An act which is wanting in some of the essentials thus imperatively required by that law is in its legal aspect no valid magisterial act at all, and cannot be so regarded even by the judge of another country. If the law of a judge, before whom some instrument is being drawn up, requires, for instance, the co-operation of some specially qualified draftsman, then any draft drawn up by the judge alone, without the co-operation of a draftsman, cannot, even in a foreign country, be recognised as valid. It cannot be so recognised even in a country, in which a judge does not in the like circumstances require to have a draftsman's co-operation. It is, of course, quite possible that State A is well justified in reposing a more extensive confidence in its judges than State B can repose in its judges.

Again, as regards the rule "locus regit actum," it is in the first place possible, that the performance of any act may be subject to coercive laws and to customs which prevail at the place where it has to be performed. These laws or customs must regulate procedure in such cases just as they regulate the conditions of the performance of an obligation. An example of such customs will be found in the existence of certain holidays. But, in the second place, the court where the principal process is depending may be concerned to secure that one of the parties, or a witness—a specialist—should do something which gives rise to a special obligation either under the principles of civil or of criminal law, e.g. should emit an oath. In undertaking an obligation of such a character, in particular if it is an obligation of public law, or of criminal law, the lex loci actus must be observed. The court in which the principal cause depends must require that the law of that foreign country should be observed, if it desires to have some record or document strong enough to serve as a foundation on which it may base its own judgment on the case. It may possibly go further in its demands, and may require something more than the foreign law allows, in conformity with its own ideas, but as a general rule there will be no object in doing so.³

It is certain that a judge, who is not entrusted with the decision of the leading points in the case, but to whom there is merely committed some subsidiary and isolated point requiring to be disposed of in the course of the main action, has no other law but his own to guide him. If he were to release himself from the rules of this law, and to appeal to the divergent law of some other country, his actings would be null, and under certain circumstances he might make himself criminally responsible. Whether he may, without prejudice to his duty of observing his own law, and in order to satisfy the requirements of the law of the court where the principal process is in dependence, follow, in addition to his own forms, forms that are prescribed by the foreign law in the like cases—the parties to the case acquiescing—is a question of the neighbourly respect that every country pays to the law of other countries, which we shall deal with more fully in due course. In the meantime a more important question, which may be raised in connection with the auxiliary procedure, is the following.

Every civil action involves in substance, on the one hand, a determination of parties' rights, and, on the other, a compulsitor for the actual realisation of rights which have been or are to be determined. This compulsitor may in the abstract be regarded as a process auxiliary to the determination of the rights of parties, but, like every other public or official auxiliary process which invades the legal jurisdiction of a foreign country, this compulsitor is in some degree subject to the law of the land in which it is carried out, and this question at once arises, viz.: Must a court to which application is made to enforce or to authorise the enforcement of some foreign decree, assume, in dealing with the application, that a foreign decree stands on the same footing as a decree pronounced by one of their own courts? Is a foreign judgment, as regards its effect upon the substance or the form of the right that is in question, and its enforcement, to be placed on the same footing as a judgment of a judge of this country? or on what conditions is it to be so ranked? If we assume, in the meantime, that, under certain conditions, this may and must be so, it is obvious that the question, whether the foreign judicial sentence, with which in any particular case we are concerned, is a good decision in law or not, is a question that must primarily be answered by the law of the foreign judge himself. The question, on the other hand, whether this decision is to have legal effect given to it in this country, is a question for our own law, guided no doubt by general principles of international law, which are everywhere recognised, and permeated by common international conceptions of justice.

In recent times, Wach in particular has offered a very sound opposition to the authority of the rule that the judge can only apply his own native law, and cannot apply foreign rules of procedure. It follows from what has been said, that he must not unfrequently examine the foreign law, and make application of it, whether it be that he proposes to use some step of procedure that has been taken in a foreign court as a foundation for his judgment, or that he proposes to enter on some procedure in his own court that is auxiliary to a foreign process, or to give authority for such procedure. This much, no doubt, is true, that in so far as the question is one of the conduct of a piece of procedure or of its operation, the judge's native law must be applied to regulate the procedure, and to determine the effect in this country of any procedure of a foreign court. Since the ways and means, by which some substantive right is to be pleaded in court, are quite a separable and distinct idea from that of the substantive right itself, since these ways and means are, as it is often expressed, no jus quæsitum of the parties, we cannot imagine that it should be necessary for the law of procedure to take into account the long antecedent history of the substantive right, and all the effects which a chain of different legal systems, belonging to different countries, have had upon it. The relations of parties in a suit, as such, arise for the first time within the territory belonging to the law of the court in which the suit depends, and arise under the conditions which it imposes, although incidental steps of procedure, emerging in the course of the suit, may again allow a series of foreign systems of procedure to come into operation. Accordingly, it is necessarily a matter of much less frequent occurrence, that occasion should be found for the introduction of any foreign system of procedure, than that private persons, by coming and going from one country to another, by the despatch of goods and the exchange of offers and acceptances from one country with another, should tend to impress upon their substantive legal relations the stamp of a series of legal systems belonging to different territories. It is thus true, as a matter of fact, that the rule that native law is to be applied is much more universally applicable in the law of process than in matters of substantive right. But, in so far as international law is concerned, we can recognise no other principle in matters of procedure from what we recognise in matters of substantive law. When we say that the judge, in so far as procedure is concerned, can apply none but the law of his own country, this is only true, as a matter of principle, in the same sense as it is true in questions of substantive law. The judge must yield absolute obedience to the law of his own country. But, although that law may completely exclude consideration of all other systems of law, it by no means follows that it will do so. The necessity for orderly and secure commerce, the nature of the subject that is to be dealt with, and traditional usage, are available to assist us in interpreting the law on this side, just as we can also avail ourselves of certain principles of public law, which the legal system of a State cannot transgress on pain of severing itself from the general community of public law in which all civilised States have a share.⁴

⁴ To this effect Menger, § 12, on note 4. Savigny, on the contrary, § 361; Guthrie, p. 146, errs. So, too, does Wetzell, System des ordentlichen Civilproc. § 42, note 23. These authors maintain that the judge, in all questions as to the prosecution of a right, must follow exclusively his own law. V. Bülow in Archiv. f. d. civil Prax. vol. 64 (1881), p. 151, supports the rule that suits belonging to this country must follow the process law of this country, by the consideration that "a judge who should proceed in accordance with foreign rules of procedure, would turn himself into an official of another country, and would be false to the duties he owes to his own State." But no one asserts that the judge is to apply foreign law at the bidding of a foreign power; what is asserted is that he may apply it at the bidding of his own law, not perhaps expressed, but implied from the nature of the question that is being dealt with. See in this sense Wach, ut cit. But, although I entirely assent to all the rest of Wach's criticism of the formula proposed by v. Bülow and the grounds on which he puts it, I cannot regard Wach's own formula as altogether happy. On p. 220 he says, "The native judge must apply foreign law, in so far as the question is one as to the operation to be allowed to steps of procedure that have taken place abroad, in this country." It would be sounder to say that foreign law must settle what are the requirements of steps of procedure that take place in the foreign country, but that the law of this country must determine the effect of steps of procedure taken in this country in connection with the foreign suit. Perhaps that is all that is meant. The effect to be given to legal procedure abroad upon legal procedure here is dependent on the SUBSTANTIVE RULES OF LAW IN THE SHAPE OF RULES OF PROCEDURE.

§ 390. Most authors,⁵ however, adhere to the simple rule, which in practice is approximately correct, that in the law of procedure the lex fori alone shall rule; they admit the possibility of taking foreign rules of law into account as an exceptional matter, and notice at the same time that it is not always easy to decide, whether we have to do with a rule of substantive law or merely with a rule of procedure.⁶

Many laws are only apparently rules of procedure, but, in truth, are rules of substantive law, or, at least, are so mainly. For, just as in older systems of law, legal relations are very frequently embodied in the forms of judicial procedure, so it is far from uncommon, even at the present day, to explain the legal import of particular facts by the form in which they must be presented in pleading before a court, and according to the conditions and limitations which regulate their presentation to the court. We must not deny to a law, which treats of the method of setting a legal right before the court, all influence upon the material legal relation which is to be discussed: and if, for instance, it is enacted that a certain state of facts shall not be considered as valid either to found an action or to meet it, the result, of course, is to declare that that state of facts shall not give rise to any rights, a form of expression which rests upon the consideration that it is only such facts as can be in some way pleaded in an action, that can be said to have the character of legality at all. The question does not depend upon whether the doctrine of law is on its face described as a rule of process, but rather whether its sole object is the determination and actual realisation of some legal relation which has already come into existence. It is, therefore, another part of our task to exclude from the rule above stated all enactments which only apparently regulate the law of procedure.

But in our view there is a vital distinction perceptible between the position of the court which has to decide the issue in the case, or which rules of the latter in any case; as regards the essentials of any such foreign procedure, the courts of this country may appeal to the foreign law. But even in this modified shape the proposition is not absolutely correct. On p. 222 we find the following propositions, viz.: "Foreign procedure is regulated by foreign law, by the law of the country where it takes place: our law decides whether it belongs de jure to that foreign country, and whether its result on the merits of the case is such as should be recognised." I would rather give in my adherence to these propositions, which do not, however, harmonise with Wach's former proposition already quoted. The problem, however, is not to be solved by the enunciation of such simple propositions, as the exposition in the text will show.

proposes to do so, the court in which the main process is dependent, and, on the other hand, the position of the court which is concerned merely with some subsidiary step in the procedure—however important that may be. The same step of procedure, its conditions, its competency, and its effects may be subjected, and properly subjected, to an entirely different determination, according as that determination falls to be given by the court where the principal process depends or by the auxiliary court, as we may for shortness call it. This distinction has, no doubt, already been taken as a foundation for discussion in the literature of private international law. But it has not been brought forward with the necessary distinctness, and this is the source of much conflict. I think that it is necessary to base the analysis of the whole subject of international procedure on that distinction.

II. ATTENTION TO BE PAID TO FOREIGN RULES OF LAW BY THE COURT OF THE PRINCIPAL PROCESS.

A. PRELIMINARIES (Instruction) OF A PROCESS.

CITATION OF THE PARTIES: OF OTHER PERSONS (WITNESSES, EXPERTS).

§ 391. According to what we have already said (p. 845), every step of procedure must, on principle, if it is to serve as a satisfactory basis for the judicial decision, satisfy the requirements of the law of the court in which the principal process depends. This, as we have said, suffers exception only in so far as:—

1. The law of that court itself requires some magisterial or judicial step to be taken abroad, and that necessary step cannot be validly taken, except the State within whose jurisdiction the magistrate or judicial person acts, invests his act with the attributes of magisterial judicial procedure in accordance with its own rules.

2. The law of the principal court recognises the rule "locus regit actum," or requires something to be done which will, by the law of the country in which it takes place, have obligatory effect.

Accordingly, the question whether a citation or service upon a party has been validly made, must primarily be determined by the law of the court in which the principal cause depends, independently of the fact whether the person to be cited actually is or is not in this country, or belongs as a citizen to this country or to some other. But for this rule we could not explain the effect which is conceded to public citation, by public notice or advertisement, in reference to persons who happen to be in another country: modern codes of procedure generally contain rules for the citation of persons who happen to be in a foreign country.¹

¹ See Felix, pp. 191-208; Asser-Rivier, § 73; Fiore, Eff. § 102. See an interesting judgment of the Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 30th March 1886 (J. xiv. p. 614). This holds that the citation or the service of a party by the agency of private persons, in conformity with the law of the

It is a different question whether it may not be necessary, in order to cite persons who are in another country, to use the co-operation of the foreign country and its officials. As a general question this must be answered in the affirmative, and is so answered by actually existing systems of law, although to a different extent by different systems. The person, who is to be served with a writ, must, if possible, actually receive it, and it is desirable to have credible proof that he has done so. This can only be secured by the help of officials of the foreign State,² and questions as to whether such assistance, given by the foreign officials, was really a valid official proceeding, and whether an instrument following on it truly bears the character of an "authentic" instrument, i.e. an instrument attested by magisterial or public authority, must be determined by the law of the official who actually carries out the service or citation in the foreign country, and by no other law. The same law must say into whose hands a writ should be delivered, if the party himself cannot be found at home, with a view to its being passed on to the proper party, or to what place it may be affixed (e.g. in the house occupied by the party who is to be cited), so as to have the same effect as if it had actually been given to the party. For local circumstances can alone determine whether, and under what circumstances, we may depend upon the writ actually reaching the party who is to be cited. Finally, the local law must decide whether the day on which service was attempted was a holiday.³

All other questions as to the citation of parties are, on the contrary, to be determined by the law of the court in which the principal suit depends. It must, e.g. determine whether in exceptional cases writs may be served on a holiday with full legal effect, i.e. whether the case is one for summary despatch, and also whether a party had sufficient time allowed to him to place where the principal suit is in dependence, may be treated as sufficient, and, so far as this is concerned, the rule "locus regit actum" is deprived of its character as a coercitive or compulsory enactment. Weiss (p. 946) throws out a doubt, but without giving any practical effect to it, whether we can speak of a process as instituted, or, as a consequence, of a lex fori in the sense in which it is regulative of such matters, before any citation has reached the defender. But every court, which sets itself in motion for the determination of a cause, is the court of procedure in the sense we mean, and every State rules the procedure competent in its own courts with the same sovereign authority as it possesses over things which are within its own territory. Whether the decisions given by its courts will be recognised abroad, whether in the particular case they may not, as a matter of fact, have no effect at all, is a different question, which we shall treat more in detail when we deal with the subject of jurisdiction.

² What we may describe as the one-sided fictions, which are adopted as matter of convenience, are to be absolutely rejected, and are in truth an impediment to the mutual recognition of civil judgments by different States. French law, e.g. (Code de procéd., § 69) makes use of one, when it holds service to have taken place upon a person who is abroad, by simply handing the writ to the French Attorney General (Staatsanwalt) to be disposed of as he shall think fit, see Fiore, Eff. § 103. Lomanaco, pp. 225, 226. Asser-Rivier, § 74. The German Code of Civil Procedure (§ 182) has properly shaken itself free from the example of the French law which is followed in many other quarters. This is the provision, simple and sound: "Service which requires to be made abroad is made by way of petition to the competent officers of the foreign State, or to the resident consul or ambassador of that State. In Italy there are provisions very much the same as in France. Fiore, Eff. § 104.

prepare for the conduct of his case in court. All such questions are questions connected with the relation which is constituted by the existence of a process, and the duties of parties involved in that relation. In all such matters, parties are entirely dependent on the lex fori. It may be, if the course of the lex fori were inequitable, that this might justify a refusal by the court of another country to give effect to any decision that might follow. Lastly, the questions as to what the contents of the writ which is to be served should be, must of course be determined solely on the law of the court where the principal process depends. For the question here is simply what notice must be given to the party to warrant, according to the requirements of the law of the court where the principal suit is in dependence, further procedure in the case, e.g. decree by default or in absence. Again, if the foreign country shall refuse to give its assistance, however desirable it may be that it should give it, or if citation is impossible because no one knows where the party is, we see at once how sound the proposition is, that the duties of parties are, as matter of principle, dependent on the law of the court where the suit is in dependence. For in such cases no one doubts that the law of the court has power to make valid orders, according to its own discretion, for citation by public advertisement, in so far as the suit dependent before it is concerned.⁴

Since the essential points in citation are that notice should be given to the party, and that there should be a record of notice having been given, the question may be raised, whether citation could not be effected directly through the agency of the consuls or of the diplomatic representatives of the State in which the suit is in dependence. General principles of public law, however, compel us to answer this question in the negative—unless such powers are committed to the consul or ambassador by treaty—and the same answer must be given even where the service is to be made upon a person who is a subject of the country to which the court belongs.⁵ By custom a certificate of citation has come to be regarded, not merely as a document recording a fact, but as a magisterial act. It may, at least, very easily become a magisterial act, in so far as it is not in all cases completed by a voluntary delivery and acceptance of the writ, but involves a commission to third parties to hand the writ to the person to whom it is addressed, or the affixing of it to the house of the party cited, etc. The result is that, without the authority of the State in which it is to take place, it cannot be effected, even upon subjects of the State which the consul or the ambassador represents. The only exception is in the case of such subjects as enjoy the privileges of extra-territoriality, for they are subject to the jurisdiction of their own country, and not to that of the country in which they happen to

⁴ See German Civilprozessordnung, § 186: "If it is not known where a party is, citation may be made by public advertisement. This public citation is lawful also in cases in which it is impossible to carry out the conditions that are necessary for personal citation in a foreign country, or in which there is no prospect of effecting it under these conditions."

be.⁶ In the same way, of course, consuls and envoys of European powers can cite persons who are subjects of the State which they represent, or are under its protection, within territories in which, as in heathen countries,⁷ they enjoy by treaty or by custom a kind of general extra-territoriality (although it differs in many respects from true extra-territoriality).⁸

But the citation of persons who are not parties to the process is quite another matter. Their obligations, in particular the obligations of witnesses and of experts, is entirely independent of the law of the country in which the court is situated. It is one of the general obligations of citizenship, or, more correctly, an obligation laid upon them by the system of public order under which they themselves live. The citation of a witness or of an expert is therefore, both as regards its form and its import, to be tested by the law of the place where it takes place, and by no other law. A citation of a party must, no doubt, be treated in the same way, in so far as the result of non-appearance in obedience to it is fine or imprisonment, and not merely some disadvantage in the depending process.⁹ For the obligation of the parties as such created by the citation, to submit to the law of the court where the suit is in dependence, is based upon the power of that law to regulate and dispose of the suit itself.

REQUIREMENTS OF STEPS OF PROCEDURE CONNECTED WITH PROOF.

§ 392. The court in which a suit depends, in dealing with steps of procedure connected with the leading of evidence which are taken by a foreign judge in a foreign country at the request of the court itself, or on the motion of the parties, must apply the same principles, and the further principle (see supra, pp. 847, 848), that the obligatory effect of such proceedings must, from considerations of public law, be tested by the law of the place where it is done.¹⁰

⁶ Wetzell, Civilproc. note 22, § 33, is of a different opinion, appealing to older writers (in particular Gaill, Observ. i. 56, and Mevius, Decis. vii. §§ 390, 391), in so far as the addressee voluntarily accepts the citation. This theory may be accepted under this limitation, just as in earlier days it was not uncommon to serve citations by means of notaries, who have no magisterial powers. Modern usage is, however, as I think, against this.

⁷ See the detailed exposition in v. Bulmerincq, § 78.

¹⁰ Asser, § 85, followed by Smits in his dissertation on International Bewijsrecht (p. 48),

The requirements of official documents or records drawn up in connection with the leading of proof must be tested by the law of the judge who draws up the document or records the proof, and not by the law of the judge before whom the suit depends. Of course, it may well be that the law of the court in which the suit depends, if its rules for the conduct of proof within its own territory are different from those of its neighbours, should require more in the way of external formalities in the record of the proof, or on the contrary content itself with less in the way of formality; and it may have the proof taken by commissioners of its own (who will, however, in that case only enjoy the rights of private persons in the foreign territory), unless, indeed, the foreign State should forbid such a course, or unless the taking of proof by a private person is an offence against some criminal statute, which is in force within that foreign territory.^{11 12} But it is by no means logical to use the law of the court in which the suit depends to test documents, or reports, or records, drawn up by foreign officials, as "authentic" records of the proceedings, to use the French expression.¹³ Such a view of the matter means that we hold the whole judicial organisation of the foreign State to be one on which we cannot safely rely, or that we regard the procedure of the foreign court as entirely irreconcilable with that of raises the question whether the judge, if he is not expressly allowed by his own law to make a requisition on a foreign court, can appeal to a foreign court for its assistance in enquiries into fact, or on any other point. Asser says that he cannot. In our view it depends on the principles upon which legal procedure, in the court to which the judge belongs, is administered. If, for instance, that court carries the principle of the necessity of oral depositions to the utmost extent, however absurd it may be to do so, or if, like the law of England, it has some substitute for a requisition, then we may agree with Asser. But if neither of these alternatives is present, then Asser's theory is simply a denial of justice to the party who wishes to adduce proof, and could not even be justified by a thorough distrust of foreign courts. For the proof taken abroad will always be subject to be weighed and considered by the judge to whom the suit belongs. As far as I know, the courts on the continent of Europe have always given themselves the very natural indulgence of asking foreign courts for their assistance, in cases in which they had any expectation of its being accorded to them.

¹¹ The practice of England and of the United States up to a recent date was to take this latter course. Commissions were given to private persons, in general persons learned in the law, to hear witnesses, etc. (see Wharton, § 723; Fœlix, i. § 240; Phillimore, §§ 882 et seq.) But now, since the statutes i. Will. IV. c. 22, and 3 and 4 Vict. c. 105, permit English courts to address requisitions to foreign courts for assistance, it seems that this method has been more commonly adopted. In the province of Hannover, e.g. a commission conducted by a private person could never examine on oath, for private oaths are not allowed there.

¹² It would be possible, too, for evidence to be taken in a foreign country by the consuls of the States to which the court belongs. In such cases, of course, the consul will proceed according to the legal rules of the State which he represents, and consular examinations of this kind may be taken at the request of other States, if the witness belongs to the nation represented by the consul. The consular laws of the State which the consul represents will rule this question (see, as regards Italy, Fiore, Eff. § 227). But, for the exercise of any compulsiator, the consuls must appeal to the officials of the State in which they reside (except in the East, where the so-called capitulations are in force). See Fiore, § 228, and the correspondence between the German foreign office (v. Bülow) and the ambassador of the United States (Fish), in the year 1874, in Beach-Lawrence, iv. p. 99.

¹³ What is recognised as correct and formal in the country in which the record is drawn up must be so recognised everywhere. Phillimore, § 913. The decision of an English court quoted in § 914 [Savage v. Hutchison, 1855, 24, L.J.N.S. (Ch.) p. 332] applied this rule to our own courts. If that be so, we should rather seek assistance from an extended consular jurisdiction, or from private commissions such as those that are issued by the courts of England and the United States.¹⁴

NOTE RR ON §§ 391, 392. COMMISSIONS AND CITATIONS OF WITNESSES, ETC., IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

[By the rules of the Supreme Court of Justice in England drawn up in 1883 (xxxvii. ii. Examination of Witnesses, R. 5), it is provided that the court or a judge may in any cause or matter, where it shall appear necessary for the purposes of justice, make any order for the examination upon oath before the court or judge, or any officer of the court or any other person, and at any place, of any witness or person, etc.

This rule seems merely to be declaratory of the existing law. The English courts had, before this date, been in the habit of issuing commissions to individuals for the examination of witnesses abroad, and had not unfrequently nominated as commissioners the judges of foreign courts, not as judges, but as individuals. Where, however, such a commission had been issued to judges as individuals, and these judges (Hungarians) refused to execute such a commission, it was reissued to the court of which they were members. (Fisher v. Sztary, 1858, 31, L. T. p. 130.) The existence of the alternative practice of issuing commissions, either to the judges as individuals or to the court of which they are members, is proved by the case of Clay v. Stephenson (1837, 7, A. and E. 185), and it is indicated that the more general practice was that commissions should issue to individuals.

No commission, however, will be issued where it appears that the witness, in order to the thorough testing of his evidence, should be cross-examined with much minuteness, and the foreign rules of procedure do not admit of any such cross-examination (Crofton v. Crofton, 1882, L. R. 20, Ch. D. 760).

As may be inferred from this judgment, a court employed by a foreign court to collect evidence for it, must follow its own rules of procedure, although there is no reason to suppose that a foreign court would refuse to accede to any reasonable request made to it as to the method of executing the commission, such suggestion not being expressly forbidden by its own legislation, or contrary to its public policy. It is the practice corrections which a foreign notary had made, in a document drawn up by him, without specially authenticating them. The rule must also apply to certified copies prepared in the country in which the original documents were drawn up (cf. Brocher, ii. § 177), but only in so far as these copies take the place of the originals, without further enquiry into surrounding circumstances. See 14 and 15 Vict. c. 99, § 7, and Phillimore, §§ 507 and 923. What has been said is specially true of extracts from land registers. Officials and notaries in many countries do not give the parties the original documents, but merely certified copies, and preserve the originals in their records. See Fœlix, ii. § 305.

¹⁴ If then, for instance, the law of the court where the process depends requires that the person whose examination is recorded should sign the record of it, a record must be accepted as sufficient even without this signature, if the law of the judge who takes the deposition does not require a signature.

in Scotland, for instance, where the aid of a foreign court is invoked to assist the Court of Session in taking evidence, that interrogatories and cross-interrogatories should be adjusted in Scotland and transmitted to the foreign court for its guidance.

But a private commissioner must substantially follow the instructions he receives in the instrument appointing him, although the court will not be critical to find out objections to his conduct (Taylor on Evidence, § 513). If a commissioner—an individual or a foreign court—admits or rejects evidence contrary to the rules of the Court from which the commission issued, the result may be that the whole commission will be suppressed (Taylor, § 512). Considerations of public policy, however, e.g. the competency of examining the husband and wife of a party, may well be determined by the commissioner in accordance with his own law (see p. 865).

In the case of Clay v. Stephenson, cited above, the court applied this rule even to the conduct of a foreign court appointed to act as commissioners, and refused to accept certified copies of the evidence in place of the original, although these copies were authenticated by the officials of the court. This decision may, perhaps, be explained by the fact that the commission in that case was intended to have been issued, not to the court, but to the individual judges composing it. Otherwise the decision seems to involve a denial of justice to the party who had asked for the commission.

The law in Scotland is the same as the common law of England. The court will not grant diligence for recovery of documents, registers, etc., in the custody of a foreign court. It will, in the case of such documents being required, grant commission to examine the custodiers as witnesses to speak to the entries in these documents and registers (Maitland v. Maitland, 1885, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xii. p. 899). In the same way the Scots Court will only allow registers under its care to be taken out of Scotland in exceptional circumstances, even although they may be called for to be exhibited to an English Court. In any case, they would be sent under the care of a Scottish officer, whose duty it would be to exhibit them merely. He could not allow them to be taken out of his sight on any account whatever.

By the statute 19 and 20 Vict. c. 113, provision is made for taking the examination of witnesses in this country, i.e. Great Britain and Ireland, or any of Her Majesty's colonies or possessions, with reference to suits on commercial matters depending before foreign courts. Application is to be made to the supreme court of the country where the evidence is desired to be taken, accompanied by a certificate from the ambassador or diplomatic agent of the foreign power, whose courts desire the evidence. The court to which application is made may give directions as to "the time, place, and manner of such examination, and all other matters connected therewith as may appear reasonable and just." Oaths or affirmations, where affirmation is lawful in place of oath, may be administered, and a witness shall be protected against incriminatory questions on the production of documents secundum legem actus, i.e. the law of the country where the evidence is taken. This statute is, in Scotland, generally worked by the appointment of commissioners, who act according to their own law.

Commissions in jury trials in Scotland are regulated by Act of Sederunt, 16th February 1841, § 17.

There is a series of statutes for facilitating the obtaining evidence, either oral or written, in the courts of the United Kingdom, in cases in which the witnesses or documents are either within the jurisdiction of some one of the supreme courts of the United Kingdom other than that in which the action is pending, or within the jurisdiction of a supreme court in some other part of Her Majesty's dominions.

The first of these statutes is 6 and 7 Vict. c. 82. § 5 of this statute says that if any person, who has been served with written notice to appear before a commissioner appointed by the courts of England, Ireland, or Scotland, to execute a commission in a part of the realm other than that under the jurisdiction of the court granting the commission, shall refuse or fail to appear, it shall be competent to apply to any of the superior courts in that part of the realm in which the commission is to be executed, for a warrant to compel the attendance of such person before the commissioner, or the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in the order compelling attendance. There are provisions for penalties and for payment of expenses.

Under this statute it has been held in England (Burchard v. Macfarlane, L.R. (1891) 2, Q.B. 241) that the courts there will apply their own rules in granting or refusing to interpose their authority to further the execution of a commission in England, and will not make an order for discovery of documents against a person who is not a party to the cause, although the Scots court has granted a commission for recovery of these documents, the ground of judgment being that English practice allows no such order.

By the statute 17 and 18 Vict. c. 34, powers are given to the supreme courts of the United Kingdom to assist each other in compelling the attendance of witnesses who may be beyond the jurisdiction of the court before which the action is pending, but within the jurisdiction of one of the courts of another part of the United Kingdom.

The statute 22 and 23 Vict. c. 20, makes provision for obtaining evidence in the United Kingdom, and recovering documents there, upon an application from any competent tribunal in Her Majesty's dominions, and the statute 48 and 49 Vict. c. 74, makes similar provision for collecting evidence and recovering documents in India.]

FORM OF OATH.

§ 393. Much doubt may arise as to the form in which witnesses and experts are to be sworn, and special difficulties may occur in the deposition of a party upon oath. Since the oath is a pledge of the trustworthiness of the deposition, or of the averments made by the party, as the case may be, and as the trustworthiness of a deposition or of an averment must certainly be tested by the law of the court in which the process depends, it seems as if this law must regulate questions as to oaths. But, in so far as it is thought essential that the witness or party should, in the event of his giving false evidence, be criminally responsible, the law of the place where the oath is emitted must be held to be the only possible rule, for the conditions of criminal responsibility are determined by the law of the place where the criminal act is done.¹⁵ But we reach the same result if we consider the matter in the light of the solemn moral duty which the witness or party owes to the judge. It is natural that this duty should be discharged in the form known to the law of the place where it is discharged. No doubt the law of the court may require some further forms, or forms altogether different; for it decides with absolute authority, if it desires to do so, the question whether proof which has been led satisfies its requirements. But, if it required a form which could not be reconciled with the requirements of the place where the oath was emitted, it would deprive itself of all the guarantees with which criminal, and, as a rule, moral responsibility also, invest the proof. It is only by regarding the oath in the strictest sense as a proceeding of a religious character, or one belonging to some particular form of faith, that we can reach the conclusion that an assertion solemnly deposed to in a foreign country and involving criminal responsibility by its law, recognised too as an oath by that law, should not be recognised everywhere as an oath, because it was emitted without reference to religion or to some particular creed. But no such narrow standpoint of religion or creed can be assumed to exist, and in any case it is of no practical importance, since, as we shall show more fully below, the court on which the demand is made can very easily refuse to invest the emission of an oath with forms for which its own law makes no provision. The prevailing theory must then be that the oath must be regarded by the court where the suit depends as validly emitted, if it is sworn in the form recognised by the place where it is given.¹⁶

[Affidavits such as are required by the Scots Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 79, § 23), may be taken by creditors who are furth of Great Britain and Ireland before "a magistrate or justice of the peace or other person qualified to administer oaths in the country where he resides," his qualification being attested by a British minister or consul, or by a notary public. Affidavits generally may be taken before British consuls abroad. 6 Geo. IV. c. 87.]

PROBATIVE FORCE OF EVIDENCE ADDUCED. COMPETENCY OF EVIDENCE IN GENERAL.

§ 394. It is obvious that the weight to be attached to the depositions of witnesses and of experts is to be estimated by the law of the court and

Sup. Ct. of App. Dresden, 1st October 1858 (Seuff. xiii. No. 66): "The antagonist of the not by the law of the place where the evidence is given.¹⁷ (See supra, p. 846.)

But, in not a few cases, the question as to the weight of evidence depends upon the question of form. E.g. the law of the court which is appealed to to take the evidence requires witnesses to be examined in private without the parties being present, while the law of the court where the principal suit depends requires exactly the reverse, viz. that the examination of witnesses shall take place in public, and that the parties shall have an opportunity of being present; or the law of this latter court requires certain general questions to be put as a preliminary to the witness, while the law of the place where the witness is examined knows nothing of such questions. Of course, there is often an opportunity of meeting the difficulty by a request, addressed by the court which desires the evidence or by the party to the foreign judge, that he will, besides observing the forms prescribed by the law of the place where the examination is being taken, also observe the form in question, prescribed by the lex fori.¹⁸ Not even the most pedantic of lawyers could maintain that the court which desires assistance may not make this request.¹⁹ But, if the foreign court does not accede to the request,²⁰ or, if the two forms are irreconcilable, the court where the process depends has full discretion to say to what extent the juraturus must recognise the form of the oath in use in the foreign State, although it is different from the form in use here, if it rests on the law and the religious convictions of that foreign country, and if the emission of an oath has in that foreign country the same religious, moral, and political import."

A resolution of the Institute of International Law in 1877, as to civil procedure, runs thus (Ann. ii. pp. 45, 49): "Le tribunal qui procède à un acte judiciaire en vertu d'une commission rogatoire applique les lois de son pays en ce qui concerne les formes du procès y compris les formes des preuves et du serment."

Sup. Ct. of Jena, 10th May 1850 (Seuff. xii. No. 319), is to a different effect. Judgments of the Old App. Ct. at Cassel, on 22nd December 1841 and 28th September 1853 (Heuser, Ann. iv. pp. 235, 236), lay down that the form of an oath, which a foreign court has asked one of the courts of this country to take, must be regulated by the law of this country to this extent at least, that the invocation of God, required by this law, must not be omitted. The question arose with reference to the French form, "Je le jure."

²⁰ The judgment of the court at Lübeck, cited in the last note, very truly says: "The party who is pursuer or defender in the court where the action depends, must not make it impossible, by his studied refusal to concur, for the auxiliary court to observe the forms of the other court." The party, as such, if he desires to win his case, is always bound to follow the lex fori as closely as possible. See in this sense Renaud, § 9, note 17.

weight of the evidence is affected by what its law regards as defects.²¹ It cannot be said, as it would be said in the case of a proof all taken in the same country, that such evidence may not be looked at. Such strictness is only justifiable in cases in which it may serve to compel the observance of certain forms. But just as little can we be forced to accept as good evidence depositions of witnesses taken abroad, which are destitute of all the safeguards which our legal theories require to make the trustworthiness of the witness manifest.

The right of being timeously informed of a diet for proof, and the right of being present at that diet as a party, is, as a right of a party to the action, to be tested by the law of the place where the principal suit depends, and not by the law of the place where the proof is taken.^{22 23}

The question of the admissibility of some particular evidence is simply a subordinate part of the question as to its effect as evidence. Certain kinds of evidence are rejected, where by anticipation they are regarded as untrustworthy and misleading; and it may quite well be that the law of the court should leave this point for the judgment of the opposite party, conferring on them the right, e.g. of objecting to particular witnesses, or of rejecting their evidence. Thus the law of the place where the evidence is taken has nothing to say on this subject. It may, however, refuse to allow certain witnesses to be sworn for fear of perjury, and any such consideration entertained by his own public law, would, of course, be binding upon the judge to whom application is made to take evidence.

INCOMPETENCY OF CERTAIN EVIDENCE IN PARTICULAR CASES.

§ 395. But the difficult question on this point, which often arises, is not whether we are to select the law of the court in which the suit is dependent or that of the place where the proof is taken: the question frequently is whether the law of the place where a contract was made is not to have precedence over both. There can of course be no doubt that,

²¹ See the instructive judgment of the court at Lübeck already referred to, and Fiore, Eff. § 231.

²² See Trib. at Antwerp, 29th Aug. 1873 (J. ii. p. 215); C. of Turin, 19th Sept. 1872 (Rev. vii. p. 198). Clunet approves of the former decision.

²³ We may see, from what is said in the text how incorrect the provision of the German Civilprozessordn. § 334, is, although the commentary by Struckmann and Koch curtly asserts that it is in conformity with general legal principles as to the recognition of procedure law. The paragraph was originally copied from the Hannoverian Code of Procedure of 1850, § 231, into that of Würtemberg of 1868, § 439, and then into that of Bavaria of 1869, § 335. It runs thus: "If evidence taken by a foreign official is conform to the law recognised in the court where the suit depends, no objection can be taken to it by reason of its defects according to the foreign law." This would make it, e.g. incumbent on a German judge to treat as valid an oath, which was taken abroad in the form prescribed by the German Civilprozessordn. and was absolutely null by the foreign law, imposing not an iota of criminal responsibility on the party who emitted it. The same would hold good, under the like circumstances, of a document drawn or attested by a judge who, by the law of the place where it was drawn or attested, was absolutely incompetent.

The Imperial Court (i.) on 8th May 1880 (Dec. ii. No. 100), in connection with the case of an oath taken before a foreign notary, laid down the sound proposition, that it was

if the law of the court in which the process depends holds certain evidence to be incompetent under all circumstances, this rule must so far be unconditionally applied.²⁴ The rule which formerly prevailed,²⁵ and which still exists in the law of England and in that of the United States, was simply that the lex fori must govern generally all questions as to the competency of evidence. But questions of that kind²⁶ are not the questions which most commonly arise. The point which most commonly arises for determination is in cases in which the kind of evidence in question is admissible as a general rule by both systems of law, but is by one of them excluded in exceptional circumstances, e.g. in disputes as to subjects of great value. The law of France²⁷ accordingly regards the lex contractus, sufficient to observe the foreign form. There is a peculiar view advanced by the commentators on § 334, that this proposition may be drawn from its provisions per argumentum e contrario, although the simple truth seems to be that this paragraph sanctions the exclusive application of the law of the court in which the suit depends. Still more remarkable, however, is the appeal which is made, on the suggestion no doubt of the introduction to the German processord. to § 85 (2) of the German statute on bills (Wechselordnung), in my opinion a very sound enactment. This § 85 deals with an endorsement put upon a foreign bill in this country. If it were intended to regulate a similar case in the law of procedure, we should have to provide: "Proof taken in this country is not invalidated by the fact that we find upon the paper which contains the report of it, that there is recorded a foreign proof, which is invalid by the foreign law."

Least of all, however, can we assent to the final proposition maintained by Struckmann and Koch, that proof taken in a form which is not in consonance either with the law of the court in which the suit depends or with the law of the place where it is taken, may yet be regarded as satisfactory on the principle that the court is unfettered in its estimate of evidence (Civilprocessordn. § 259): the judge cannot apply his mind to evidence that is taken in improper form.

or, to put it more generally and more correctly, the law to which the substantive legal relation in question is itself subject, as regulative of this question. If we qualify this proposition by saying that the evidence must be admissible by the lex fori in abstracto, we may safely admit²⁸ that the rule of the French law is right.²⁹

The meaning of such a rule of law is this: a legal transaction of the kind in question which is not established by the necessary documents, or by the witnesses required, shall not be capable of being founded on in an action, or urged as a plea in defence in any other way than by being admitted by the opposite party, or unless there shall be a fiction of such admission under certain conditions.³⁰ The incomplete invalidity of the transaction is in some measure of the same character, as a transaction which will not found an action, but with regard to which no claim for repetition will lie, if in spite of the defective form both parties have acted upon it. It differs, however, from such a case in this respect, that while a transaction which cannot competently found an action may be pleaded in defence, on the other hand, even if such a transaction be admitted by the opposite party, it never can have the effect of carrying with it a judgment in favour of the pursuers.

de Cass. 24th Aug. 1880 (J. vii. p. 480; Böhm, Rechtshülfeverh. § 19, note 5. But as regards the law of Italy, see Esperson (J. xi. p. 176), and as regards obligations, the express provision of the Codice Civ. Italiano, § 10 (2); "I mezzi di prova delle obbligazioni sono determinati dalle leggi del luogo in cui l'atto fu fatto." To the same effect the law of Spain (Torres Campos, p. 281). See, too, art. 131 of the Spanish-American Treaty of 1878 (Zeitschr. f. d. ges. Handelsr. vol. xxv. p. 550).

²⁸ Smits' dissertation on International bewijsrecht (p. 4) proceeds generally on the principle that evidence, apart from the question of the form in which it is taken, is an annexum of the substantive legal relation.

"(3.) L'admissibilité des moyens de preuve (preuve littérale, testimoniale, serment, livres de commerce, etc.) et leur force probante seront déterminées par la loi du lieu où s'est passé le fait ou l'acte, qu'il s'agit de prouver.

"La même règle sera appliquée à la capacité des témoins, sauf les exceptions que les Etats contractants jugeraient convenable de sanctionner dans les traités."

The last paragraph is meaningless: it fobs off the difficulty which it should have settled, on to possible treaties. Asser had proposed to enact "sauf les exceptions que les états contractants jugeraient nécessaire de sanctionner dans l'intérêt de l'ordre public." This clause missed the point also. With the principle of ordre public, in this subject as in others, one can prove very little or as much as is desired. The Institute had forgotten that a distinction was to be drawn between incompetency in abstracto and incompetency in a particular subject.

V. Bulmerincq (p. 231), who was not in accord with the resolution of the Institute, proposes to test the admissibility of evidence by the lex fori, but the effect of it by the lex loci actus. It seems to me that such a distinction cannot be accepted literally; but perhaps he indicates the same distinction as I have taken in the text.

³⁰ If, in spite of the omission of the form, a reference to oath is admissible, as by the provisions of the Code Civil, arts. 1341 and 1358, the defender, if he refuses to take the oath, is bound by the judgment, because of a fiction that he has admitted the debt; if he refers it, he is also bound, because he has admitted it, subject to the oath of the pursuer. To a different effect, too, judgments of the Supreme Court at Stuttgart, 25th Sept. 1858, and 11th June 1833 (Seuffert, xiii. pp. 257, 258).

It is plain that in such a case the question is not one as to the weight of evidence in the true sense—i.e. as to whether the judge is persuaded of the truth of the alleged facts by the materials laid before him—but is rather one as to the form of the transaction and the consequences that attach to the neglect of that form. This is obvious from the fact that failing an admission by the defender, the pursuer must lose his action, even although far stronger evidence than that which is required should be tendered—e.g. instead of a private document, ten witnesses who with one voice speak to the agreement of the parties.³¹

To decide according to the lex loci actus is the only way to meet the justifiable expectations of the parties, the bona fides of their transaction. If in country A certain legal transactions cannot be proved by witnesses, every one is entitled to expect that no obligations, or at least no obligations beyond a certain amount, will be laid upon him by means of vague testimony, which may have been entirely misappreciated by the judge. If, on the contrary, country B admits proof by witnesses in all questions, then every contracting party may rely upon it that one who has once given his word, no matter in what shape, is bound by it.³² Even the question whether a party has the right of challenging a witness is in such cases, on a sound view of the law, to be determined not by the lex fori, but by the law which governs the substance of the legal relation in question.³³ [The rule of English and Scottish law is very distinct, that all questions of the admissibility of evidence must be determined by the lex fori. "The law of evidence is the lex fori, which governs the court. Whether a witness is competent or not, whether a certain matter requires to be proved by writing or not, whether certain evidence proves a certain fact or not, that is to be determined by the law of the country where the question arises, where the remedy is sought to be enforced, and where the court sits to enforce it," per Lord Brougham in Bain v. Whitehaven and Furness Junction Railway Co. 1850, 3, H. of L. Ca. p. 19.

³¹ The provisions of the Code Civil in reference to this subject seem to me to be quite distinct; for by art. 1348, 4, if the transaction is once embodied in a proper documentary form, but the document is lost by accident, proof in the ordinary form may be adduced. Burge concedes that as an exception the lex loci contractus should determine whether written evidence is necessary, and Story, § 636, proposes that testaments should be proved according to the lex loci actus, a theory which is explained by the fact that the English law speaks of the proving of a testament, and not of its forms, even when it is dealing with the regulations as to the latter. (This is consistent with the peculiar procedure in ecclesiastical courts as to dispositions mortis causa. Cf. Felix, i. p. 445, note 3.)

³² So again the lex loci actus, and not the lex fori, must determine how far it is competent to contradict, by proof of the intention of parties, any legal relation embodied in a formal writing. Proof which is so appropriately named by Bentham "pre-arranged" proof, rests in a certain sense on the will of the parties, or at least upon some law which takes account of what parties generally desire. See Brocher, N. Traité, § 112 (p. 283); Esperson (J. xi. pp. 251, 252); Fiore, Effetti, § 180. Menger, p. 154; Hellmann, Lehrbuch, p. 31; Böhm, Rechtshülfeverf. p. 149, take a different view. Lammasch, p. 370, attempts a middle course, and seems to expect that controversies on this head will be got rid of by treaties.

³³ Smits, Bewijsrecht, p. 26.

If a commissioner wrongly admits or wrongly rejects evidence, i.e. does so contrary to the law of the court from which the commission issued, the result may be that the whole deposition will be suppressed. Taylor on Evidence, § 512. This would hold true of commissions issued to foreign courts as well as to individuals, but the rule must be very sparingly enforced. Otherwise grave injustice might be done, for how is the foreign commissioner to know our rules of evidence ?]

PROOF OF STATUS.

§ 396. Similar considerations must regulate the proof of questions as to family relationships; it is in such cases that it is specially true to say that questions of proof are not unfrequently really questions as to the existence of the substantive fact;³⁴ we must dispose on the same principles of any question as to the effect in evidence of "possession d'état,"³⁵ and in considering the weight to be given to documents connected with civil status, we must start from this point of view, viz. that every civilised State, if it allows such matters, occurring within its own dominions, to be recorded at all, will take care to have them recorded in such a way as that they may deserve to be relied upon, and that records of this kind ought to be recognised as valid evidence all the world over,³⁶ if their genuineness be once established. Parties will in very many cases be unable to provide themselves with any other evidence.

PUBLIC RECORDS AND DOCUMENTS. AUTHENTICATION. WITNESSES.

§ 397. As a general rule, we must admit official documents drawn up in some other civilised country³⁷ as good evidence. Nor can we make any distinction if such a document contains something which is beyond the sphere of the direct observation of the senses of the attesting official. We must assume that he has sufficient means at his command, in respect of his local experience, to satisfy himself of the truth.

See Wharton on extracts from church records as evidence, §§ 759 et seq. Pradier-Fodéré, J. vi. p. 269. Corrections, too, of entries in such book, made by order of officials charged with the superintendence of them, must bear faith in a foreign country upon the principles stated in the text. We have nothing to do here with the principles which regulate the recognition or non-recognition of judgments in actual litigations. The certified copy issued by the official or the notary himself, who drew up the original, makes faith in any foreign country in accordance with the lex loci actus. C. Palermo, 25th March 1887 (J. xiv. p. 757). ³⁷ Smits (p. 45) proposes to test the value of a ship's log as evidence by the law of the flag, and the value of an average report by the law of the place where it was drawn up.

This Publica Fides,³⁸ attached by the courts of all countries to documents issued by officials within the limits of their own jurisdiction, rests upon an universal law of custom, without which there could scarcely be any regular intercourse among the inhabitants of different States. We assume that every civilised State will take care that its officers do not give any false testimony as to documents executed by them or in their presence. This doctrine of law cannot, however, be referred to the rule "locus regit actum:" the notion of the headship of the emperor, and the derivation of all jurisdiction from him entertained in the Middle Ages, has contributed to it, and so, too, and in a substantial degree, has the general custom of putting officials on oath.³⁹ Every circumstance tends to show that the rule "locus regit actum" has more probably, on the other hand, arisen from the general recognition of the doctrine of Publica Fides.⁴⁰

Before any Publica Fides can be given, of course the authenticity of the deed must be proved. Since the seal and subscription of the public officials are not sufficiently well known beyond the limits of their own country, this is effected by legalising the document by affixing the great seal of the sovereign⁴¹ from whose officials the document proceeds, or by an attestation of its genuineness from the ambassador or consul of the State in which it is to be used;⁴² the latter is the ordinary rule of procedure. But in cases of necessity there are other ways in which evidence may be led—e.g. by witnesses⁴³—and in adjoining States no particular proof of authenticity is required.

The proper position seems to be to commit the question, whether any special authentication is necessary, to the discretion of the judge.⁴⁴ The See Fœlix, i. pp. 434, 435. Püttlingen, as cited.

⁴³ Story, §§ 639-641.

⁴⁴ See judgment of the Sup. Ct. at Berlin 23rd Oct. 1855 (Striethorst, Jahrg. 1856). The instructions given by the ministers of justice and of foreign affairs, on 22nd March 1833, rest on this principle. Renaud, Wechselrecht, § 7, note 18. In England, no special authentication of documents from foreign admiralty courts is required. They are held to be courts of the law of nations, and their records obtain faith everywhere. But since these courts derive their authority from some particular Government, the true reason probably is that documents and records of this kind are often produced before admiralty courts in England, and therefore the seal and subscriptions are so well known, that to prove them would be a useless formality, and one that would impede commerce.

The German Civilprocessordn. § 403, provides: "The court must determine, on the circumstances of each particular case, whether a document, which bears to have been drawn up by a foreign official, or by some person belonging to a foreign country who is invested with publica fides, must be accepted de plano as genuine. Authentication by a consul or an ambassador of the Empire will be sufficient to prove its genuineness."

circumstances and extent of the intercourse which the two States enjoy with each other must determine the question. Besides, there exist conventions between many States dealing with the point as to how far any authentication is necessary.^{45 46}

The qualifications of documentary witnesses, and their number, are to be determined by the lex loci actus; unless, besides the form which that law requires, it may be competent or imperative to observe at the same time the form which is prescribed by some other system of law under which the legal transaction falls. The question here is a question as to the form of an instrument, or the requirements of a document as a probative instrument; but it is the law of the court where the process depends that must decide as to the credibility and competency of other witnesses.⁴⁷

By the principle of the equality of foreigners and natives in the eye of the law we find that, in so far as the contrary is not expressly enacted, the former are as capable as the latter of being documentary witnesses.⁴⁸ (The provisions of the Roman law to a different effect, by which none but a Civis Romanus can be a documentary witness, rest upon the inequality of Romans and strangers in the eye of the law at that time.) Besides, any other view would be highly unpractical. One might easily be mistaken as to whether a particular person was a citizen of the country, and thus lawsuits might arise as to the validity of a document—if citizenship were necessary for the witnesses—which might often be prejudicial to the citizens of that country, which proceeded on any such selfish and narrow view. French practice attempts to meet this danger, but in doing so falls into illogical procedure, and is in the habit of recognising “putative” nationality as sufficient.⁴⁹

NOTE SS ON § 397. FOREIGN JUDGMENTS AND REGISTERS.

[The general rule in England and Scotland is that foreign judgments authenticated according to the law of the country from which they proceed will be received in evidence (Phillimore, §§ 913, 914, and Savage v. Hutchison, 1855, 24 L. T. N. S. (Ch.), p. 332; Dickson on Evidence, § 1319). That they are so authenticated must, unless they are documents proceeding from ⁴⁵ As regards Austria, see Vesque v. Püttlingen, § 120.

⁴⁹ Cf. Dubois, Rev. viii. pp. 492, 493, and Laurent, iii. § 353.

some foreign court with the forms of which our judges are familiar, be proved e.g. by the certificate of a notary or by the British Consul at the foreign place (Disbrow v. Mackintosh, 1852, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xv. p. 123). A similar judgment was pronounced in the House of Lords so long ago as 1771 (Sinclair v. Fraser, 2 Pat. App. 253).

By the statute 14 and 15 Vict. c. 99, § 7 (Lord Brougham's Act), which, however, applies to England alone, copies of proclamations, treaties, Acts of State in foreign States and colonies, and judgments of proceedings in and documents deposited in foreign or in colonial courts, may be proved in English courts by examined copies or by copies certified, (1) in the case of proclamations, treaties, or Acts of State, by the seal of the foreign State, (2) in the case of the judgments or proceedings of foreign courts, or of documents deposited there, by the seal of the foreign court or by the signature of the foreign judge.

By the Extradition Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 52), §§ 14 and 15, foreign warrants, depositions, and convictions, shall be deemed to be duly authenticated if they purport to be signed by a judge, magistrate, or officer of the foreign State, or are certified to be true copies by such judge, magistrate, or officer, and if they are authenticated by the oath of some witness, or by the official seal of the minister of justice, or of some other minister of State.

Extracts from foreign registers are admitted if authenticated according to the law of the country of the register by an official person (Phillimore, § 913; Wharton, §§ 760 and 763; Dickson on Evidence, § 1321). Again, if the court is not familiar with the method of authentication employed, it will have to be proved to its satisfaction that the proper formal method had been followed. The court will not grant a diligence for the recovery of foreign registers or public documents in public custody in a foreign country. It will, however, grant a commission to examine the custodian, who will depone to the entries in his books as correct (Maitland, 1885, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xii. p. 899). A certificate by a notary public, as a person holding a munus publicum known to public law, would probably be accepted as a sufficient guarantee of the correctness of extracts from documents in public custody in a foreign country, or from a foreign registry.

VALUE OF BUSINESS BOOKS AS EVIDENCE.

§ 398. The lex fori, as a general rule, will determine the value of business books⁵⁰ as evidence.⁵¹ If, however, the law under which the contract

⁵¹ Judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 3rd May 1845 (Decisions, ii. p. 375); Judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Darmstadt, 13th May 1856 (Seuffert, xi. 303). [Extracts from business books made and authenticated according to the law of the place where the extract is made will make faith in Russia (*Claile v. which these books are adduced to prove stands, gives them greater weight in evidence, the parties must allow the courts of a foreign country to give them the same weight; and if there is no common law for the contract (e.g. when it is concluded by letter), the law of the domicile of the pursuer or defender, according as this or that may be the more favourable to the defender, takes the place of the lex loci contractus. According to the opinions of several writers and the judgments of several courts, the lex fori alone determines the weight of business books as evidence;⁵² in the view of others, the lex loci contractus will settle it.⁵³ I believe that, by the intermediate view taken above, I have made it possible to solve the controversy.

We have already discussed the exceptio non numeratæ pecuniæ, the effect of which in international law must also be determined according to the principles of evidence upon matters of contract.

The question whether one party can tender an oath to another on a matter of contract, must, in so far as the lex fori sanctions oaths generally in other cases, be determined by the law to which the substantive legal relation concerned is itself subject.⁵⁴

Onus Probandi AND PRESUMPTIONS.

§ 399. Questions as to the onus probandi—apart from the most general of these questions upon which there is practical agreement in all civilised States,⁵⁵ and on which therefore we need not here spend any time—are not so much questions of procedure as questions of substantive law. The law determines this or that legal relation on the footing that no substantial modification of the state of facts which it assumes can be shown to exist. This is recognised most markedly in the law of contracts. The assumption Asser-Rivier, § 94; Phillimore, § 662. See, too, resolution of the Institute of International Law, supra, note 29. Petrushevecz, p. 92, § 210; Smits, Bewijsr. p. 37. The last-named author contradicts the view taken in the text, but he forgets (1) that the application of the law which is more favourable to the defender is simply a consequence of the general principles which necessarily govern the law of obligations (see supra, § 250), and (2) that if the lex fori or the usage of the court gives faith to business books, it is de facto impossible to limit the amount of credit that is to be given to them, once they are produced in evidence, in accordance with the limitations of any foreign law. It would be different, of course, if by the lex loci contractus business books were altogether inadmissible in evidence, or were a kind of evidence to which one of the parties could object.

⁵⁴ Massé, ii. § 775; Bonnier, i. § 935; Smits, p. 34.

of what are called the naturalia negotii is simply an assumption of what must be supposed to be the case, unless proof is forthcoming of some intention of the parties to a different effect. In other words, the law says, "if any one alleges that a different intention existed, it is for him to prove it."⁵⁶

We must deal on the same principles with presumptiones juris. They are simply special provision for particular sets of circumstances, particular legal relations, or they deal with the onus of proof in these circumstances and relations. We may express our meaning otherwise thus. A presumption of that character involves a provision of law that the legal consequences which properly belong to one state of facts shall be attached to some other state of facts: the result is that the state of facts which really exists is rejected as being inconsistent with those which are necessary to support the legal conclusion. If, for instance, there is, in relation to a claim of succession, a presumption that B survived A, that implies that, as far as regards this claim, the true state of facts—viz. that both died simultaneously—must have the legal consequence attached to it which belongs to the case of B's survivance; this latter condition of facts cannot, ex hypothesi, be capable of being shown to be the true state of the fact.⁵⁷ If, again, for ⁵⁶ Although I decided in my first edition in favour simpliciter of the lex fori (see to the same effect Menger, p. 154), I expressed myself in the fourth edition of v. Holtzendorff's Rechtencyclopädie (p. 713) just as I have done in the text. By Asser-Rivier, however (p. 713), I have apparently been misunderstood: these authors, like myself, declare against the lex fori (see now, too, Böhm, Rechtshülfeverf. p. 150). As to the substantive character of legal presumptions, see Unger, Oester Privatr. ii. p. 580: "The law of procedure can only tell us that, if we are dealing with a legal presumption, the person in whose favour it is, is free of the burden of proof: if the question be whether there is or is not a legal presumption in the case, we are thrown back on substantive law." The German Imperial Court (i.) determined (Dec. vi. No. 127) that the principles which must regulate the onus are no part of the law of procedure, but are identical with the rules of the substantive law which regulates the particular legal relation under discussion. The authors of the introduction to the German Civilprozessordn. are of the same mind. (See Seuffert, on § 255 of the Ordnung.) As a matter of fact, simple enactments, shifting the onus of proof, may introduce economical modifications of legal rights which are of the most extensive operation: e.g. if trading agents are made liable for losses in the business.

Judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. Lübeck, 30th December 1859 (Seuffert, xiv. No. 148; Unger, pp. 154, 155, in favour of the lex fori).

See, in the sense of the text, Brocher, ii. p. 71, and N. Traité, p. 291. Laurent (viii. § 47), Weiss (p. 951), and Smits (p. 27), in general approve of the application of the law, which rules the legal relation itself, the two latter with special reference to the presumptiones hominis.

instance, the law creates a presumption in favour of the legitimate birth of a child, that constitutes a rule of family law that cannot be distinguished from a substantive enactment: the law will treat the child as legitimate, unless it is made manifest by plain evidence that it is illegitimate.

It is, no doubt, entirely different with præsumtiones hominis. These are simply general conclusions based on experience, and in many cases on psychology. If it were proposed to limit the judgment of the court in which the action is pending by any foreign law, that would be to deprive it of the right of forming a judgment on the evidence. The application of the lex fori, or of the practice which has grown up about it, will not in such cases disappoint any just expectations of the parties, founded on the lex loci actus or contractus: such conclusions as these are subject to constant modification and development even within the same territory.⁵⁸ It would, as a matter of fact, too, be almost impossible to compel any court to come to a conclusion in this way upon evidence according to the views of it entertained by some other court in another country, i.e. in certain circumstances to be untrue to its own convictions or beliefs on the matter. The differences of opinion which we find existing upon the subject of presumptions is perhaps really due to the fact that these two kinds of presumptions are not distinguished, as they ought to be, one from the other.

ACTION PENDING ABROAD AND AFFECTING THE PROOF IN OUR COURTS.

§ 400. If the court has, as undoubtedly it has, the power of sisting procedure in some pending process until some criminal proceedings that are connected with the civil action, raising the same concrete questions, are disposed of (cf. e.g. German Civilprozessordn. § 140), then in a sound view the same thing may happen with reference to criminal proceedings dependent in a foreign country. The point here is not the binding force of the foreign criminal sentence, but the clearing up of matters of fact, an object which may be achieved through the procedure of a foreign court just as well as through the procedure of one of our own courts.⁵⁹

V. Bulmerincq, without making any special reference to the præsumtiones hominis, refers questions of onus and presumptions to the head of substantive law.

Wharton, § 782, is for the lex fori: Laurent, however, makes an erroneous application of the rule that presumptions should be tested on the principles of substantive law, when he proposes to test the presumption of filiation paternelle by the statut personnel of the mother. The question simply is, whether the child has any rights according to the law of the father's family.

⁵⁸ Weiss takes a different view (p. 951), in opposition to Brocher, N. Traité, p. 291, who, however, represents the sound theory.

Bonnier, Traité des Preuves, ii. § 934, comes to exactly the opposite conclusion, for he holds that the présomptions simples alone are uncontrolled by the lex fori. In the présomption légale he can see nothing but an unconditional command addressed to the judge, and so, he concludes, the lex fori is the only law that can be applied.

⁵⁹ See decision of the Sup. Ct. of Austria, 14th Feb. 1882 (J. xiii. p. 462).

Besides, the decision of a foreign court must be awaited by a court in this country, if the law of this country regards the decision of some other court,—e.g. in matrimonial matters the court of the domicile or the nationality of the spouses,—as prejudicial in the technical sense, and that court happens to be a court of some other country. In such cases, according to the sound theory, the foreign judgment operates without needing any special declarator of its validity or process for rendering it executory, since all that it decides is an incidental or preliminary point in the action which is dependent here, and does not propose to enlist directly in its service the executive forces of our country.⁶⁰

[If there is a want of power in the court in which the principal process depends to deal with some incidental question, which nevertheless must be determined before a just judgment in the principal suit can be reached, then process will be sisted till the foreign court, which has power to determine the incidental question, does so. But if there is power in the principal court to determine all questions, then "judex tenetur impertiri judicium suum." See Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson, 1876, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. iii. (H. of L.), p. 77, a case of a claim in bankruptcy which depended in the court of a country other than that in which the main process was being carried out.

On the plea of his alibi pendens, see infra, § 473, and note.]

B. THE PARTIES AND THEIR LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES.

TITLE TO SUE AND NECESSITY FOR EMPLOYING QUALIFIED PRACTITIONERS.

§ 401. The lex fori governs the legal relation which is involved in a lis or process, and this relation again determines what are the rights of the parties as such. Hence it follows that all the rights of the parties as such are dependent upon the lex fori. This will regulate in the first place the question whether a particular person can appear at all or not as a party (e.g. in cases where the law of the court recognises some general rule whereby foreign juristic persons¹ are refused a persona standi in judicio, a rule which seems to us to be altogether unjustifiable). The lex fori will in the same way determine whether a party can take part in the process personally, or whether he must avail himself of the services of some legal adviser who holds a license to appear in the court. But in this, as in other cases, the law which must primarily determine the question may commit the decision of some prejudicial point to another law, and from the nature of the subject that must be the case with regard to questions of capacity to sue, in so far as that title is merely one aspect of general legal capacity and capacity to act. Since the foreigner has in general the same legal capacity in matters of private law as our own citizen, and since nowadays every one has legal capacity, juristic persons having at least capacity to sue (see supra, § 105), the practical result is that in questions of capacity to sue we need not consider anything more than the capacity to act,² and that is a thing that must be determined, not by the lex fori, but by the personal law of the party concerned. This rule³ is recognised even by those⁴ who in other respects maintain that the lex fori must be applied almost without exception in matters of civil procedure. Unfortunately in § 53 of the German Civilprozessordn. this rule has been set at defiance in a manner for which there is no justification.⁵

² See German Civilprozessordn. § 51. "A person who can bind himself by contracts has capacity to sue and be sued."

See, too, Sup. Ct. of App. at Jena, 15th Dec. 1831 (Seuffert, xiii. No. 181); Kiel, 31st May 1856 (Seuffert, xv. No. 94); Berlin, 6th Oct. 1873 (Seuffert, xxix. No. 210).

⁵ "A foreigner who has not capacity to sue by the law of his own country is held to have that capacity, if the law of the court in which the process depends invests him with such capacity." It has been attempted to draw an analogy, which is quite inapposite, between this question and that raised by § 35 of the introduction to the Prussian Allgem. Landr. and by § 84 of the German statute on bills. What may perhaps in all cases be allowable in contracts, and especially in contracts by bills, may very well not be justifiable in the law of process. If we proceed logically to follow out § 53 of the Civilprozessordn. we should require the court to reject the claim of a guardian to appear in Germany, if his ward, who was a minor by his own law, was major by the German law, when he proposed to institute a process on behalf of his ward, or at his own hand to appear to defend his ward's interest or to assist him (cf. Gaupp, Civilprozessordn. i. pp. 180, 181). Struckmann and Koch propose to allow him a right to appear with his ward: I do not understand how that can be done, if the German court is to ignore the position of the guardian altogether. Undoubtedly the recognition in a foreign country of any judgment pronounced against the ward in such a case would be met with difficulties, and thus the German suitor, whose special protection and convenience were intended to be secured by the provisions of § 53, might very probably suffer prejudice, if he should try to execute his judgment abroad: all the trouble and expense of the process in Germany would have been thrown away. But § 53 will give us absolutely no certain guide

It is a necessary inference from the proposition that capacity to sue and to be sued is ruled by the personal law of the party, that this other question, viz. whether a person who has in himself full capacity to act, e.g. a juridical person—a commune (Gemeinde) it may be—needs special authority to carry on a suit, must be determined also by his or its personal law. This is true also of the authority of any legal representative of a person, who in himself has no such capacity, e.g. the authority of a guardian to conduct a process.

In dealing with the subject of contracts in the way of trade (supra, § 142), we found it necessary to advocate a certain respect for the lex loci actus, and to make certain exceptions from an exclusive application of the personal law in these matters. But in questions of capacity to sue and to be sued, we cannot admit that there is any reason at all for any such modification of the general rule. Actions are not legal transactions which are hastily and summarily gone about. In these matters we have plenty of time and leisure to inform ourselves as to the capacity of our adversary. In summary processes, e.g. arrestments, our course must generally be regulated, to begin with, by a superficial enquiry, which in a certain sense is merely provisional. In such cases, accordingly, circumstances may require that a person should be held to have capacity to sue and to be sued, although by the law of his own country he has no such capacity, and will require to supplement his own capacity by the approval e.g. of his guardian. On the other hand, the court in which the action depends will not pay any regard to limitations which the personal law of the party imposes upon him as a condition of certain steps of procedure, limitations in regard to references to oath or compromises. General incapacity to act is a fact that must necessarily attract attention at the outset of an action; such minor limita-in determining a question which may very likely arise and be of practical importance, viz. what is to be said of a mandate to sue given by a foreign guardian in such a case in a foreign country? The foreign law should of course determine all questions as to the validity of a mandate given there: but the logical inference from § 53 seems to deny this, and the ward could at any moment he wished make an end of the conduct of the suit by his guardian. Wach, (p. 549) recognises that difficulties may arise in consequence of § 53. In my opinion this provision, which the majority of the Imperial Commission on Justice celebrated as an international step in advance, is simply one of these abuses of what seem to be purely theoretical principles for ends that are alleged to be practical, but are in reality most impractical, which often find so much favour. Apart from the unsoundness of § 53 in principle, much difference of opinion prevails as to its true interpretation, as is often the case with enactments which are faulty in principle (see Wach, p. 548; Böhm, Rechtshülfeverfahren, i. p. 62). First, does the rule apply to foreigners domiciled in the German Empire? Second, does it sanction in the case of the foreigner the principle, which has not obtained much recognition generally in Germany, that capacity to sue and to be sued is dependent on citizenship and not on domicile? Third, does the rule apply to Germans who are not domiciled within the jurisdiction of the court, and who have a personal law at variance with the lex fori? The first and second questions I should answer in the affirmative, the third in the negative. We must, however, decide rather on the words used than on any general principle. But § 53 will make it imperative to apply the provisions of § 51 to foreign married women and children. Substantive rights of the husband and father cannot be affected by suits conducted by the wife or child (see Wach, p. 554). See Böhm's Rechtshülfeverf. i. § 8 ad fin. on the whole subject of § 53.

tions, on the other hand, are easily overlooked. Besides, steps of procedure which have the same names in different systems of process have very different effects as matter of fact. This would be a sufficient reason for denying effect to them beyond their own territory. The bona fides of international intercourse would be defeated if we allowed them to have any such effect.^{6 7}

PLURALITY OF PARTIES. Legitimitio ad causam.

§ 402. The lex fori must undoubtedly regulate primarily the competency of associating a number of persons as pursuers or defenders, and also the right of persons, other than the original parties, to join in the suit (intervention). But still it will often be necessary to appeal to some substantive foreign law to tell us whether there is such a community of rights among a number of persons as to entitle them to sue or to be sued together, or whether there is a legal interest which justifies us in sisting new parties.

The question whether the pursuer has a good title to make the claim in question against the defender, apart from its objective existence—i.e. legitimitio ad causam—is dependent upon the law to which the legal relation in question is subject. In particular, the lex fori will not decide whether the pursuer must make his claim in his own name and right, or as an assignee; that question depends for its solution purely upon whether it is possible to transfer to other persons the right itself which is in dispute, or only the privilege of exercising it.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF THE PARTIES AS SUCH TOWARDS EACH OTHER.

CAUTION FOR EXPENSES. RIGHTS OF THE POOR.

§ 403. The mutual obligations of the parties, in so far as they arise from the suit, are to be determined by the lex fori; so, too, is the obligation to make good the expenses of process, to find caution for expenses,⁸ and to produce documents.⁹ Foreigners and citizens stand on the same footing on these matters.

⁶ On the other hand, Gaupp, D. Civilprocessordn. i. p. 181, on the ground that § 53 contains an exceptional provision, which does not admit of being applied by analogy. § 52 of the Ordnung itself, however, refuses effect to such limitations in the case of persons who belong to the German Empire, "if they have a general capacity to sue and to be sued, or if the law of the court requires no special authority to be given."

⁷ The question of the capacity of a bankrupt to sue and to be sued will be discussed below, under the law of bankruptcy.

⁸ P. Voet, x. § 8; Schäffner, p. 202.

An exception, however, which is very widely recognised,¹⁰ is the exception as regards the obligation to find caution for expenses. Although the law does not now, as a rule, require a pursuer, who is a citizen of this country, to find caution, it does give the defender right to demand such caution from a foreign pursuer. The practice in France has laid it down that the right to demand that a foreigner shall find caution belongs to the droits civils,¹¹ which no one but a French subject, or a person domiciled by the license of the Government in France, can exercise.¹² But the special obligation laid upon foreigners to find caution, which exists in almost all countries, in spite of the equality established between foreigners and natives in all other legal relations, rests simply upon the fact that the foreigner can more easily withdraw himself from the execution of the sentence of the court, and put the defender in a specially disadvantageous position, which is remedied by requiring caution.¹³ The fact which is most strongly pressed as showing that it is a special privilege of natives to require caution—viz. that a foreign defender needs not to find caution, although he may cause expense to his opponent just as much as a pursuer, and withdraw himself as easily from diligence for its recovery—is to be explained by the naturally advantageous position of the defender. It would obviously outrage all feelings of justice to allow judgment to go against a foreigner just because he was not in a position to find caution.

The result is that a defender who is a foreigner must have the same right to demand caution from another foreigner, who sues him in our courts, as a native defender has. This is the view of the German *Civil-processori*n., according to the interpretation of it which is generally

¹¹ See the Arrêts du Cour de Pau, 13th December 1836 (Sirey, 36, 2, p. 362); Cour d'Orléans, 26th June 1828 (Sirey, 28, 2, p. 193); Félix, i. p. 291; the judgment of the Court of Cassation of 15th April 1842, reported there at p. 294; and Gand, No. 325. [C. de Nancy, 14th June 1876, J. v. p. 264; C. de Douai. Auckaert v. Delmoities, 1877, J. iv. p. 142. No length of residence will give a foreign defender, who has no Government authority to live in France, the right to require caution from a foreign pursuer.]

¹² But whereas in Germany and in France citizenship determines the question, it being always understood that in France a foreigner with a domicile licensed by Government is on the same footing as a Frenchman, the English law requires every person who is permanently resident abroad to find caution, so that de jure there is no distinction between citizens and foreigners (Piggot, p. 185). Domicile rules in the United States. Conversely, a citizen who is domiciled abroad is not required either by the law of France (Gerbaut, § 137) or by that of Germany to find caution. According to a judgment of the Court of Celle, 5th November 1881 (Seuffert, xxxvii. No. 149), even the acquisition of another nationality will not give rise to the obligation; it is only the loss of German nationality on the grounds recognised in German law that will do so.

received;¹⁴ the opposite view prevails in the law of Belgium and in France.¹⁵

Since the object in view is in truth the security of the defender,¹⁶ which is thought to be imperilled by the fact that the pursuer is a foreigner, it matters not that the claim on which the action is founded was originally a claim competent to a native of this country, if it is being pressed at the present moment by a foreigner, i.e. some foreign assignee, in his own name.¹⁷ So, too, one who loses his citizenship and becomes a foreigner pendente processu will be liable to find caution;¹⁸ as, too, every foreigner must be who may eventually be liable on his own account in payment of expenses. Accordingly, a foreign pursuer is not exempt by the fact that he has others, citizens of this country, joined with him as parties to the action;¹⁹ there must, to relieve him, be some one responsible for the whole expenses of the action.

On the other hand, it is quite immaterial that a person should in point of form only be described as pursuer. We must rather look to the question whether in point of fact the person concerned seeks to acquire something for the first time,²⁰ or to alter some existing legal relation, not merely to affect some relation which has just been brought into being by some preliminary process, or, at the least, proposes to ask for special legal recognition of some state of circumstances in which he stands, or of some document in which he is interested. An example may be found in actions of declarator (see D. Civilprocessordn. § 231). Accordingly, a person who is an appellant, or who takes advantage of some exception, is not bound to find caution. Nor is one who asks for the loosing of arrestments in security used against him, or makes a motion for that purpose, or as a defender resists the arrestments of things in the hands of third parties or of outstanding debts.²¹ The person who is liable is the pursuer in the first instance, or the person who lays on an arrestment.²² Where a party comes into an action, the point for consideration is whether he is sisted on the side of the pursuer or on that of the defender.²³ On the other hand, actions of reduction and restitution recognised by the D. Civilprocessordn. seem to be actions²⁴ directed against a state of circumstances which is ruled by some judicial decree, and in such cases it is no reason for exemption that the party was a defender in the preliminary process. The pursuer of a counter action is not bound to find caution, provided that his claim in that action can be represented simply as the contradiction of the claim made by his adversary in the original action. But he will become liable to find caution if the original action is thrown out or withdrawn, and the counter action left pending; or if the conclusions of the counter action go beyond those of the original action, or if it rests upon some legal relation that has no affinity to that on which the other action proceeds, and in the latter case there is a prospect of additional separate expense. Even a demand for execution of a foreign decree, which is according to the German procedure and English law stated in the form of an action, makes the pursuer of it liable in caution. But execution per se proceeding on the ground of some title obtained in this country is not an action, and does not involve finding caution.²⁵

¹⁴ Cf. e.g. Gaupp, i. p. 314; Seuffert, Comm. § 102, No. 3. The same rule holds in Brazil.

It is possible that in no very remote future the whole obligation to find caution for expenses will disappear. It is already gone in Italy. By the German Civilprocessordn. [§ 102 (1)],²⁶ the foreign pursuer is free from any such obligation, if by the law of his country a German is not obliged to find sureties. In a large number of recent treaties,²⁷ the contracting States have done away with all such requirements by reciprocally guaranteeing "accès libre et facile auprès des tribunaux."²⁸ As a matter of fact, a defender may suffer just as much from a groundless action raised against him by an insolvent native of his own country, from whom no caution is required, as he can from a foreigner. The Institute of International Law (Zurich Resolutions of 1877, Ann. ii. p. 44) expressed itself in the same ²⁴ So, too, Seuffert, Deutsche Civilprocessordn. § 102 (n. 2); Struckmann and Koch, § 102 (n. 1). If one resists execution he is in truth pursuer upon a real right. See Trib. Seine, 16th June 1880 (J. vii. p. 392). But one who asks for execution of a foreign judgment is pursuer in the sense we have laid down. See Francke, x. p. 104.

²⁵ Gerbaut, § 62, p. 56.

²⁶ According to the conceptions of this statute it is not enough, if the German as such, or as a foreigner, is not required to find caution in the other country: the requirement is that the German pursuer shall be absolutely free from any obligation to find caution in like circumstances. Caution may then be required, if in the foreign State in question it may be required from the subjects of that State itself. (Cf. Struckmann and Koch on § 102 of the Civilprocessordn.) This is a step beyond the requirement of reciprocity, for which so much may be said in international law. But it may perhaps be supported in respect that there may be a statutory obligation in a State that caution should be found, which although not in form confined to foreigners, is worked so as to affect foreigners for the most part.

²⁸ See Gerbaut, § 97, and the Franco-Spanish treaty of 7th Jan. 1861, dealt with by the Trib. Seine, 23rd Nov. 1880 (J. vii. p. 575), and Clunet, ibid.

sense as these modern treaties;²⁹ as also does Gerbaut (§ 102), who has treated this question perhaps as thoroughly as any one, both from the point of view of positive law and of legislative expediency.³⁰

Justice requires, too, that the benefits of the poor's roll should be extended to foreigners. To refuse poor foreigners such privileges (assistance judiciaire) may be a direct denial of justice. In modern treaties, reciprocal admission of the subjects of the contracting powers to the benefits of the poor's roll is often conceded.³¹ But this must not be used as an argument for maintaining that foreigners cannot claim admission to that roll except through treaty provisions.

NOTE TT ON § 403. CAUTION FOR EXPENSES. POOR'S ROLL.

[In England, a plaintiff may be required to find caution if he is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, unless that absence is merely temporary; and it would seem that such caution may, in the discretion of the court, be required even in cases where the defender is also a foreigner. By the law of Scotland, a foreign pursuer "is required to provide a mandatary resident in Scotland, to be responsible to the Court for the conduct of the cause, and to the opposite party for expenses in which the mandant is found liable" (Mackay, Practice of the Court of Session, i. p. 458). This rule is applicable even to a Scots pursuer resident abroad, or leaving Scotland during the dependence of the suit. If he is resident in England or Ireland, he is not required to do so, unless there are some other circumstances than his absence from Scotland that render it proper he should do so (Lawson's Trs. 1874, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. i. p. 1065). The order to sist a mandatary is entirely in the discretion of the court, and the considerations in respect of which such orders are made seem to apply none the less forcibly in cases where the defender as well as the pursuer is a foreigner (D'Ernesti v. D'Ernesti, 1882, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. ix. p.

²⁹ "L'étranger sera admis à ester en justice aux mêmes conditions que le régnicole."

³⁰ By Franco-Belgian law no caution is required in commercial matters. The decisive consideration, however, is not whether the process is or is not actually dependent in a commercial court, but whether the question on its merits is or is not substantially a commercial one (Braun, J. viii. p. 405).

By the German Civilprozessordn. the following exceptions, in addition to the case of reciprocity in the foreign court, are recognised:—

"(2.) Cases connected with bills or instantly verifiable by documents;
 "(3.) Cases of counter actions;
 "(4.) Cases which are instituted in consequence of a public requisition to do so;
 "(5.) Cases arising out of claims the foundation of which is in some land register or register of incumbrances kept by a German official."

In Austria, foreigners are always admitted to the poor's roll if there is a guarantee of reciprocity. See Starr, Die Rechtshülfe in Oesterreich, p. 19.

655). An impecunious pursuer will, in certain circumstances, be required to find caution, even although he be a Scotsman.

The benefits of the poor's roll in the courts of Scotland are not confined to Scotsmen (cf. e.g. Flynn, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. ix. p. 909.]

MANDATE TO CARRY ON AN ACTION.

§ 404. The lex fori must of necessity be used to interpret, in all questions connected with the process, the effect of a mandate specially given for the purpose of carrying on an action, even although that mandate should have been given abroad by a foreigner. The mandant knows that the mandate must be made effectual for the court and for his opponent, as well as for his own mandatary. Thus the mandatary is empowered to make a compromise with the adversary, if that is one of the powers with which the lex fori invests a mandatary.

The rights and duties of legal advisers with a licensed position, and of procurators in a suit, will be regulated, as far as questions with foreigners are concerned, by the law that is recognised at the seat of the court where they hold their position. Although the representation of the parties, and the introduction of legal advisers into an action, rest in every case upon a contract, the powers of solicitors and advocates really rest upon a license conferred by the State, and in some respects may well be compared to a public office. No party need contend, therefore, that he may settle the cost of his representation by such persons in any other way than is sanctioned by the law that prevails at the seat of the court: parties subject themselves to the dues there exigible.³²

POSITION OF FOREIGNERS IN ARRESTMENT PROCEEDINGS. CLAIMS OF DAMAGES ON ACCOUNT OF THE USE OF ARRESTMENTS.

§ 405. In procedure connected with arrestments, the favour which at one time was shown to citizens, and the disadvantages to which foreigners were put as such, are now gradually disappearing.³³ Unless there is an express enactment to the contrary, the foreigner may use arrestments against a person on exactly the same conditions as a citizen can do so. It is not the quality of an opponent, as foreigner or native, that gives the right, but rather the fact that the assets of his property are likely to be withdrawn from the jurisdiction, or may be so withdrawn.³⁴

It is, too, the lex fori, and not the law of the party's domicile, that must decide upon obligations of reparation for the unwarrantable use of any step of procedure, especially, for instance, an unwarrantable use of arrestments.³⁵ It is quite obvious that we are here again dealing with a subject that must be referred to that law. One who desires to have the advantages of any course of procedure, cannot refuse to take upon himself any disadvantages that may eventually turn out to be associated with it.

C. JURISDICTION OF THE COURTS.

JURISDICTION IN RESPECT OF SUBJECT MATTER. COMPETENCY OF THE LEGAL REMEDY.

§ 406. The essentials of the composition of the court, and questions of jurisdiction of the different courts of the country in respect of subject matter, i.e. questions as to what kind of court has to decide this particular claim, must plainly be fixed by the lex fori. The point simply is, which of the machines of that State which is to take up and decide the matter, is the one by which the decision is to be given? In such a matter, the sovereign power of the State cannot submit to any instructions from a foreign law.

Thus, for instance, the foreigner who at home has certain privileges in particular suits, or in all, cannot claim these on that account in a foreign country.¹ But till modern times special privileges were often granted to foreign nobles, if in both countries the nobility enjoyed somewhat similar privileges.

Accordingly, it looks at first sight as if the competency of the legal remedy, i.e. the question whether the courts are to decide at all in this or that matter, must in the same way be determined by the lex fori, and by it alone.² But after more careful consideration we find that we must hold

³⁴ See German Civilprozessordn. § 797 (2): "It is to be held a sufficient ground for arrestment, if the judgment has to be executed abroad."

³⁵ See Ger. Imp. Ct. (i), 20th September 1882 (Entsch. vii. No. 116, p. 380); but this decision rested on the consideration, which, in my opinion, was wrong, that the question was one as to the consequences attached by the law to the trespass on the rights of another which had been committed, and that the law of the place where this trespass had been committed must decide.

² See to this effect Imp. Ct. (iv.), 16th September 1886 (Bolze, Praxis, iii. No. 37, 1881) The competency of the legal remedy is held to be determined by the lex fori, even although the legal relation in question is under the control of a foreign law.

that this question is ruled by the law which determines the merits of the case in hand.³

If the parties are only bound to respect the decision of some non-judicial foreign official, the substantive nature of the claim would be altered by allowing them to have recourse to the courts of another State. But if, conversely, the law which decides upon the substantive bearings of the legal relation in question allows the court to decide such questions, then, if both parties are agreed, or if, by embarking on the contest, they may be held to be agreed, the matter in dispute may be brought before the courts of some other State, even although there may be no doubt at all that this kind of legal remedy would have been excluded, if the question at issue had in its substance belonged to that State, in the courts of which it now is. For the exclusion of the ordinary cursus curiæ does not mean that the courts are not under any circumstances to dispose of such questions, but simply that they are not to dispose of such questions among their own citizens. They might be brought into operation e.g. even in such questions as specially selected courts of arbitration.

TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION. NATIONALITY OF THE PARTIES. FRENCH LAW IN PARTICULAR.

§ 407. The jurisdiction of the courts of this or that State generally,⁴ and the jurisdiction of the particular courts of a State, must be determined in so far as the court in which the process depends is considered, by its own law. The matter for determination, on the one hand, is what contested questions the State desires to have dealt with by its tribunals, and eventually by each one of these tribunals.⁵ Even although the court should look upon the rule by which its own competency is affirmed as a trespass upon the jurisdiction of the courts of another State, or even as contrary to the principles of public law,⁶ it must still hold itself to be competent, for it owes obedience to its own law. An example of a trespass of the kind referred to will be found in article 14 of the Code Civil, a view in which even French jurists concur: another, as we think, will be found to be involved to some extent in § 24 of the German *Civilprozessordn.*⁷ It is

³ Accordingly, the question whether administrative officials can make arrangements for the education of a child must be decided by the child's own law. So Sup. Ct. of Stuttgart, 25th January 1861 (Seuffert, xvi. No. 57).

⁵ On this point there is no dispute. See Asser-Rivier, §§ 68, 69.

⁶ Cf. e.g. Daguin, p. 117.

⁷ Provisions of that kind often damage the citizens of the very State which enacts them. No French decree founded on art. 14 of the code will be put into execution by a foreign law.

quite another question whether and to what extent the courts of another State will be bound to recognise a jurisdiction thus assumed. It is also questionable whether it is desirable for a party to make use of such an exceptional provision.

A further question may, however, be started, viz. whether the nationality of the parties should form any substantial consideration in determining questions of jurisdiction, so that the legal system of a country should, as a rule, have to deal only with disputes between citizens or between a citizen and a foreigner, and should have nothing to do with disputes between foreigners; or whether the grounds upon which the law declares the courts to have jurisdiction are to be applicable to foreigners as much as to citizens, excepting always particular classes of cases, in which the peculiar character of the legal claim which is at issue makes it necessary to keep in view the citizenship of the parties. The former view, i.e. the view that the courts should not deal with disputes between foreigners, is in principle the view of practical French jurisprudence at the present day.⁸ It starts from the principle that, as a matter of principle, the French courts of justice are under no duty to judge in matters in which foreigners only are concerned; that, as a matter of principle, therefore they are entitled to refuse to entertain any action to which foreigners, and foreigners only, are the parties. But it finds itself compelled, by the requirements of everyday life, to recognise an ever-increasing array of exceptions to this principle,⁹ so that at last the exceptions seem to swallow up the principle. As a matter of fact, it is very difficult to refer foreigners who have been promised the protection of the law, to foreign courts, which may be at a great distance, within whose jurisdiction it may frequently be impossible to find either the person of the defender, or any property of his that can conveniently be taken in execution. The substantive law, which we pretend to guarantee to foreigners, would not unfrequently turn out to be a mere phantom, if such a power, of referring these foreigners to their own tribunals, were exercised.

On the other hand, if the Frenchman brought a fresh action in the foreign country the exceptio rei judicatæ might be invoked against him, for he was the person who went to the French court. If there are not assets in France to satisfy the decree, in any case the Frenchman has had his outlay of expenses for nothing.

⁹ E.g. the principle is not recognised in commercial questions (C. de Paris, 21st May 1885, J. xii. p. 541) or in questions of interim possession.

On these grounds, more modern French theories are already beginning to throw over the whole of this limitation:¹⁰ in Belgium, by the recent Procedure Statute of 1876, it has been expressly abolished,¹¹ and there has been adopted the principle which prevails in the common law of Germany,¹² in the law of Austria,¹³ of England,¹⁴ of the United States,¹⁵ of Italy,¹⁶ and generally in the laws of most countries,¹⁷ and which has found correct expression in this resolution of the Institute of International Law (the limitation attached to it is explained by the circumstance that in certain cases the nationality of the parties must determine the jurisdiction of the courts):—

“ Dans les procès civils et commerciaux la nationalité des parties doit rester sans influence sur la compétence des juges sauf dans les cas où la nature même du litige doit faire admettre la compétence exclusive des juges nationaux de l'une des parties.”^{18 19}

§ 408. We must not, however, forget that this rule of French law which is thus to be rejected has, in a certain sense, borne fruit for the theory of the law of procedure in international questions. It has led to a more careful consideration of the question, how far it is sound to extend grounds of jurisdiction, which are sustained by the law of any particular country, to suits in which foreigners appear as parties.

This consideration has led to the proposition which, in my opinion, is a sound proposition, that a distinction falls to be made, according as we are dealing, on the one hand, with rules of jurisdiction by which the distribution of different kinds of actions among the several courts of one and the same country is regulated, or, on the other hand, determining international

¹⁸ From this there follows the proposition, which in my view is perhaps not quite so sound (see Ann. i. p. 126), viz.: “Les tribunaux saisis d'une contestation, doivent à l'égard de la compétence adoptée par les traités, statuer d'après les mêmes règles qui ont été établies à l'égard de la compétence, par les lois du pays. Ainsi dans les pays où ce système est adopté pour l'application des lois nationales concernant la compétence des tribunaux, ils ne se déclareront pas incompétents d'office, quand il s'agit de l'incompétence ratione personæ.” These propositions were adopted on the proposal and report of Asser (Rev. vii. pp. 364-391, especially p. 367).

¹⁹ Subjects of a State, with which we happen to be at war, must be admitted all the same to sue and be sued in our courts. See Gerbaut, § 9. It was otherwise in old French law. On the other hand, the decree of 19th Thermidor, in the year 11, directed against the English, was regarded as an isolated exception. See, however, supra, p. 872, note 1.

questions of jurisdiction affecting the whole courts of the rival States concerned. This distinction is not of very much importance in connection with English and American procedure, or even for systems ruled by the common law of Rome, for these are all systems of procedure, in which jurisdiction rests upon a subordination of the different classes of actions to the judicial authority of this or that court, which is as natural as the lines of demarcation by which the jurisdictions of different countries are defined. The distinction is, however, of more importance in a series of more modern legal systems, in which one jurisdiction is piled upon another, so as to give every single court within the State an extravagantly broad sweep of jurisdiction.²⁰ Now, although it can never be a matter of indifference, it may not be a matter of vital importance, whether a defender must, according to the pursuer's pleasure, submit to the jurisdiction of this or that court among the many courts of one and the same State, since all of them are guided by a legal system which does not vary very much, according as this or that court administers it, and they are all subordinate to one and the same supreme court of appeal. But it is a different affair, if an extended jurisdiction is conferred upon a court in connection with matters which must, in whole or in part, be ruled by foreign law, and of which it can be said with good reason that they should be handed over to a foreign judge, who will decide them by the rules of a foreign legal system.²¹

Of course, the dangers of a palpable excess of jurisdiction become more pronounced, if the pursuer is not required to establish beyond all doubt the competency of the jurisdiction which he has invoked, where the defender does not answer the citation, or if such failure to answer is held to be, as most authorities think it is, e.g. by § 296 of the German code of procedure, an admission by the defender of the competency of the court, and the right to dispose of the suit is thus made to depend upon fictions which do not justify it. Any such maxims are, even in the domestic intercourse of a

²¹ Curti (p. 10) says very truly that the rule "actor sequitur forum rei" should have a higher force given to it in international questions than in domestic questions. In such a case, the defender has a double interest not to be compelled to defend himself before a foreign judge, under the dominion of a foreign law, at a distance from the centre of his business and family connections, against a suit brought in that court, it may be, from malicious motives. But a glance at the positive systems of jurisprudence will show that that rule is very often neglected in international affairs, owing to a distrust of the administration of justice in foreign countries.

The praise, however, which Curti bestows on the German code of procedure is undeserved. It is true that it does not expressly extend to foreigners the grounds of jurisdiction which are sufficient against German subjects: but the extravagant catalogue of jurisdiction which it contains, and the provisions as to the jurisdiction over persons who have no domicile in the German Empire, combined with the system of actions of declarator, are sufficient to prejudice that leading rule to a serious degree.

great State, matters of serious concern; but no objection can, of course, be taken to them on grounds of public law. The State may lay on its subjects the duty of making a provisional appearance before courts that are incompetent to entertain suits against them. But, on the other hand, it is difficult to see how the State can cite a foreigner, who has no property in the country, and who does not reside there, or do business there. For the source of jurisdiction really rests at bottom on the subjection either of a person, or of property belonging to him, to the sovereignty of the State.²² The tendency of French practice is undoubtedly in the direction of resisting in some degree encroachments of this kind upon the sovereign rights of other States, so far as that can be reconciled with the text of the French code of procedure.²³

[NOTE UU ON §§ 407, 408. JURISDICTION IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.]

[The courts of England and Scotland recognise no peculiar right in their own subjects to sue before them to the exclusion of suits between foreigners, provided that there is present some ground of jurisdiction upon which they can proceed—e.g. in England personal service upon the defender, in Scotland arrestment of his goods jurisdictionis fundandæ causa. We shall discuss more closely, infra, what are the grounds on which jurisdiction may be founded; at present we need only note that if these conditions are satisfied, the defender is not entitled to plead that both he and the pursuer are of foreign nationality or domicile, nor will the courts of the countries named take proprio motu any such objection; in Scotland, however, the plea of forum non conveniens may be advanced in such cases, and will be sustained if the court is satisfied that the case will be more conveniently disposed of elsewhere. But that convenience must be distinct and preponderating, otherwise the court will proceed to adjudicate on the question, in conformity with the doctrine laid down by Inglis (L. J. C.) in Clements v. Macaulay, 16th March 1866, 4 M'P. 593: "It must never be forgotten, that in cases where jurisdiction is competently founded, a court has no discretion whether it shall exercise its jurisdiction or not, but is bound to award the justice which the suitor comes to ask. Judex tenetur impertiri judicium suum." This maxim is at the bottom of the doctrine advocated in the text.]

²² Vattel, ii. chap. 8, § 103. Huber, de foro competente, § 28: "Summa regula fori est hæc, quod actor forum rei sequitur. . . . Cujus ratio non tam est quod reus sit actore favorabilior . . . sed quod necessitas vocandi et cogendi alium ad jus æquum, nonnisi a superiore proficisci queat, superior autem cujusque non est alienus, sed proprius rector." Story, § 539 ad fin., remarks: "No sovereignty can extend its process beyond its own territorial limits, to subject either persons or property to its judicial decisions. Every exertion of authority of this sort beyond this limit is a mere nullity, and incapable of binding such persons or property in any other tribunals."

II. PROCEDURE IN THE COURT OF THE LEADING JURISDICTION SUBMITTED TO THE CONSIDERATION OF A FOREIGN COURT.

A. ASSISTANCE TO BE GIVEN BY FOREIGN COURTS IN MATTERS OF CITATION AND LEADING OF EVIDENCE.

DUTY TO GIVE ASSISTANCE? DUTY TO GIVE EVIDENCE AND OPINIONS ON QUESTIONS OF LAW. DUTY OF THIRD PARTIES TO PRODUCE DOCUMENTS.

§ 409. Following up what was said in § 391, we have now to answer the question, whether and under what conditions procedure in the court in which the principal process is dependent will be recognised and have effect given to it by a foreign court. This involves the question, to what extent the courts of one country should assist those of another country or co-operate with them.

According to a usage among nations, which is universally recognised, the courts of one country will carry out commissions of investigation (Commissions rogatoires, literæ mutui compassus sive requisitoriales) for the purpose of collecting information for the courts of another country as to suits depending there, in so far as the demand for investigation does not encroach upon the sovereignty of the State upon whose courts the demand is made.¹ The duty which Roman law in later times imposed upon its courts to a certain extent, a duty, therefore, which was incumbent upon the officers of one and the same State, to assist each other, was extended in the Middle Ages,² when all jurisdiction in every country was referred, in theory, to the same sources—viz. the jurisdiction of the Emperor and the Pope,—to the courts of different States; and, although, except where treaties existed, there was no complete international obligation such as would justify force in the case of a refusal to comply with it, no State, supposing its neighbouring State complied with the obligation,³ could refuse to fulfil this moral obligation, which was essential for friendly intercourse.⁴

³ At one time it was customary to insert an assertio reciproci, or demand for similar services, in all returns to such requisitions. Now it is not customary actually to make such a demand. Now that the functions of the sovereign authority are so much more subdivided, the judge as a rule can give no such undertaking. The proper course is, not to demand reciprocity as a condition of giving the assistance, but, if reciprocity is refused by the other State, to use the weapon of retaliation.

International treaties on this matter are, nevertheless, desirable since they transform the imperfect obligation of public law into a complete obligation.⁵ It may be, in these matters, as in others, that a treaty which is badly framed will work mischief when it is set in operation.

In the case of requisitions which are concerned with mere matters of information or "instruction," e.g. the hearing of evidence, or the making of an inspection, the judge to whom the requisition is addressed is not called upon to enquire into the jurisdiction of the court from which the requisition proceeds, or into the merits of the question at issue: he has only to consider his own jurisdiction, and the competency of the act which he is asked to do.⁶ The ascertainment of the truth is the object of the act which he is asked to perform, and this can prejudice no one, and cannot involve any invasion of the proper jurisdiction of the court, provided always that right is reserved to the witness to refuse to answer incompetent questions, and that the parties have a legal interest in the ascertainment of the truth.⁷ It is a convenient course, and one that is often

⁵ Many such treaties have been made in recent years, see e.g. the Franco-Swiss treaty of 1842.

followed in international intercourse, that the court to which the requisition is addressed, if it should itself have no jurisdiction, should of its own accord refer the matter to the official of its own State, who has in its opinion jurisdiction to deal with it. For it is very likely that errors may prevail in a foreign country as to the extent of the jurisdiction of particular officials, and to send the requisition back again to the court from which it came would cause useless expense and mischievous delay. At the same time, intimation should be given to the court from which the requisition proceeded.⁸

Again, in my view, the judge, to whom a requisition is presented, does not need to enquire as to the jurisdiction of the court from which it proceeds if he is asked to serve an action upon some one, the result being, if the order which is to be served upon the party is disobeyed, that he will merely be placed at some disadvantage in the suit, but will not be directly compelled to obey. For if the person so served does not comply with the order he will simply suffer some prejudice. He is not warned that he must and may defend himself, while it is for the court from which the requisition proceeded to subject him to the disadvantages in the suit with which it threatens him, e.g. that it will hold him confessed, or find him liable in expenses; and this it may do after advertisement in the newspapers. But the judge to whom the requisition is addressed does not, by serving the summons on a party, place himself under any obligation to put into execution the judgment which may thereafter be pronounced by the foreign court.^{9 10}

Of course, the judge on whom the demand is made is not competent to give a judgment on the merits of the action (cf. Wetzell, § 38, note 44), and just as little to give one upon the obligations of the parties in matters of procedure, the penalty attaching to which is to be set at a disadvantage in the process; but he may determine the rights and obligations of third persons whom he calls into the process—e.g. the obligations of witnesses

who are called, and the fees due to them; while he is not called upon to decide the rights of parties to take exception to a witness.¹¹

The obligation of third parties to give evidence, or skilled opinions, or to produce documents, is to be determined not by the law of their domicile, but by that of their place of residence.¹² [See case of Burchard v. Macfarlane, supra, p. 858.] The question at issue here is one of public law, and concerns an obligation of public law of an universal character, arising out of actual residence in the territory of the State; and as a foreigner cannot plead in this country the privileges accorded to him in his own country, he must on the other hand be placed at no disadvantage in this country because he is a foreigner. Thus the witness need only take the oath which the law of his place of residence prescribes, and can refuse to answer on any point on which that law does not force him to reply. And, unless there be a treaty which lays down a different rule, and is binding upon him as a subject of one of the States in treaty, no witness can be compelled to appear before a foreign court to give evidence; for the obligations of witnesses are to be construed strictly, and a journey to a foreign country cannot be treated in the same way as a journey to another court in this country. An exception, however, may be made to this rule in cases where demands of the kind are made upon courts situated on the frontier, where a journey into the other plainly does not involve any greater difficulty or disadvantage to a witness than a journey to any tribunal of his own country; but, of course, the witness must be kept perfectly indemnified. But the citation to appear before a foreign court may always be refused if the witness can show that he will be compelled to answer there questions which the laws of his own country would excuse him from answering.¹³ Indeed, much may be said for the proposition that if a witness obeys a citation from a foreign court, he enjoys—apart from any provision of a public treaty to a different effect—a salvus conductus to that court, so that he shall not be compelled to depone any further than he is compelled to do by the law which governs the citation which he has obeyed. It is plain that this rule will conduce to the appearance of the witness before the court which is to determine the cause—a result often much to be desired in the interests of truth.

WHAT LAW MUST THE JUDGE ON WHOM THE DEMAND IS MADE OBSERVE AS REGARDS FORM?

§ 410. We have already said that the judge, upon whom the demand is made, must give absolute obedience to the rules which his own law

¹¹ Cf. Sup. Ct. at Jena, 31st August 1820 (Seuffert, v. note 318).

The German Civilprocessordn. leaves it to the judge who is executing the commission to exercise a compulsiator on the witness.

¹³ Wharton, § 728, to the same effect.

prescribes on matters of form. But may he not, if he is asked to do so along with these rules, observe others, to the observance of which the law of the court in which the process is dependent attaches importance, in so far as it may be possible to do so without doing violence to any absolutely imperative or absolutely prohibitory laws, and without doing violence to the ideas of propriety which prevail in the territory of the judge who is executing the commission?¹⁴ This question must undoubtedly, in accordance with international practice, be answered in the affirmative.¹⁵ All the more must it be so answered, as in not a few cases it may be very doubtful how far the form and the substance of the step of procedure in question can be distinguished, while the rule is plain that form must be ruled by the law of the judge who executes substance by that of the judge who issues the commission. The attack which Bülow¹⁶ has very recently delivered against this position is unfounded. The judge who executes the commission is, in his relations to the request made by some foreign tribunal, by no means confined to what he could do by consent of parties if the matter were entirely one belonging to the country where he sits. The question here is not one as to the whims or desires of private persons; it is a question as to the weight that may be given in fairness to the fact that the courts of a foreign State may have views different from ours as to some indispensable requisite of legal procedure, and our object is to prevent substantial justice from being defeated by an adherence to the letter of the law.¹⁷ Thus, for instance, there would be nothing to prevent a court, in a country where oaths are administered without reference to any particular religious confession, administering an oath with some addition of that kind, if a foreign court particularly requested that that should be done. The court in which the suit really depends, must, as we have already said, determine how far such an addition is essential for the determination of the question raised in the suit, and accordingly the party, whose oath is to be taken, has to consider whether he will acquiesce in this demand.¹⁸ On the other hand, a demand that a person should emit at his place of residence an oath in some form, which would involve, according to the views that prevail in that country, an unwarrantable depreciation of the character and credibility of the ¹⁴ Such a request by a foreign court may, however, also be refused if compliance with the request would involve an unreasonable burden upon the court to which it is addressed.

¹⁵ See Heffter, § 39, ii.; Brocher, N. Tr. § 171; Wharton, § 730; Fiore, Effetti, § 231; Beach-Lawrence, iii. pp. 419, 420.

¹⁷ In my opinion the court needs no special statutory or customary authority to warrant such compliance, as Wach thinks. The general comitas nationum, by virtue of which we may support the legal system of a foreign country, if our own does not suffer thereby, is quite sufficient. We must of course dismiss the idea that the judge of this country acts directly on the authority of the foreign judge.

deponent, must be refused proprio motu by the judge as an unworthy artifice. An instance of this would be a demand that a caution by a clergyman, a thing unknown to the practice of the court in which the demand is made, should be addressed to the deponent.¹⁹

After what we have said, we need not discuss the proposition that requisitions in matters of voluntary jurisdiction should be complied with, if the native courts have no reason to regard the procedure of the foreign court as an invasion of their own jurisdiction.

B. EFFECT TO BE GIVEN TO JUDGMENTS PRONOUNCED BY A FOREIGN COURT.

1. INTRODUCTORY. OLDER THEORIES.

§ 411. The effect and the execution of judgments pronounced by a foreign court was a subject discussed by the jurists of the Middle Ages.^{1 2} In conducting that discussion they applied—without any hesitation, and without having regard to the different conditions of the courts of the Roman Empire, which were the courts of one undivided State—passages of Roman law, whereby judges are bound to support each the other's authority, to the case of the courts of different States; in this course they were not wholly without some excuse,³ since, in theory at least, up to the beginning of the second half of the Middle Ages, all jurisdiction was in the last resort traced up either to the Emperor or the Pope, and it was thought to be the duty of the brachium seculare, and of the judicatories of the Church, to support each other.⁴

But when, as the territorial supremacy of different States was fully developed in later times, these authorities were seen to be inapplicable, the earlier practice which had obtained in the States of the continent of Europe was not without importance. No doubt, it was assumed that in strict law no State could be bound to recognise, still less to carry into execution, the judgments pronounced by the courts of other countries; but it was said that they were in use so to be recognised and put in execution ob reci-

¹ In this paragraph, when we speak of foreign judgments or the judgments of foreign courts, it is to be understood that the term does not include the judgments of such judicial bodies as are specially established by our State in any foreign country by virtue of public treaties. The judgments pronounced by a consul of our country in its name abroad are judgments of this country, and must be recognised as such. Demangeat on Fœlix, ii. p. 40, note.

procam utilitatem et ex comitate,⁵ provided that the court recognising them had jurisdiction, and the interests of the country to which it belonged—or, as it was more commonly expressed, the interests of the subjects of that country—were not impaired by the recognition or execution. The older writers, however, do not lay it down quite distinctly when such exceptions would occur.

But the development of the idea of the sovereignty of the State, which gradually grew up, was calculated to give rise to special difficulties. It was thought that a judgment, as an act of the State authority, was necessarily confined in its operation to the territory of that State, unless the authority of another State and territory made some express provision to the contrary. It is not entirely accidental that the jurisprudence and the legislation of France are the first to hold this theory,⁶ whereas on the other hand German jurisprudence shows several attempts, even before the recent impulse which theories of international law received since the time of Savigny, to reconcile the recognition and execution of foreign judgments with a complete concession of all that is involved in the idea of territorial sovereignty.

Some have sought a foundation for the recognition of foreign judgments in the assertion that any other procedure would imply an invasion of the jurisdiction of the foreign State.⁷ It may, however, be said in reply to this, that to refuse to recognise a judgment pronounced abroad does not do away with it, but merely confines its operation to the territory of its own State, and that we can assign no exact limit to the jurisdiction belonging to different States, since it is not every judgment pronounced in a foreign country that will be unconditionally recognised by another.

Others⁸ simply assert that the sentence of a foreign judge

⁵ P. Voet, de Stat. x. c. 14; Huber, § 6; J. Voet, de Stat. § 7. When the German Empire existed, the courts of the various territories could, under certain circumstances, be forced to recognise and to assist each other. This compulsitor, resting as it did on the subordination of the sovereigns to the authority of the Empire, has, in the present time, disappeared. Mittermaier, Archiv. für Civil Praxis, vol. xiv. p. 84. Cf. Spangenberg, in Linde's Zeitschrift für Civilr. und Process. iii. p. 423; Haas, de Effectu. § 12; Strippelman, ii. 1, p. 1.

Burge, iii. p. 1050; Wheaton, i. p. 148; Fœlix, ii. § 328; Massé, § 298.

V. Bulmerincq, p. 233, seems to regard the common interest which all States have in the administration of justice as a ground for the reciprocal recognition and execution of civil judgments.

⁶ French practice rests upon the 121st art. of the Royal Ordinance of 15th June 1629, and articles 1223 and 1228 of the Code Civil, "L'hypothèque judiciaire résulte des jugemens . . . L'hypothèque ne peut . . . résulter des jugemens rendus en pays étrangers, qu'autant qu'ils ont été déclarés exécutoires par un tribunal français; sans préjudice des dispositions qui peuvent être dans les lois politiques ou dans les traités. Les contrats passés en pays étranger ne peuvent donner d'hypothèques sur les biens de France, s'il n'y a des dispositions contraires dans les lois politiques ou dans les traités."

So, too, in art. 546 of the Cocde de procédure: "Les jugemens rendus par les tribunaux étrangers, et les actes recus par des officiers étrangers, ne seront susceptibles d'exécution en France, que de la manière et dans les cas prévus par les articles 1223 et 1228 du Code Napoléon."

⁷ Vattel, ii. § 350. Cf. too, Puffendorf, Observat. Juris Univers. i. observ. 28, § 8 ad fin.

⁸ Kamptz (Beiträge zum Staats-u-Völkerrechte, Berlin 1815, i. 115-136) takes this view, and appeals to the rule "locus regit actum;" Wetzell (System des Civilprocesses, § 38). So, gives rise to a jus quaesitum; this is, however, simply a petitio principii.

Others, again, assimilate the judgment to a contract: they say that a judgment, resting as it does upon a quasi contract, must be recognised just as a bargain concluded in a foreign country would be.⁹ But, although a process might be regarded as a contract under older Roman law, in which the parties by an obligation bound themselves formally to recognise the judgment, and although, too, the effect of a process once instituted, and of the judgment, might even in later Roman law be referred to a quasi-contract, yet this contract owes its origin to a compulsitor which the State permits to be used against the defender; it is to the authority of the State that the validity of the process and of the judgment are in the last recourse to be referred;¹⁰ and it is plain that, in the procedure of modern times, where, if the defender refuses to appear, he is held by a fiction to have become a party to the suit, the theory of an agreement ex contractu can only apply if the parties recognise the jurisdiction of some particular court by a real agreement and no mere fiction.

Lastly, in our own times appeals have been made simply to the comitas nationum ob reciprocam utilitatem.¹¹ What we have said in general on the principle of the comitas is sufficient to show the inadequacy of this theory.¹²

2. THE JUDGMENT OR JUDICIAL SENTENCE AN APPLICATION OF THE LAW TO SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES.

§ 412. On the other hand, the following theory, which was enunciated in my first edition, has lately found many adherents.

too, apparently Sup. Ct. of Cassel, 21st Feb. 1854 (Seuff. xi. § 104). See, on the other hand, Muheim, p. 303. K. S. Zacharia (Crome und Jaup. Germania, vol. ii. p. 229) sets up two points of view: 1st, that of private international law, according to which nations stand in their natural relations to each other, and recognise no overlord; 2nd, the point of view of public international law, according to which the different States are members of an international body under a common law. According to the former, which he describes as being at present the practical point of view, a foreign judgment will not be recognised; it can only be carried out in some exceptional cases on the basis of the principles which regulate agreements and compromises; or the subjects of a State must have had procedure taken against them in a foreign State according to their own law; or the judgment must be a deliverance upon some act that has taken place in the foreign State. According to the second theory, foreign judgments must be recognised unconditionally.

¹⁰ Cf. Fœlix, ii. No. 318; Moreau, § 96.

¹¹ Massé, § 298; Martens, Précis. § 94; Burge, iii. p. 150; Wheaton, i. p. 148; Wächter, ii. p. 417; Fœlix, ii. § 328.

The judicial sentence is most accurately defined as a lex specialis, a law for the particular case which is in dispute. In cases where parties are not at variance, the law in general puts a constraint upon the free will of the persons affected, although its operation may be tacit. So, in cases where a dispute arises, the law puts the same constraint upon the free will of the parties by the interposition of the court. This is simply the concrete application of the law in general,¹³ and if it could be ascertained with absolute certainty that it always was in truth an accurate application of it, that in other words the judicial sentence always completely corresponded with the law in the abstract, there could then be no doubt that the recognition of foreign judgments must follow, on exactly the same principles as those which regulate the recognition of the operation of foreign statutes or foreign law upon particular legal relations, i.e. the application of the legal rules of other countries. We should plainly have to set up this proposition viz.: "If the law of a particular State rules some particular claim, then the judicial sentence pronounced in that State upon that claim must also be recognised as authoritative."¹⁴ At the same time, we should have to recognise all those judgments, to which the parties have, either by anticipation or after they have been pronounced, submitted themselves either expressly or tacitly, in so far at least as these judgments deal with legal relations, which parties are free to deal with as they please. For, if parties are to have any power of exercising their free will in international relations, they must have it in cases, where they do not exercise it directly, but exercise it by recognising the rule laid down in the sentence of a court.

It is interesting to notice that even some of the older authors, and among them those of the highest reputation, were on their way to the solution of the problem. Burgundus (Tract. iii. Utrum sententiae excedant territorium?) is one of them. Just as he divides statuta into realia, personalia

¹³ See, for instance, § 1 of the German Constitutional Statute: "Judicial powers are to be exercised by independent courts subject to the law alone." On the other hand, as a general rule, there is no inclination to advocate the execution of the sentences or proceedings of foreign officials, the reason being that these do not represent purely the concrete will or purpose of the law, but are influenced also by considerations of expediency.

¹⁴ See Wharton, § 671: "It is impossible not to recognise the force of this view. The whole structure of private international law rests on this principle, that whatever is the forum, the law by which a case is to be tried is to be that to which, on its merits, it is subject. And the judgment of a competent court is an official certificate of what the law in such country is." So, too, v. Martens, § 82. Similarly Phillimore, § 937; Fiore, Effetti, pp. 11 and 73; all these writers lay down directly that there is a legal obligation to recognise the judgments of a competent foreign court. Haus, Dr. p. n. 147; Olivi (Revue générale de droit, 1887, p. 521), "nier toute expansion et tout effet extraterritorial à la décision judiciaire c'est suivant nous nier au principal toute expansion extraterritorial des lois nationales." According to Olivi, the judgment must give effect to the meaning of the legislator. See Brocher, Traité Franco-Suisse, p. 6, "il existe entre la compétence législative et la compétence judiciaire des rapports naturels et, dans une certaine mesure, nécessaires." Calvo (ii. § 860) seems to hold that some such relations exist; he refers to the statute theory of the substantive legislation. The results, however, which he draws from these relations are a little indefinite (see § 860 ad fin.): Daguin is the most prominent representative of the theory of lex specialis in the most recent times. See, too, Halleck-Baker, i. p. 198.

and mixta, so he sets up three kinds of actions in connection with the execution and recognition of foreign judgments—viz. actiones reales, personales, and mixtae. He, too, proceeds from the axiom that the right of legislation and the authority to pronounce judicial determinations correspond with each other in international law. But he throws the question into confusion again by giving an effectus personalis to a judgment upon real rights pronounced by some other court than the judex rei sitæ; and, on the other hand, by confining the effect of a sententia, which imposes some duty of acting or refraining from acting upon a party, primarily to the territory in which it is pronounced, while he proposes that it should not be recognised abroad unless with the concurrence of the judge of the foreign territory, but gives no rules to regulate the giving or the withholding of that concurrence.

Boullenois, who takes the same division as his starting-point (i. p. 601), proceeds more correctly. He recognises not merely judgments upon questions of status, which alone are included by Burgundus in the class of actiones personales, but also other deliverances, which compel some personal payment or prestation, pronounced in foro domicilii of the defender: he maintains, also, that foreign judgments pronounced by any judge other than the judex rei sitæ in actiones reales (real actions referring to immoveable estate) are ineffectual in a foreign country; but he takes away the foundation of his own theory by laying down the rule that the recognition of foreign judgments affecting real property in this country is at variance with the sovereign rights of the State; this reason, if it were sound, would not only establish what he desires, but would demonstrate that all judgments pronounced in a foreign country are entirely ineffectual, since all legal relations which it is proposed should bear some effect in this country are thereby amenable to the sovereignty of this State as fully as immoveables situated there. At the same time, in his view the forum contractus is without further inquiry recognised in its widest range, whereas the judgment pronounced by a foreign court in a case specially submitted to its decision by agreement of parties is not allowed the force of a final decree, but merely admitted to provisional execution, although the reason of this limitation is not made plain. But, lastly, it is not clear how the forum domicilii can rule actiones personales which did not take their rise there, but are rather subject to another system of law—e.g. that which prevails at the place of the execution of the contract, or at the seat of a previous domicile.

There is, however, no lack of opponents of our theory. They deny the analogy between the lex generalis and the lex specialis which we say is implied in the judicial sentence. For, they say, the operation of the territorial sovereign authority is far more intense and direct in the case of the judicial sentence, than it is in the case of the general rule of law;¹⁵ or, to put it in a more generally intelligible way, a recognition of foreign legal rules does not, they say, by any means necessitate a recognition of foreign judicial sentences, for it is not so easy to try foreign judgments as to try foreign statutes by the test of whether they rest upon a fundamental principle which we cannot possibly adopt, whether in truth they are not in flat contradiction of our jus publicum, or whether they are not the outcome of incapacity or of caprice.¹⁶ If this view prevails, the only course left is the course of pure positivism,¹⁷ and in particular the remedy of international treaties.

But, if it is impossible to set up any general theory as to the recognition of foreign judgments, what is to be the principle on which these international treaties, the only means of salvation, are to be drawn up?¹⁸ Does not pure positivism inevitably lead in the end to unsolved and insoluble disputes? We must then for better or worse try to set up a general theory, and we are all the more inclined to make the attempt, since the arguments of our opponents, which we have just stated, are by no means unanswerable. It is quite true to say that the recognition of foreign judgments implies a certain measure of confidence in the administration of affairs in foreign countries. It is a familiar fact that Christian States have withdrawn their subjects more or less from the judicial jurisdiction of non-Christian States, either by special treaties or by a course of custom. The operation of the general statute law of these non-Christian States upon the subjects of Christian States is much less restricted. Such cases as these are very different, however, from the principle of refusing to recognise any judicial determinations pronounced in foreign countries. For this principle would make us refuse to recognise foreign judgments, even when these dealt exclusively with subjects of the States whose courts pronounced them. We shall see that, for the most part, even those who are inclined to go furthest in denying the authority of foreign judgments, are careful to guard themselves against the full logical results of their own principle in this respect.

The sound theory, that the judgment of the court is the concrete living law, and must logically receive the same recognition as the general statute law itself receives, not unfrequently breaks into view even with those who deny it on principle. See, for instance, Bard, § 240. The phrase used by several French authors e.g. in the case of judgments by competent courts in questions of status, viz. the "ascertainment of a fact," a process which they propose to recognise, for the simple reason that the refusal to do so would lead to utter confusion, is simply an instance of the partial recognition of the true principle.

3. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN Res Judicata, ON THE ONE HAND, AND EXECUTION ON THE OTHER. NECESSARY CONDITIONS OF THE FORMER.

§ 413. If on principle there is to be no recognition of foreign judgments, there is no room for drawing any distinction between the execution of a foreign judgment and the simple acceptance of it as res judicata.¹⁹ Foreign judicial sentences are to be treated as simple nullities according to that theory. All parties may appear to plead before our courts exactly as if there had been no judgment given in the matter. There are no such things as the exceptio and the replicatio rei judicate; and another miserable result,²⁰ which is generally overlooked, is, that if execution has taken place abroad under the authority of the foreign judgment, the party against whom diligence has thus been done may raise action for repayment in our courts (a condictio ex injusta causa, according to the terminology of the Romans); and he will be successful if our courts take a different view of the case from that which was taken by the foreign court; and then again, if there should be property within the foreign State susceptible of being taken in execution, another action for reimbursement might be raised in the foreign country by the party who had been condemned here. That would be a circulus inextricabilis and a war between the judicial system of this country and the other, or all others, to the very serious prejudice of commerce, and all because it is assumed that the judicial system of another civilised country is partial and irregular. Can it really be maintained that it is worthy of the dignity of any State, or that it furthers the interests of any State, to refuse to recognise foreign judgments even in cases where, on the one hand, they are pronounced by the State to which the regulation and control of the legal relations in dispute undoubtedly belong, and where, on the other hand, any judgment by the courts of our State in review of the foreign judgment, and to a different effect, could not attain the practical result which ought to follow from it, because the legal relation in question is, as a matter of fact, exempt from the operation of the sovereign authority of our State in all its leading branches? Does it not approach the ridiculous to refuse to recognise the plea of res judicata where the judgment has been pronounced on a question of *status*²¹ in the country to which the parties plainly and exclusively belong, whether by domicile or by citizenship, or to refuse to do so where the judgment deals with a real right in immoveable property, and is the judgment of the forum rei sitæ? Has the party to whom we give the right of property in some real property situated abroad, that right as a matter of fact, if the forum rei sitæ, and thus the State within whose sphere of sovereignty the property actually lies, does not recognise his right? Is it not a most potent encouragement to mala fides if we allow a man, who has of his own accord appealed to a foreign tribunal, or has without objection submitted himself to it, to try his luck anew before the courts of this country upon the very same matter.²²

¹⁶ Fusinato, L'assessorato, p. 61.

¹⁷ See Wach, Civilproc. p. 227, to this effect.

¹⁸ Fiore, Exp. § 29, raises this question.

§ 414. On the other hand, we may, it is admitted, avoid such a judicial war with all its intolerable consequences, if we exclude foreign judgments from execution in this country as a matter of principle, or admit it only in exceptional cases, while, on the other hand, we recognise as res judicata the sentences of these foreign courts. It is one thing to deny aid to a foreign judgment, and quite another to upset the condition of things which has actually come to pass in consequence of the foreign judgment. Most authors²³

²¹ It is familiar that even French practice recognises the force of a foreign judgment pronounced in the country to which the parties belong, in what are called "questions d'état." Even Moreau sees that he is driven to admit this much. He conceals the contradiction with the help of the phrase (§ 236), "L'homme importe avec lui ses attributs juridiques." But legal attributes are not the same as physical qualities; they are brought into being by the very recognition of the operation of statutes and legal decisions. See the discussions in J. ix. p. 176, on the French rules in questions "d'état": see J. x. p. 51, on the similar rules of Belgian law. No declaration is required that the judgment should receive effect. See J. viii. p. 99 and Van der Rest, Rev. xvi. p. 143.

²² See Trib. of Antwerp, 31st October 1873 (Rev. viii. p. 494), for the recognition of a foreign judgment in a case of voluntary submission to it. Haus, Dr. p. § 153, and Piggott, p. 40. The latter quotes Erle (C. J.): "It would be contrary to all principle for the party who had chosen such tribunal and got what was awarded, to seek a better judgment in respect of the same matter from another tribunal." [Barber v. Lamb, 1860, 29, L. J. C. p. 234.] Gianzana, ii. §§ 146, 147, expresses himself to the same effect; that in the doctrine of Italian jurisprudence. See, too, the judgment cited by Gianzana, of the Court of Cassation at Turin on 30th June 1882, and the exposition there given of the French doctrine.

See, too, Francke, Zeitschr. f. d. Civilproc. viii. p. 118.

recognise this vital distinction. There is no real force in the argument used by those who take the opposite view, that the simple recognition of the exceptio rei judicatæ is in substance execution of the foreign judgment, or may easily pass into it, if, for example, the victor in the first process is made defender in the second, and uses the claim which was litigated in the former action to defend himself in the second action as a res judicata. But here it is forgotten that it is not through the operation of the sovereign power of the State that the defender in the second action is placed in that favourable position. But, of course, we must refuse to allow the plea of res judicata to have a negative effect, in courts and countries in which all positive effect is denied to it as a basis on which to do diligence or execution, and the party who would otherwise appeal to this positive effect is put at a disadvantage. In other words, if a person brings action upon a claim which was previously disposed of in a foreign judgment, because he cannot obtain execution of that foreign judgment, the plea of res judicata cannot be set up against him. If this were not so, the pursuer would be left without any legal remedy, if the defender could succeed in transporting himself and his property into a country in which execution of foreign judgments is unknown. He would be unable either to advance his original claims anew or to use the judgment which he had obtained.²⁴

§ 415. But, if we assume that the view, by which a vital difference is held to exist between simple recognition of the exceptio or replicatio on the one hand,²⁵ and positive execution of the foreign decree on the other, is correct, that will lead us on to the conclusion that we must not infer, from the fact that a statute provides that foreign judgments shall be accorded execution under certain conditions only, that therefore all these conditions must attend the simple recognition of the res judicata. It is quite sound to assume that, in all cases in which execution is accorded, that being the plus, there will be recognition of the res judicata, that being the minus included in the plus. But the converse proposition, the negative of the proposition we have admitted, is wrong. It is the old fallacy which so often takes place in attempting to convert a sound proposition.²⁶ In particular, it is foolish to judgment as a lex specialis, remarks: "Thus the recognition of the sentence of a court constitutes part of the duty of every civilised State, just as much as the obligation to recognise the statutes of a foreign country. To refuse to fulfil this duty would be a negation of all private international law."

²⁴ In reference to this particular case, see Francke, Zeitschr. für Deutschen Civilprocess. viii. p. 114.

²⁶ It is quite true that the majority of German writers of the present day are of an opposite opinion as regards the provisions of § 661 of the German Civilprocessordn. They found on a judgment of the Imperial Court. This much-canvassed judgment of the First Civil Division (Senat) of 29th Jan. 1882 (Dec. viii. No. 115, p. 385) does not blink the fact that it may seem associate the recognition of a res judicata—putting out of view altogether the execution of foreign decrees—with any other conditions save this alone, that the court, from which the judgment issued, shall be a competent court. To refuse to recognise res judicata in cases in which the other State does not show reciprocity, is dangerous and confusing for the legal order and administration of justice in both States, and is not a suitable means of compulsion to use against the non-recognising State. The foreign judgment is just as likely to be in favour of our citizen as against him, and, if it were attempted to confine non-recognition of foreign judgments to cases where our citizen suffers, still succession, assignation, or a process of bankruptcy in which some citizens of ours were interested as creditors, might transform a res judicata, which seemed to be a hardship to one of our citizens, into a a serious matter to extend at once the provisions of § 661, which deal with execution, to the exceptio rei judicatæ, which is a part of substantive law; and that all the more as in the memorandum (motiven) attached to that section there was no mention of it, while the two things cannot be placed in the same rank. But the kernel of the judgment seems to be, as disclosed in the grounds of judgment, that the recognition of foreign judgments—of course, to a certain extent only—was a purely positive creation of the German Civilprozessordn. For “the obligatory force of the judgment is based, not upon the will of the parties, but upon its own peculiar character as the deliverance of the competent organ of the sovereign power. Its authority will in itself extend no further than this sovereign power extends. There is no such thing as any duty laid by public law upon States to recognise or to execute the judgments of other States, apart, that is, from treaty provisions.” The judgment then goes on to say that this recognition exists only as a consequence of more modern developments,” and thus, as regards the exceptio rei judicatæ, rests upon the reciprocity “which is inherent in the nature of the thing.” But, in the first place, it is forgotten that even the execution of foreign judgments is by no means a mere creation of modern legislation, that it rests in many countries, and in particular in the territory of the German common law, on a practice of centuries, and that, therefore, the provisions of the Ordnung on this head have not by any means taken possession of a vacuum. Again, the argument on the powerlessness of the sovereign power to act in a foreign territory would prove that the statute law of a State could have no effect beyond its own territory, and that the operation of the will of parties must also be limited to their own country. Is it not the case that the will of the parties draws all its obligatory force from the law which declares it to have that force?

We can understand that, as a consequence of this decision of the Imperial Court, the attempt has already been made to begin that conflict of jurisdictions, which is the inevitable result of refusing to recognise res judicata altogether, or of recognising it only under the conditions of § 661 of the Ordnung. See the case in Blum's Annalen (i. No. 74, p. 123), in which a party against whom judgment had gone in a foreign court raised an action for repetition in a German court. The Imperial court (iv.), by a judgment of 30th Oct. 1884, cut short this war, and laid down that even although there was no reciprocity in giving exequatur to judgments, a claim of repetition would not necessarily be allowed, because the second judgment, to be pronounced by the German court, would be to a different effect from that pronounced by the foreign court. This latter judgment is sound in fact and practically useful. I cannot discover, however, how to reconcile it with the other.

But still, most commentators follow the former decision. E.g. Struckmann and Koch, on § 608, note 10. Seuffert, ibid. note 8; Wilmowski-Levi, ibid. note 1, and Wach, p. 227.

But see Siebenhaar, p. 626, for the proper view, viz. that the German Processordnung did not prescribe conditions for recognising res judicata in its 661st section. Francke, p. 112, represents the intermediate view that judgments of condemnation will only found pleas of res judicata under the conditions of that section, while judgments of absolutor will give rise to the plea without any such conditions. This intermediate view does indeed avoid some of the surprising results noted in the text, in particular that violation of Bona Fides, which consists in allowing the pursuer to put on one side the judgment which he has himself invoked, if it matter of the most substantial advantage for him. Any selfish restrictions in this matter, which are not strict deductions from legal principles, are very apt to recoil upon the State which sets them up.

We should say that the sole condition for the recognition of a res judicata, is the competency of the court in which the judgment is pronounced.²⁷ We must add, as we have already pointed out, that, where we refuse to give a party execution, we must not allow the exceptio rei judicatæ to be used against him, when he brings a new action to enforce his original demand.

NOTE WW ON §§ 413-415. RES JUDICATA AND EXECUTION.

¶ [The distinction taken in the text between admitting a foreign judgment to execution, and recognising it as a res judicata, exists to some extent in the laws both of Scotland and England, the principal practical difference being that execution will not be given upon the foreign decree qua decree, it being necessary to raise a new action in the Scots or English courts to obtain their warrant for execution, whereas a res judicata requires no process in the Scots or English courts to assert its right to be recognised without examination.

The law of Scotland requires that action should be raised there for execution of a foreign judgment, and the principle on which such actions are determined is thus stated by Lord Jeffrey, in a judgment in which a decree pronounced by an American court was founded on for execution in Scotland. His Lordship found "that the judgment libelled of the Court of Chancery of the State of New York, being a foreign decree, is not of the same authority as a final decree of the courts of this country, and can only subsequently become his interest to do so. But the theory seems, nevertheless, to be untenable from Francke's point of view. For the Civilprozessordnung either intended that the general principles of res judicata should remain standing along with § 661, or it did not. If it did, these principles are applicable alike to judgments of absolutor and to condemnatory judgments. If it did not, then the distinction seems to be a juridical phantom.

The question whether the judgment is such as to constitute res judicata is a question to be determined exclusively by the law of the State whose court has pronounced the judgment. That follows from the principle laid down in the text. Since the ascertainment and declarator of any concrete legal relation by a judicial sentence must be in accordance with the law to which the declarator and ascertainment belongs in abstracto by virtue of general legal principles, this State must also determine what conditions are essential to a determination of the legal relation that shall be valid, except as against special forms of challenge. There is, therefore, no need for any conception of legal validity which shall be universally recognised by all nations as a sound conception. I doubt if such a conception could be arrived at. All we need to ask is, Is the sentence pronounced by the court a sentence which, according to the law of the court so pronouncing it, must at once be assumed in any other process to be a sentence that cannot be disputed? The objection that our law would not give the same force to a similar judgment, and that a foreign judgment cannot have more force than one by the courts of this country, fails. If it were so, we should have to refuse recognition to a foreign judgment, because in its country the judgment of one appeal court was sufficient to make it final, whereas in this country we have two appeals. The guarantees for the validity of any judgment must be looked for in the law to which it belongs.

be considered as affording prima facie evidence of the truth and justice of the claims of the pursuers, but is liable to be impugned on the part of the defenders—not merely by proof of want of jurisdiction in the court from which it issued, or of its having been pronounced in the absence of the defender, or of material irregularities and informalities in the course of the proceedings—but also by proof of its having proceeded on error of fact, or even on error of law, more especially when the law applicable to the case was not the proper law of the country where the suit was tried and determined” (Southgate v. Montgomerie, 9th Feb. 1837, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. xv. p. 507). In the case of Whitehead v. Thompson (20th March 1861, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiii. p. 773), this case was referred to with approval, and it was laid down that a foreign judgment is examinable on grounds, clearly and relevantly stated, going to impeach its validity and its justice. The principle is stated, too, by Erskine, iv. 3, 4, and the only qualification it has received from modern authority is, that the case is not to be retried, but that it is competent to order distinct allegations assailing either the procedure of the foreign court, or the law or facts on which its judgment is based, to be sent to proof. There are not, however, wanting indications in recent cases that the rule in Scotland tends to approach that of England, according to which it is not allowable to refuse effect to a foreign judgment on the ground of error in fact or in law. For instance, Lord Fraser, in the case of Pattisson v. M'Vicar (5th Feb. 1886, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xiii. p. 555), doubts whether Lord Jeffrey's dictum is not too broadly expressed, and he says “the judgment of a foreign court, of competent jurisdiction, is more than prima facie evidence; it is conclusive, and is given effect to.” His Lordship, however, cites no authority for this proposition, and it would seem that the law is more correctly stated by Lord McLaren in the subsequent case of Gudin (8th Dec. 1886, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xiv. p. 216): “It may be, and I think is, the law of Scotland that a decree or judgment of the superior courts of England” (the foreign country in that case) “is examinable when founded on for execution in this part of the United Kingdom. But it is to be executed, if after examination it is found to be regular. By examination, I do not understand to be meant a retrial of the cause on issues of fact or law. . . . Instances of such irregularities” (i.e. irregularities that would induce the Scots court to refuse effect to foreign decrees), “whether as to jurisdiction, form, or substance, may be figured.” The substance of the decree is thus open to be assailed as well as the jurisdiction of the court that pronounced it, or the form in which the decree is cast. But a retrial of the case is not to be allowed either on issues of fact or law: as regards issues of fact, the meaning of this is plain enough; the judgment of the foreign court is to be treated as the verdict of a jury is treated, and is not to be set aside merely because the court of review would, on a balance of the evidence, have come to a different conclusion. It must have been pronounced in disregard of the evidence led, or some part of it, or facts which are material to the issue must have been excluded from view. As regards errors in law, it is not so easy to see what his Lordship means ; it may, however, be that what is meant is that, if the foreign court have allowed parties full opportunity of informing them of the law in question, and have applied their minds to the information so given to them, the court of this country will not set aside their judgment, more especially if the law in question be the law of a third country, as to which the court has no sources of information different in kind from those open to the foreign court. In this latter case, the law of the matter becomes a fact to be ascertained by evidence.

If, however, the Scots court were satisfied that a foreign judgment had been obtained by any concealment or misrepresentation, they would after examination refuse to give decree conform (Wilson v. Robertson, 1884, Ct. of Sess Reps. 4th ser. xi. p. 893). That principle would, undoubtedly, receive effect as regards a foreign judgment. In the particular case, Lord Rutherford Clark doubted if the court could examine the decree, but his doubt depended on the terms of the Judgments Extension Act, the decree being a decree proceeding from an English court.

But in the converse case—viz. where the foreign judgment, instead of being put forward as a ground for execution, is put forward as a plea of res judicata in answer to a demand made anew by a pursuer who has failed to establish his claim in a foreign court, or in answer to one who demands restitution against a sentence pronounced and executed abroad—the foreign judgment cannot be examined. The reason of this Erskine puts thus: “For the defender, in whose favour the decree was given, does not in such case apply to the court for its aid, but, on the contrary, rests entirely on the sentence recovered by him in a foreign court confessedly competent in the cause; and so in effect excepts to the jurisdiction of the judge before whom he is called as having no authority over that court, nor any right of reviewing its sentences” (Erskine, ut cit.) So, too, Lord Braxfield, L.J.C., in Watson (21st Jan. 1792, Bell’s 8vo cases, p. 107): “A res judicata is good all the world over. The courts here would have no right to review this final judgment.” But these dicta do not apply to decrees in absence, and generally a judgment, to claim such effect, must be “regularly and solemnly pronounced.” More on Stair, p. 6.

In England and America, as in Scotland, the procedure by which execution is done upon the judgment of a foreign court, is by raising an action in the English courts founded upon this judgment, just in the same way as if the claim were one arising out of a contract. The foreign judgment must, of course, be such as execution could follow upon in the country where it was pronounced, and must not be subject to appeal there (Patrick v. Shedden, 1855, 22 L. J., Q. B. 283, Paul v. Roy, 1852, 21 L. J. Chan. 361). The same rule on this latter point obtains in Scotland (Pattisson v. M’Vicar, ut sup.). In England, again, to warrant execution of a foreign judgment, the court which pronounced the judgment must have been competent to do so, either as being a court of the domicile of the defender, or of the country of his nationality. That the contract on which judgment was given was intended to be performed in the same foreign country is "a very material circumstance," but the possession of landed property is not thought to be sufficient to justify a foreign court in exercising a general jurisdiction over the person possessing it. The English courts would not recognise the abnormal jurisdiction claimed by the French courts in all cases where the pursuer is a French subject. There must also have been due citation of the defender, and the judgment must not impinge upon the maintenance of public order or of morality in England. A foreign judgment, when thus obtained in a competent court, unless it has been so obtained by fraud, cannot, as a general rule, be questioned either for error in law or for error in fact. This is true even when the law applicable to the case was English law, and was misinterpreted by the foreign court; and the maxim applies both to the case of a foreign pursuer who comes to England to enforce the decree he has obtained abroad, and to the case of a defender who protects himself in England by pleading a foreign judgment as res judicata. The American rule is substantially the same (Wharton, §§ 647 et seq.).

By the Judgments Extension Act of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 54), judgments of the supreme courts of one of Scotland, England, or Ireland will have the effect of judgments of the supreme courts of the other two if duly registered, as directed by the Act, in the other two territories. This enactment applies to decrees in absence as well as to decrees in foro, unless when the decree in absence is pronounced in Scotland after jurisdiction has been founded by arrestment.]

4. NATURE OF JURISDICTION WHICH MUST BE RECOGNISED BY ALL NATIONS. CONFLICTING VIEWS. GUIDING PRINCIPLE.

§ 416. The question is, what are the conditions under which a court of law is to be considered to have jurisdiction for international purposes,²⁸ i.e. to the effect of entitling its decisions to be regarded as res judicata? Judgments are not recognised as res judicatæ, unless all enquiry into the facts

on which the original claim proceeds is excluded, the merits of the case recognised as finally determined, and the only point remaining for enquiry being the point as to whether such a judgment has actually been pronounced.²⁹

The older school of lawyers did not specially discuss this question. They proceeded upon the view that the jurisdiction of a court, founded as it was on the common law, must everywhere be governed by principles that were in substance identical, and that these universal principles were in conformity with the nature of the subject. In modern times, in which positive legislation has created many and various systems of rules for determining jurisdiction, we must make a more searching enquiry.

In the first place, this question may be raised: Is it enough that the courts generally of the country, in which the judgment was pronounced, had jurisdiction, or must that particular court which gave the judgment be found to have had jurisdiction? The answer cannot be doubtful, if we remember that the apportionment of different classes of cases to the different courts of a country, is a matter which must necessarily be left to the discretion of the State to which the courts belong, i.e. is a question merely of the domestic law of that particular State. Other States have no interest in the matter except to see that no one of the community of States trespasses upon the jurisdiction of any other by means of the judicial decisions which its courts are empowered to pronounce.³⁰

According to one view, it is sufficient³¹ that the judge who pronounces judgment is competent by his own law. But this is simply to place in the hands of the foreign legislator the power of invading³² each and every legal relation that exists in our land, by regulations as to the competency of his own courts. This theory has found but few supporters; it cannot be reconciled with the independence and unity of different States.

According to another view, the court from which the judgment proceeds must have jurisdiction according to the law of the other State, in which execution or the recognition of the res judicata is asked.³³ For a State

²⁹ It is inconsistent with the recognition of res judicata that there should be any examination of the proceedings, or that the judgment should merely be recognised as evidence of the justice of the claim, which may be overcome by counter evidence.

³⁰ See Fiore, Eff. § 93. He takes a distinction between jurisdiction which will command international recognition and the competency of a court in its own country; Felix, i. § 126; Wach, p. 232, note; Fusinato, p. 85; Lammasch, § 102, note 13; Ct. of Cass. at Naples, 6th Dec. 1866 (Norsa, Rev. vi. p. 252); Francke, p. 36; Hellmann, § 125, No. 7. The opposite view, in so far as the German Civilprozessordn. is concerned, is represented by Struckmann and Koch, on § 661, No. 6.

³¹ Kori, Erörterungen, iii. p. 12. In modern times, the author of the note in J. viii. p. 537, declares himself in favour of this view. The treaty between Austria and Baden in 1853 (cf. Starr, p. 48, and Koch, Staatsvertr. p. 65) curiously enough contains a provision to this effect.

³³ Feuerbach, p. 94; Wächter, ii. p. 418; Daguin, pp. 104, 105, in agreement with a decision of the French Ct. of Cass. of 27th April 1870. Convention between Baden and Aargau in 1867, art. 9 (Koch, Staatsvertr. p. 87).

cannot refuse to another State what it claims for itself. It may, however, be asked whether there are not many rules of jurisdiction which were intended by our lawgiver to apply merely to the relations of the different courts of his own country, and whether we must not refuse to recognise in this country other rules of jurisdiction, which favour the native of the country where they are in use, when they come to be applied in that country to the relations between our countrymen and the natives. To satisfy this theory, both of these questions must be answered in the negative; but that has not been shown, and hardly could be shown, to be the true answer. Besides, we may also note that the rules of different States on questions of jurisdiction are often so broad in their application that it will very frequently happen that the courts of several States will be competent to deal with one and the same claim:³⁴ if, then, one of the parties brings his action in the courts of A, while the other takes proceedings in the courts of B, the result would be an endless series of insoluble disputes.

This result would be all the more certain, since priority could not form an absolute rule of preference, and it could not be maintained that our State had renounced its right of deciding in the particular case, simply because the process had been instituted first in another country. On the other hand, there are circumstances in which any such principle might lead to a real denial of justice.^{35 36}

In the third place, execution might be given if the court was competent both by its own law and by the law of the country in which execution is to be done. This view would be practically indistinguishable from the

³⁵ If in country A, in which it is intended to enforce the judgment, the courts of the country in which the judgment was pronounced were not considered competent, while the courts of a third State, which again declared themselves to be incompetent, were held to have jurisdiction. Cf. Fusinato, p. 89, and Lammasch in Holtzendorff's Völkerr. iii. § 162, note 11.

Since the question of jurisdiction must be determined on like principles whether we are considering the exceptio rei judicata or an application for execution, the 3rd subsection of section 661 must apply to res judicata.

second, unless it were allowable to have an enquiry before the court of execution into the limits of the jurisdiction of the court which pronounced the decree as these are laid down by its own law. For this latter court, by judging in the cause, has affirmed its own jurisdiction. But such an enquiry would be unprofitable. The court where the suit depended must necessarily be guided solely by its own law, and the court which is asked to give execution will certainly not be better fitted to interpret these laws.

The only course remaining, then, is to set up rules that shall regulate this matter according to general principles of international law.³⁷ Accordingly, we must hold, following out what has been said above, that this proposition is fundamental, viz. :—

The courts of that State, whose law is to rule the claim made in the action, are the courts that should judge in the case; or, to put it more accurately (see supra, p. 80 et seq.), the courts of that State, whose law has given to the claim which is now in dispute its final and determinate shape, are the courts that should judge in the case.

This latter definition is preferable, for it would be impossible, and would destroy all the principles of modern international law, to hold that no court might entertain an action, save the court which, in the actual decision of it, was in a position to regard its own law exclusively.

We are very far from asserting that other important but complementary principles should not be associated with this, the leading principle, e.g. the principle of voluntary subjection, tacit it may be, to the jurisdiction, as we shall proceed to show. But we must find the root of all rules of jurisdiction in the principle just stated. The Institute of International Law has substantially expressed itself to this effect (Ann. i. pp. 125, 126) by saying that it was desirable to have “règles uniformes concernant la compétence des tribunaux,” and that, apart from the forum domicilii, which we shall discuss immediately, the recognition of special fora (fors exceptionnels), “devra surtout avoir pour but de faire décider autant que possible par les juges du pays dont les lois regissent un rapport de droit, les procès qui concernent ce rapport.”

5. THE VARIOUS KINDS OF JURISDICTION TO BE RECOGNISED IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

LEADING CASES IN OUTLINE. PRINCIPLE OF VOLUNTARY SUBJECTION. COMPETENCY OF THE forum domicilii.

§ 417. In questions, therefore, of status and family law, the judex

domicilii will decide; in questions as to things, the judex rei sitæ; ³⁸ questions as to obligatory relations will belong partly to the judex domicilii, partly to the court of the place of the contract or delict. ^{39 40}

This principle, ⁴¹ however, undergoes two modifications—an extension in so far as the defender may consent to subject himself to the jurisdiction of another court, and a limitation in so far as the pursuer may renounce some particular jurisdiction; but from this option there are of course excluded all legal relations over which the parties have not a full power of disposal.

The acquisition of an actual domicile must count as a voluntary submission of all legal relations that are subject to a free power of disposal to the courts of that country, excepting only real rights in heritage, and such moveables as are permanently attached to any particular place. ⁴² The foreigner who sets the centre of his affairs and of his life as a citizen

⁴¹ See Brocher, iii. p. 14; Wharton, § 671, and the authors cited, supra, p. 895, note 14, for the principle that the competency of a court may generally be inferred from the applicability of its laws in an international sense. Some deny all connection between the applicability of the substantive law and the jurisdiction of the courts (e.g. Gerbaut, § 295; Filicier, p. 4). But what principle can these authors apply, except one of pure positivism, which is misleading, in view of the differences that exist between different systems?

in another place, thereby recognises the protection which is afforded to him by the law of that place, and the courts that are established there. If he should require the pursuer to follow him to the forum of his previous domicile in any action dealing with things that are at the free disposal of the parties, because the case has somehow had its origin there, such a demand, giving no advantage to the defender, but likely in most cases to be troublesome to him, would be declared to be ex dolo, and therefore would be refused.⁴³

Conversely, however, if the defender has left his former domicile, or the place in which he came under the obligation in question, or acquired the property which is claimed, and has no more belongings there, the pursuer has no right to appeal to the jurisdiction of that place. He could have enforced his rights sooner, at a time when the defender could have met him there without any inconvenience, and if his right to that jurisdiction was in any peril, he was bound to use arrestments against the debtor or his property: vigilantibus jura sunt scripta. But an exception must be admitted in the case of obligations ex delicto; the person who has received damage must be allowed some more efficient protection than the creditor enjoys in other obligations which rest upon free will, and is all the more entitled to adhere to that jurisdiction which has once been established, irrespective of whether the person who has committed the delict lives at the place where it was committed, or has property there, as in many cases it is not known till afterwards who it was who did commit the delict. In this case the creditor is absolutely entitled to choose between the forum delicti commissi and the forum domicilii.

In dealing with persons who cannot point to any domicile, a residence of a certain duration (to be measured by the discretion of the judge), the residence of French law, must be allowed to constitute a subsidiary forum in place of the forum domicilii.⁴⁴ Otherwise there would be many actions which could never be raised against such persons.

JURISDICTION IN REAL ACTIONS. EXCLUSIVE COMPETENCY OF THE forum rei sitæ AS REGARDS IMMOVEABLES.

§ 418. The exclusion of the forum domicilii in real actions which deal with heritage is justified upon the ground that to assume any voluntary ⁴³ The question may be raised whether it should not be necessary to demand naturalisation or at least an authorised domicile, as Féraud-Giraud thinks is required in France (J. vii. p. 155).

But once we found upon the duty of the State to ensure justice to all who are subject to it in the nature of things, we cannot ask for any further special authorisation by the State. This latter view seems to be gaining ground in France in more modern times. The Italian Code of Procedure, §§ 105, 106, takes residenza as well as actual domicile as a ground.

See Trib. Seine, 18th March 1880 (J. vii. p. 191); C. de Bourdeaux, 19th August 1878 (J. vii. p. 586). Laurent, iv. § 30; Gerbaut, §§ 396 and 396 bis, who cites Belgian law as a special authority for the sufficiency of an actual de facto domicile.

⁴⁴ Cf. judgment Trib. Civ. Seine, 19th July 1879 (J. vi. p. 550), and Clunet, ibid.; C. de Pondicherry, 28th August 1869 (J. vi. p. 552), C. de Paris, July 6th, 1886 (J. xiii. p. 328).

submission here is to contradict the modern theory of law, which distinguishes in many important aspects between moveables and immoveables,⁴⁵ and to go against the great and specially important distinctions between the various territorial laws on the subject, while the arguments adduced to support the voluntary subjection to the courts of the domicile in personal actions and real actions directed against moveables, are not in harmony with the nature of the materia subjecta in the present case. By aid of this last consideration, and because the owner has divided these things from the rest of his property, we find that real actions, too, concerned with moveables which are permanently attached to some particular place, are only competent in the courts of that place. That this is so with real actions that concern immoveables has been recognised by most authors and in most treaties.⁴⁶

The nature of other moveable things, on the other hand, is such that their owner can, as a rule, settle their situation. As, then, upon the one hand, to require a pursuer, who demanded delivery of moveable property by means of a real action, to raise his action at the place where the thing is situated, would imply the greatest injustice, and would in many cases be nothing but robbery of a good right, since the pursuer could not know where the thing in question was; so, on the other hand, if the defender might be sued in any place where the thing happened to be for ever so short a time, his defence would be greatly embarrassed, and the security of commerce in moveables would be thereby exposed to the greatest risks. Nothing, therefore, is more natural than that real actions for delivery of ⁴⁵ According to Germanic legal theories, a man may unite several distinct personalities in himself by the possession of distinct estates (e.g. by feudal and allodial holdings). The so-called landsassatus plenus, which is recognised in some countries, but has now been abolished in Germany by the Civilprozessordn. § 25 (see Beseler, i. § 65, note 4), is explained to be a legal theory which holds the whole moveable estate to be a pertinent of the land. In older German law the forum rei sitæ is exclusive (see Land Law of Saxony, iii. 33, § 4; cf. Suabia, c. 75, § 1, c. 245, § 1, ed. Gengler; and the citations in Wetzell, Civil Process, § 41, note 47), and the Courts of Common Law in England and America still declare themselves of their own accord incompetent if the real estate is not within their jurisdiction. Burge, iii. p. 397; Piggott, p. 132; Gerbaut, § 4; Ct. of Cass. Naples, 28th November 1867 (Norsa, Rev. viii. p. 655); Gianzana, ii. § 71; Féraud-Giraud, J. vii. 145 (absolute incompetency of French courts in real actions, concerned with foreign real property); Glasson, J. viii. p. 123. See, for the exclusive character of this jurisdiction, judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Spain, 23rd October 1879; Torres Campos, p. 286, note. But in questions of competency we must distinguish between real actions and personal actions for delivery of real property (Judgment of the Swiss Fed. Ct. 9th March 1877, J. v. p. 68, and practice in England, e.g. Copin v. Adamson, 1874, L.R. 9 Exch. 345; 1875, 1, Ex. D. p. 17; Alexander in J. v. p. 34; Foote, p. 138). To a different effect, Franco-Swiss treaty, art. 5 (Curti, p. 72). The grounds of convenience which recommend the forum rei sitæ in the case of an action for the delivery of heritable estate in implement of a sale cannot be pressed so as to make that forum exclusive. Actions for possession must necessarily be treated in the same way as actions dealing with property (Curti, pp. 73, 74). The forum rei sitæ is also the exclusive forum for actions declaring the nullity of registered hypothesis or securities. Trib. Seine, 7th February 1885 (J. xii. p. 437).

moveables should be brought at the actual domicile of the defender, and that an exception should be admitted only if the thing is permanently attached to a particular place by the dedication of its owner, or if the pursuer under special conditions—as in the case of arrestments—is entitled to detain them at some particular place.⁴⁷

JURISDICTION BY REASON OF RESIDENCE AND OF ARRESTMENT.

§ 419. Every one, then, so long as he is personally present in any State, is subject to the sovereignty of that State in so far as relates to his person, and so long as he possesses property or makes claim to property there, in so far as concerns that property and these claims. It is, then, not repugnant to principles of international law, that the debtor himself, if he happens to be in the country, should be seized, or his property arrested; and in consequence a judgment be pronounced without the necessity of establishing any other right of jurisdiction, giving decree—in the former case to the amount of caution required for liberation, in the latter to the amount of the value of the goods arrested.⁴⁸ Such a jurisdiction, however, rests upon an actual exercise of power at the moment of detention, and ultimately therefore must be referred to a complete distrust of the judicial system of other States, and to an endeavour to claim for our own jurisdiction, in a onesided and partial fashion, as many suits as possible in which subjects of this country are concerned, and to wrest them from the court which ought naturally, according to the leading principles which we have already laid down, to have the right of decision. It seems right, therefore, to refuse international recognition to such a jurisdiction, even as regards the simple exceptio rei judicatee.

⁴⁷ Curti, pp. 70, 71, declares in favour of making the judex rei sitæ competent by legislation. Curiously enough he advances the argument of the connection between rules of jurisdiction and the substantive law applicable to the case, which in other subjects he has rejected, and which, in the case of moveables, is not of the same practical effect by reason of the power which the possessor has of changing their position. He also founds on the confusion which may arise from the erroneous application of territorial limitations upon real actions. The Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869 recognises the forum rei sitæ for real property only.

⁴⁸ The Nürnberg Draft Code for the Bund (1861) provided in art. 10: "If arrestments have been used in any German State, the competency of the jurisdiction given by the law in respect thereof only justifies the principal action in so far as that process will be able to affect the subject arrested and any property of the arrestee that may be found in that country, and will only be admitted on condition that, if the arrestee when the arrestments were laid on was the subject of another German State, his character as a foreigner did not determine their use."

Accordingly, the jurisdiction established by § 24 of the Civilprozessordn. can claim no international validity. It is thus expressed: "In actions for patrimonial claims against a person who has no domicile in the German Empire, the court within whose territory property belonging to the defender, or the subject matter of the action itself, happens to be, has jurisdiction. In claims on debts, the domicile of the debtor is held to be the place in which the subject matter is situated, and if a pledge has been given, the court of the place where it is situated will be held to have jurisdiction." The 14th article of the French Code is still less obviously sound.

JURISDICTION TO LAY DOWN PROVISIONAL REGULATIONS.
SUCCESSION SUITS.

§ 420. We must not, however, mix up provisional regulations with matters of this kind. They are adopted ex necessitate to meet emergencies, and not unfrequently are dictated by the voice of humanity, e.g. arrestment to prevent an unscrupulous debtor from making away with the property of his creditor,⁴⁹ awards of interim aliment, and temporary decrees of separation of spouses, to protect the wife from ill-treatment by her husband. Every State is competent to pronounce such temporary orders, if the facts necessary to justify them are found in existence within its territory.⁵⁰ Of course, it will not unfrequently be necessary to ascertain some of the less obvious conditions by the test of foreign law, e.g. to ascertain the existence of a relationship between the parties.⁵¹ But, except in so far as purely police regulations are concerned, no provisional decree can have any validity after the decision in the main action has been given by the judge who has jurisdiction to do so, and, if the foreign judge who is competent to the action lays down any rules for the interim regulation of matters, these must conversely be recognised in another country. Again, an application for an interim order must be refused, as a matter that properly belongs to the court in which the main action is pending, if the applicant has sufficient time to apply to that court.⁵²

§ 420*a*. Actions for payment and for division of a succession may be competently raised in the court of the domicile of the deceased, in so far as succession is looked upon as an universal succession (see Fiore, Eff. § 82). If the succession to real property is treated as a singular succession, then in international questions the competency of the forum rei sitæ must be recognised.

QUESTIONS AS TO Status. MATRIMONIAL SUITS.

§ 421. The principle of voluntary subjection cannot apply in actions of status, or in questions as to the invalidity or dissolution of a marriage.

⁵⁰ Cf. Fiore, Eff. § 90. See Torres Campos, p. 281, as regards Spain.

⁵² Cf. Trib. Seine, 13th January 1883 (J. x. p. 168) and Sup. Ct. at Stuttgart, 25th Jan. 1861 (Seuffert, xvi. No. 57).

The courts of the country to which the parties belong must have an exclusive jurisdiction. This exclusive jurisdiction in these courts may, no doubt, give rise to serious hardships, if the State to which the parties belong is at a considerable distance, and if their foreign domicile has existed for a long period. This we have already noticed in treating of the marriage ceremony. But still, as a matter of principle, we must hold fast to the doctrine of their exclusive competency,⁵³ if questions of status are to be determined by the law of the parties' nationality. Even although the courts of the domicile⁵⁴ should expressly adopt the view that such questions are not to be determined, as Laurent (iv. § 46) says that they should be determined, by the law of the country of the domicile, but by that of the nationality of the parties, still we cannot concede jurisdiction to the courts of the domicile. For fatal misapprehensions of the law must be expected to occur,⁵⁵ and that all the more that in many cases a large discretion must be allowed to the court, e.g. in judging of the sufficiency of the grounds of divorce. Another and an entirely separate point is the question whether it would not often happen that in the opinion of the court a coercitive law would prevent the application of the national law of the parties.⁵⁶ The only expedient which would satisfy all requirements would be attained ⁵³ See Fiore. Ct. of Cass. at Turin, 13th June 1874 (J. i. p. 330); on French practice, see Clunet (J. vii. p. 467) and Glasson (J. viii. p. 165).

If we determine questions of status and family law not by the law of a person's nationality, but by that of his domicile, of course the courts of the country of his domicile have jurisdiction. This is the view of the English courts (Piggott, pp. 282 and 290).

Laurent (iv. § 46), although a decided adherent of the loi nationale, declares in favour of the jurisdiction of the judex domicilii, as Glasson does, if no objection is taken to his jurisdiction. But, on the other side, see Brocher, iii. p. 48.

⁵⁴ Although we may deny jurisdiction to our courts in questions of status between foreigners, it by no means follows that we shall refuse them all protection from the law, if they have their domicile here. The nature of the thing demands in such a case that the court of the last domicile enjoyed by the party in his own country shall remain competent. (See the analogous provisions in § 16 of the German Civilprozessordn. in the case of Germans who enjoy the privilege of extra-territoriality in a foreign country.) But if a competent court is not to be found in the State to which the foreigner belongs, then the court of the domicile will have jurisdiction. It is illogical to hold, as Laurent does, that in the case of authorised domicile the court of that domicile has jurisdiction. An authorised domicile does not confer nationality.

⁵⁶ If a judgment on the status of a person in accordance with the law of the country to which he belongs, or to which the head of his family belongs, is to be recognised at all, it must be recognised with all the effects with which the court that pronounced it has invested it. It must thus have universal legal effect (legal effect inter omnes), if the judge who pronounced it has power to give it such effect, even although in the other State, in which it is pleaded, it is not invested with so comprehensive an effect. Moreau (§ 46 bis) takes a different view, on the erroneous ground that the foreign decree can have no greater effect than a decree of our own courts. But what is meant by "greater"? The only questions are, What could the foreign decree determine? and that must be settled by the international rules of jurisdiction; and, What did it mean to determine? and that it must itself determine within the limits of its competency. It is irrelevant to say that the legislature in our country has set narrower limits to the judgments of courts in this country.

by following the procedure, initiated by the British statutes of 1859 and 1861 (22 and 23 Vict. c. 63, and 24 and 25 Vict. c. 11) [for the ascertainment of the law in different parts of the Queen's dominions and in foreign countries], of sending cases for opinion to the foreign court (see supra, pp. 161, 105, note 30⁵⁷). The necessary actions might be raised in the court of the domicile; this court would determine the points of fact, and the court of the nationality (the most convenient court being that of the last domicile within the country of nationality) would draw the legal inferences arising upon the facts. The court of the domicile would then promulgate the decree with these findings in fact and law. Any such arrangement can, of course, only be effected by means of treaties. The suggestion is, however, compatible with the principles recognised in oral pleadings in civil suits; courts of cassation and revision, e.g. the German Imperial Court according to the German Civilprozessordn. (and the House of Lords in appeals originating in the Sheriff Courts of Scotland), give their decision upon a statement of facts which is settled before they consider the case by the inferior court, just as, in the method now recommended, the court of the nationality would proceed to consider particular points of law.

The incompetency of the court of the domicile—assuming always that the law of status is to be dependent on nationality—in matters of status must, however, following out the correct view, which is recognised even in Italy, be treated as an absolute incompetency, and one that cannot therefore be removed by voluntary submission of the parties, or by an omission to plead it. For the non-recognition of the forum domicilii takes its rise directly from the impossibility of recognising any voluntary submission in such matters as these. For this reason we must decline to approve of French practice, whereby French courts are empowered to judge even in questions of status between foreigners, if no objection to the competency of the proceedings is taken by the defender, who must appear in the case. To this extent we may sanction it, viz. that the court should declare itself competent to entertain an action against a person domiciled in its territory, if he cannot show that he possesses any foreign nationality.⁵⁸

In questions of pedigree the nationality of the father, and not that of the child, must rule: even although the father should appear as pursuer, as in the French action en désaveu (Cod. Civ. § 312). We must not let ourselves be led astray by the expression that we have to deal in such cases with the status of the child.⁵⁹ In truth, the point to be established is whether it does or does not belong to the family of the father.

⁵⁷ The proof will frequently, so far as regards facts, be taken exclusively at the place of domicile.

⁵⁸ Cf. Clunet, J. x. p. 399, and J. vi. p. 467; Féraud-Giraud, J. xii. p. 387.

⁵⁹ Laurent agrees with this conclusion (iv. § 53). He criticises a decree of the French Ct. of Cass. of 6th March 1877 to the opposite effect.

QUESTIONS AS TO PARTNERSHIPS.

§ 422. We need hardly say that in questions as to the rights and duties of a partnership,⁶⁰ always premising that the partnership has a legal existence, the court of the place where it has its seat is competent, and that the proper court to exercise jurisdiction in questions connected with the obligations of a trading firm or trading establishment is the court of the place at which that establishment exists.⁶¹ (See Franco-Baden Treaty of 1846, § 1.)

THE forum contractus AND forum delicti commissi.

§ 423. No absolutely universal rule can be laid down in the case of obligations arising on contracts, if we found the jurisdiction of the court upon a consideration of what law is to decide the case. But this very want of a hard and fast abstract rule suits the necessities of trade. A hard and fast abstract rule, whether we take the place in which the contract was made, or the place in which it is to be carried out,⁶² as absolutely regulative of the matter, will fail to meet the reasonable expectations of the parties, and will often commit the decision of the case to a court which is absolutely inconvenient for one of the parties, and at the same time will not unfrequently be found to have little or no qualifications for deciding the case speedily, at comparatively moderate cost—e.g. keeping in view the proof that is to be adduced and the residence of the parties—and in accordance with the law that is to determine the rights of the question. If an obligation is intended to be performed at the place at which it is contracted, then we may set up a forum contractus at that place, as the place at which the whole transaction is to be worked out. Otherwise a forum contractus is set up for each of the contracting parties at his own domicile; but, if the debtor in the obligation leaves his domicile, the forum contractus set up by reason of that domicile does not cease: with the ordinary forum domicilii it is different.

But yet there has been a constant endeavour to set up some universal rule, and since, as we shall see, the effect of such rules has very often been to set up unnatural claims to jurisdiction, the forum contractus has, as a matter of fact, been one of the main impediments to international recognition and execution of judicial sentences.

⁶⁰ See Glasson, J. viii. p. 121; Ct. of Algiers, 24th July 1882 (J. xi. p. 191). The French Ct. of Cass. (25th Feb. 1879, J. vi. p. 396) laid down that the juge naturel du défendeur in the sense of the Franco-Swiss treaty is the court of the place where the company has its seat in all actions directed against the founders of the company and arising out of its business, so long as it is not in liquidation. Clunet approves of this decision. Curti, pp. 51, 52, does not. We must, however, remember that that treaty does not proceed upon the principle adopted in the text, but in its historical development is traceable to the principle that the "juge naturel" is the judex domicilii of the defender, a leading principle, to which all other grounds of jurisdiction are exceptions. Gerbaut, § 392, rightly condemns this illogical reasoning.

⁶¹ See Norsa, Rev. viii. p. 649.

It can easily be understood that in this subject recourse has been had to the deliverances of the Roman law. The theory which at one time was generally accepted, and still is e.g. accepted in France, set up, in accordance with these deliverances, the place in which the contract was made as the proper forum contractus. More modern doctrines, which now prevail in German and in English jurisprudence,⁶³ make the courts of the place of performance the proper forum contractus. The one of these views is just as well founded and just as ill founded as the other.⁶⁴ The law of Rome, ⁶³ Piggott, p. 143. But the necessity of personal service in England puts a different face on things there.

⁶⁴ The Roman citizen in old times could only be sued in Rome in the court of the prætor; in those days there was but one jurisdiction for all Roman citizens, and on that account a pluris petitio loco could never arise. In later times, as the citizens of Rome spread more and more over the provinces, and took up trades there, they were obliged to answer in the courts of the magistrates of the provinces. The only persons, however, whom a magistrate could compel to answer in a suit by requiring caution, were persons who either were themselves actually present in his jurisdiction or possessed property there, by means of which a missio in possessionem of the creditor could be carried out.

The principle, that it was not lawful for creditors to sue every one who was himself found in the province, or had estate there, in its courts, was first reached in actiones stricti juris with a definite place of performance by this means—viz. that an action instituted in any other place than the appointed place of performance was treated as a pluris petitio, the result of which was dismissal of the action and loss of the right to recover. How was it, however, with other obligations, where a less strict reading of their terms did not impose such a penalty upon the pursuer? The defender was in this case also formally subject to the official authority of the magistrate, and the same was the case even as regarded obligationes stricti juris after the introduction of the actio de eo quod certo loco. In my opinion the limit lay in this, that the magistrate did not exercise his power of permitting action or compelling the debtor to answer unless bona fides required it. It is an important circumstance, no doubt, for determining whether in the particular case bona fides requires the debtor to answer to the jurisdiction, that payment is to be made at that place; but that does not in itself determine the question, since for instance the forum domicilii also affects all contract obligations, although payment may have to be made at some other place than the domicile of the debtor. But the principal consideration is whether the debtor was resident for some time in the locality where it is proposed that the jurisdiction over the contract should lie, so that both parties must have held that the beginning and the whole development of their transaction was to take place there. This result is confirmed by the direct authority of the sources of law.

The most detailed passage as to the forum contractus is L. 19, D. 5, 1: "Heres absens ibi defendendus est, ubi defunctus debuit, et conveniendus, si ibi invenitur nulloque suo proprio privilegio excusatur. § 1. Si quis tutelam, vel curam, vel negotia, vel argentariam, vel quid aliud unde obligatio oritur certo loco administravit, et si ibi domicilium non habuit, ibi se debet defendere, et si non defendat neque ibi domicilium habeat, bona possideri patietur. § 2. Proinde et si merces vendidit certe loco, vel disposuit, vel comparavit, videtur, nisi alio loci ut defenderet, convenerit, ibidem se defendere. Numquid dicimus eum, qui a mercatore quid comparavit advena, vel ei vendidit, quem scit inde confestim profecturum, non oportet ibi bona possidere, sed domicilium sequi ejus? At si quis ab eo, qui tabernam vel officinam certo loci conductam habuit, in ea causa est, ut illic conveniatur? quod magis habet rationem. Nam ubi sic venit ut confestim discedat, quasi a viatore emtis, vel eo qui transvehebatur, vel eo qui παραπλῆι (præternavigat), emit durissimum est, quotquot locis quis navigans vel iter faciens delatus est, tot locis se defendi. At si quo constitit non dico jure domicilii, sed tabernam, pergulam, horreum, armarium, officinam conduxit, ibique distraxit, egit, defendere se eo loci besides, cannot be taken as an absolute authority on this matter, since it treats of the jurisdiction of the various courts within the dominions of the Roman Empire, and knows nothing of international delimitation. Savigny, whose general theoretical discussion of the subject still takes the first place, says (§ 370, Guthrie, p. 198) that the place in which the obligation originates is accidental, and unconnected with the substance of the obligation. But there are circumstances in which we may make exactly the same assertion of some place of performance which has been capriciously selected, and that all the more as cases not unfrequently debebit. § 3. Apud Labconem quæritur si homo provincialis servum institorem vendendarum mercium gratia Romæ habeat, quod cum eo servo contractum est, ita habendum atque si cum domino contractum sit: quare ibi se debebit defendere. § 4. Illud sciendum est, cum qui ita fuit obligatus, ut in Italia solveret, si in provincia habuit domicilium, utrobique posse conveniri, et hic, et ibi; et ita et Juliano, et multis aliis videtur."

The beginning of this passage provides that the heir must answer in judgment in the court where his ancestor could have been required to plead. This is a consequence of the representation of the ancestor by the heir in questions of property. Then it is noted in the first paragraph, that any person may be sued in that place where he has permanently carried on business, upon all obligations arising in that business. The second paragraph lays stress upon the fact that the debtor has been in a particular place for no mere temporary purpose, although it is not necessary that he should be actually domiciled there. One who is on his travels cannot, as a rule, be sued in the different places in which he may make contracts upon his journey. The third paragraph lays down that one who has had a trading establishment in Rome, under the management of a slave, may be sued in Rome; and the last paragraph reminds us that the forum domicilii is always concurrent with the forum contractus. I will not dispute that as a rule an obligation must be performed where the forum contractus is, in conformity with this passage, settled to be. But it is quite conceivable that a traveller, for instance, may intend to repay a loan at the place where he has received it, or that a slave who contracts in Italy may stipulate that his master should give delivery of the goods in the provinces. In my opinion, if it were assumed in the former case or disputed in the latter, that the forum contractus was the proper forum, the provisions of this passage, which say not a word, save in the last paragraph, as to the place of performance, would be plainly contradicted. We can explain the mention of the place of performance here in this way, that it is specially desired to give still more prominence to the concurrence of the forum domicilii, and therefore the words "ut in Italia solveret" must be construed as meaning, "assuming also that he is bound to pay in Italy," and the "ita" is to be carried back to the preceding paragraph. It is intimated that if a person has come under such obligations, as in the case just cited the slave has, and if we assume also that he is bound to pay in Italy, yet if he has his domicile in the provinces he may be sued in either place. According to the prevailing view, the words "ita fuit obligatus, ut in Italia solveret" are interpreted to mean that the agreement to pay in Italy is the condition of jurisdiction there. But plainly the fourth paragraph is in contrast with the preceding paragraphs, in which it has been already shown what considerations should serve to make us remember that the forum contractus is not exclusive, but is always concurrent with the forum domicilii; it would be quite inconsistent with this, if, after there had been no mention at all of the place of performance in the former paragraphs, this should now be taken as the true foundation of the forum contractus.

But if the word "ut" should not be taken in the sense we propose, it does not follow by any means as a necessary consequence from this passage, that in every case where payment or performance is to be made in Italy there should thereby be a forum contractus established there: for the word "posse" very fairly admits of the translation, that it may be the case that a person is bound to answer in two places: it may then be laid down, and that is no contradiction of my view, that as a rule the place of payment is identical with that in which the forum contractus is established. Then L. 3, D. 42, 5: "Contractum autem non utique in eo loco intelligitur, quo negotium gestum est, sed quo solvenda est pecunia." Here, then, it is said the forum contractus is determined simply by the place of performance. But in my view occur, in which the place of performance is only fixed some time after the contract is concluded, e.g. in sales of floating cargoes.

We can without difficulty figure cases in which this assumption will flatly contradict the intention of the parties. For instance, a person is engaged to accompany another on a journey from Berlin to Paris and Madrid; the days on which they are to arrive at Brunswick, Hanover, Cöln, Paris, and so on, are settled, and it is agreed that he is to receive a stipulated sum at each of these places. Can we say in such a case that the debtor may be sued at any one of these places? And yet that would be the result of the view that is adopted, even although the whole journey should be left unfinished. But it is impossible without force to read into an agreement as to the place of performance a tacit prorogation of jurisdiction even in ordinary cases. For instance, a merchant in Hamburg, who undertakes to make a payment in Singapore through a correspondent there, can surely not be said thereby to indicate an intention to subject himself to this passage would, without being forced, admit of this translation: "That place in which the contract is concluded is not always to be considered the place of the contract, but that is only as a rule the case if the money falls to be paid there also." This is in full accord with the view I have adopted; for if the whole transaction, from first to last, is intended by the parties to be in connection with one and the same place, it would generally offend against bona fides to propose to transfer part of the obligation to another place by appealing to a different forum. By the ordinary rendering the jurist is made to say that the forum is certainly not established where the transaction is concluded; but this reading does not correspond with the outset of the passage. In Latin, contrahere is the exact opposite of solvere; the former indicates plainly the beginning, the latter the end of the transaction. If the place of payment were all that fell to be considered, it would certainly have been more natural to speak all along of the forum solutionis, and to leave out the contrahere altogether.

In the same way I render the passage L. 21, D. de oblig. et act. 44, 7: "Contraxisse unusquisque in eo loco intelligitur, in quo ut solveret, se obligavit;" thus: "It may be laid down that every person has contracted in that place in which he undertook the obligation and proposes to make payment" (in quo se obligavit, ut (se eodem loco) solveret). Cf. too, L. 20, D. 5, 1; Paulus, libro lviii. ad Edictum: "omnem obligationem pro contractu habendam existimandum est, ut ubicunque aliquis obligatus et contrahi videatur," where there is no mention of a place of payment. The passage from L. 65, D. de judiciis, further says:—

"Exigere dotem mulier debet illic, ubi maritus domicilium habuit, non ubi instrumentum dotale conscriptum est; nec enim id genus contractus est, ut et eum locum spectari oporteat, in quo instrumentum datus factum est, quam eum, in cujus domicilium et ipsa mulier per conditionem matrimonii erat reditura."

This means that the treaty as to dowry here considered is not of such a kind that weight is to be laid upon the place where it is entered upon; bona fides does not require that the husband should have to answer these in actions as to the dos. There must then be other contracts in which the place where they originate influences questions as to jurisdiction. If the prevailing view were correct, the cue of the jurist would have been to emphasise the similarity of the contract with which he is dealing to other contracts, instead of holding their differences up to view.

The passages just cited are, with the exception of that from L. 21, D. de O. et A., taken from the Commentaries on the Edict, a circumstance which seems to me to indicate that all the provisions as to jurisdiction have their origin in prætorian law, which again paid special attention to considerations of bona fides and equity.

Lastly, Justinian determines, in Nov. 69, cap. 1, the jurisdiction applicable to contracts, by pointing out that, settled as it is, it will facilitate the production of proof in conventiones and contractus just as in the case of delicts. Can we say that proof as to the execution of the contract will be most easily procured at the place of payment, which may be determined by caprice or pure accident?

the courts of that country, although it may be quite uncertain whether the court there will entertain an action.⁶⁵

But there can be no doubt that, in the obligations stricti juris of modern law, we should hold that the place of performance has absolute jurisdiction: in obligations, i.e. arising on bills of exchange and mercantile drafts. These obligations demand parata executio: it is intended that they shall be met most punctually at a specified time and in a specified place, and therefore the creditor is entitled to require the most summary assistance from the courts of that place. To refer the creditor to any other court would generally mean delay in this summary procedure.⁶⁶

Within these limits, however, the general recognition of the forum contractus suits the necessities of trade, and Heusler⁶⁷ has rightly depicted the disadvantages which have been felt in Switzerland, which does not recognise this ground of jurisdiction against the solvent debtor, from the necessity of referring the creditor to the distant domicile of the debtor. Heusler, however, has only pointed out the need for the introduction of the forum contractus in Switzerland in cases,⁶⁸ in which there is reasonable expectation that the whole transaction will be worked out within the territory of the forum contractus. By one bound, however, he declares that it will be right to introduce the forum contractus to the extent to which it is recognised in the German Civilprozessordnung.

On the other hand, it is worth noticing that the convention of railway companies for international questions concluded in 1886 at Berne, in § 56, declines to have anything to do with the forum contractus, and declares that the forum domicilii has a privative jurisdiction in claims of recourse arising out of the carrying trade. In actions brought by the consigner or the consignee, § 27, subsec. 4, declares that the only court which shall have jurisdiction is a court of the country in which the defender's company has its seat. This is no unimportant testimony against the monstrous extension ⁶⁵ Féraud-Giraud (J. vii. p. 226) very soundly remarks that it is only when combined with other circumstances, that the adoption of a particular place of payment can be understood to imply that the parties consent to submit themselves to the courts of this latter place. The example he cites is a case, in which the whole matter was intended to be worked out in France ("Travail de peu d'importance à exécuter sur les lieux et qui doit y être réglé").

⁶⁶ Even according to the law of the Sachsenspiegel the forum contractus was only recognised in the case of notorious debts, and to a certain extent in the case of cautionary obligations, where the cautioner had to appear in any court to which the principal debtor might have been convened. See Heusler, Zeitschr. für Schweizer. Recht, 1871, vol. xxi. p. 23. See Curti, p. 62, in favour of the forum contractus to the extent mentioned in the text. The same author says (p. 64): "We shall more readily discover prorogation of jurisdiction in the appointment of a particular place of payment, when we are dealing with obligations on bills than in any other connection." On the history of the forum contractus in Switzerland, see Muheim, p. 271, who corrects Heusler's expositions in some respects, and expands them. Thus (p. 273) Muheim remarks: "In accordance with the object it had in view, the forum contractus only claims recognition, when the debt was estimated as due at the place of performance.

of the forum contractus in modern times, which is entirely unsuited to modern commerce. The forum contractus, again, is not recognised as of international validity in the Franco-Baden treaty of 1846 (extended to Elsass-Lothringen by the convention between the German Empire and France on 11th December 1871). In the extended form which might be given to it in accordance with the domestic law e.g. of the German Empire, it would be quite excusable to call it a forum for international swindling.

§ 424. Older common law practice,⁶⁹ in conformity with the law of Rome and with the canon law,⁷⁰ required, as a condition of giving jurisdiction to the forum contractus, that the action should be served upon the defender within the territory of the forum contractus, or that the defender should possess property within that jurisdiction. Thus, in most cases, it was impossible to appeal to the forum contractus in cases in which the defender was not there. The modern German theory takes the view, that this condition is due to the circumstance that the Roman civil process knew nothing of citation by writing. Accordingly, the defender must necessarily be cited within the jurisdiction of the court, or else the only remedy available was that the pursuer should be entitled to a missio in possessionem of the property of the defender which happened to be within the jurisdiction. But now that citations may be given without any limit per requisitionem, that condition of jurisdiction is out of place.⁷¹ This modern theory is recognised in § 29 of the German Civilprozessordnung.

I believe, however, that it would be right, in the interests of international jurisdiction, to adhere to that special condition as essential to the forum contractus. Would it accord with the principles of bona fides if the creditor should allow the debtor with his whole estate to leave the jurisdiction of the court in order to raise his action subsequently before a court where the defender would find it much more difficult to maintain his case? ⁷² I believe not, and am all the more persuaded that it is not so, since a widely spread usage has retained that essential condition of jurisdiction in spite of the practice of written citation.

It is interesting to observe that the important Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869, art. 1 ad fin. as Curti (pp. 54-56) points out, agrees in its results with the limitations which we have just adopted.⁷³ Since the defender must ⁶⁹ See Wetzell, System des Civil processes, § 41, note 81.

⁷⁰ Cap. i. § 3, in vi. de foro competente, 2, 2, a passage the meaning of which is not beyond dispute.

⁷¹ So Wetzell, ut. cit.

"1st, The parties have expressly fixed on this place, in which sense the choice of a domicile to carry out a contract is to be construed; or

"2nd, Failing any such express appointment, the citation by which the process is introduced, or the order of the judge, is served upon the defender within the territory of the court."

have made the bargain in a foreign country, and at the time the action is raised must be in that country on something more than a mere temporary visit, and as this latter requirement applies to the pursuer also (si les parties y résident au moment où le procès sera engagé), those contracts only will be affected, to put the matter generally, which are to be worked out at the place at which they were entered into. For example (p. 59), a Frenchman who has made a commercial contract in Switzerland, and subsequently comes there upon a tour of pleasure, cannot be sued on that contract, but may be sued upon any obligations which he may have incurred to hotel-keepers or carriers in connection with his tour. No special treatment, however, is accorded to commercial bills and drafts in the treaty.

No difficulties can arise in connection with jurisdiction in quasi-contractual relations. The analogy of contract obligations must rule.

§ 425. It needs no further exposition⁷⁴ to show that, in the case of a claim arising on a delict, the forum delicti commissi must be recognised as having international jurisdiction.⁷⁵ But the same thing cannot be said of artificial extensions of this jurisdiction, or extensions resting on fictions. The jurisdiction is founded in reality upon the subjection of the person who does the act to the law of the place where he is resident: the forum delicti commissi is, therefore, merely the court of the place in which the person who did the act, and against whom the claim is subsequently brought, is resident at the time the act is done; it is not the court of the place in which the effects of the act are felt, or in which the injured person is resident. We must not, however, require, as a condition of recognising the forum delicti commissi, personal service of the action within the jurisdiction or possession of property there. The forum delicti commissi does not rest on bona fides: it rests rather upon an undoubted wrong committed by the person against whom the claim is made.⁷⁶

JURISDICTION FOUNDED UPON VOLUNTARY SUBMISSION OR PROROGATION.

§ 426. In my opinion, it is indisputable that a tribunal may competently be created by an express voluntary submission of parties, which must be recognised in international relations in all cases where the parties have free power to deal with the legal relations that are involved.

That submission may take place not only in the course of the action,⁷⁷

⁷⁴ Curti, p. 25. "He who transgresses the legal order of a State, necessarily subjects himself to the jurisdiction of its courts."

⁷⁵ The question is, apparently, not much discussed. See, however, Féraud-Giraud, J. vii. p. 163; Gerbaut, § 316; see Pradier-Fodéré, J. vi. p. 264, with special reference to the jurisdiction of the Peruvian courts. The forum delicti commissi was at one time recognised in England: according to the rules of jurisdiction of 1883, the only question now is whether the defender, at the date of the action, is domiciled or "ordinarily resident" within the jurisdiction. Piggott, p. 150. [See below, p. 935.]

⁷⁷ Ct. of Algiers, 23rd May 1882 (J. x. p. 158). In the note the Editor describes this as jurisprudence fixée.

but also may be effected by special agreement, defining the jurisdiction of the foreign court.⁷⁸ This is in accordance with modern principles which regulate the validity of contracts.⁷⁹ Of course, however, if a foreign court is made exclusively competent by the terms of the agreement, the agreement as against the pursuer can only be enforced in the court which would otherwise have jurisdiction, if it is understood that the foreign court will decide the case, and that the whole convention shall be held null, as being contra bonos mores, if it can be shown to be merely a fraudulent means of throwing difficulties in the pursuer's way.

A prorogation not limited to particular legal questions would, on the principles of both public and private law, in my opinion, deserve to be disregarded, both as being an attempt by a party to withdraw himself from the judicial power of the State to which he belongs, and by reason of the indefiniteness of the interest involved in such a bargain.⁸⁰

The facts of each case must determine whether a prorogation can be implied. The pursuer always submits himself to the court in which he brings his suit, and that without any regard to the reasons which have induced him to choose that court. If, at the time of raising the action abroad, it was not advisable or advantageous, having regard to the possibility of execution, to raise it at home, that does not prevent the renunciation of the native forum from being quite voluntary, and that is the only question that needs to be answered; we may also remember that it is entirely unusual in law to take account of the motives for an act, and that to do so must create in practice the greatest difficulties.⁸¹

There seems to be some doubt as to the competency of prorogation in real actions (and the actiones in rem scriptæ, which are on the same footing) which concern heritage. I am inclined, however, to pronounce in favour of the prorogation—so far, at least, as concerns those States in which real rights in heritage cannot be referred to feudal principles. The opposite view is at variance with the free rights of parties to dispose of their property, and is in a legal sense only to be derived from the assumption of a right of superiority over particular pieces of heritage existing in the State or its sovereign. This point of view, which no doubt applies to the

⁷⁹ To this effect Trib. Civ. Seine, 10th Feb. 1886 (J. xiii. p. 324).

⁸⁰ § 20 of the Draft II. of the German Code ran thus: "The jurisdiction of domicile established in one German State (§ 3) cannot, by a voluntary submission (prorogation), be transferred to the courts of another State in its full compass.

"Except in this case, an express or implied subjection to the courts of another country is to be recognised in so far as a prorogation to the court of the other State, if it were a native court, would be admitted by the law of the State in which the defender has his regular domicile.

"A prorogation to the courts of another State is, however, not to be recognised—

"First, if the suit has for its subject a question of status, or the constitution, existence, or dissolution of the marriage of one of the parties.

"Second, if the exclusive jurisdiction over heritage, referred to in § 19, abs. 2, is proposed to be transferred by prorogation to the courts of another State.

⁸¹ See Daguin, p. 124.

English Common Law, does not, for instance, accord with the common law of Germany or the law of France. Nor does it seem to me that considerations of expediency go far to support the exclusion of prorogation by force of positive legislative enactment. The parties have themselves to blame if they go before a judge who deals with them unrighteously; and the protection which the refusal of the power of prorogation may perhaps be thought to give against imprudence—a desirable object—is, in my opinion, more than counterbalanced by other disadvantages which result from such a prohibition. Rights of third parties and the interests of the State can only be imperilled by prorogation in so far as a suit conducted capriciously in accordance with the lex rei sitæ prejudices third parties or the State. And lastly, the judgment, according to the nature of the thing, is only effectual in so far as it confers rights to the real property which are possible according to the lex rei sitæ. Especially in disputes as to succession, which, in accordance with Roman law, require, as being disputes about an universal succession, an uniform settlement and treatment, to exclude prorogation for real estate situated abroad would easily lead to complications.

To choose a domicile (élection de domicile) is to be regarded as a voluntary subjection of the person who chooses it to the jurisdiction of its courts.⁸²

NOTE XX ON § 426. PROROGATION.

[By the law of Scotland, the essentials for prorogation are, that the parties should consent, either expressly or tacitly, and that the judge should have such jurisdiction as may be a proper or habile subject of prorogation. There can be no prorogation where some other court, or the court of some other country, has an exclusive jurisdiction (Erskine, i. 2, 27 et seq.). There can therefore be none in questions affecting heritage. In the case of Gudin (1886, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xiv. p. 213) some of the dicta seem to affirm that in consistorial cases there may be a prorogation of jurisdiction. As to the circumstances which may be taken to imply consent, see infra, p. 937.

In England, where the plaintiff selects a foreign tribunal, he is bound by its decision (Westlake, § 325, p. 347); and if the defendant voluntarily appears, he too is bound. It is a question whether he will be bound if he comes forward, not voluntarily, but to plead in the foreign court in order to save some property in the hands of that court (Westlake, § 326, p. 348.)

ABSENCE OF THE DEFENDER. CONTUMACY.

§ 427. On the other hand, if the defender does not appear, we must hold in international questions that he declines the jurisdiction of the court.⁸³ Jurisdiction, in order to be valid for international purposes, must not be supported by fictions. We may use fictions to some extent so as to affect prejudicially a man who is in any event subject to the jurisdiction of some of the courts of this country, and with regard to whom the only point of dispute is before which of the various courts of this country his case shall be taken. But we must not work with fictions against a man with regard to whom we are still altogether ignorant, whether he is subject at all to our jurisdiction or not.⁸⁴

Accordingly, where the defender does not appear, the facts upon which the jurisdiction of the court is to be founded—e.g. as being the forum contractus—are not to be assumed: the pursuer must prove them to the court. If we employ any such provision as that of the German Civil-processordnung, § 296 (which in another respect too is faulty), a provision whereby, if the defender is absent, and the pursuer moves the court for judgment by default, he is entitled to obtain decree, all his averments being assumed to be unconditionally admitted, and among them his averments which go to establish the jurisdiction of the court, we deprive the judgment which follows of all claim to international recognition.

JURISDICTION IN QUESTIONS OF SUCCESSION.

§ 428. In so far as the succession is regulated by the last personal law of the deceased, the court of the country to which he belonged must be held to have jurisdiction⁸⁵ in actions for delivery of the succession or of any part of it, as also for division of the succession, and for all claims for legacies or claims founded on the doctrine of collation. But we must also recognise the courts of the last domicile of the deceased as having jurisdiction, since the deceased subjected himself to these courts in all matters over which he had uncontrolled powers of regulation, and the questions to be dealt with in succession law are for the most part mere patrimonial questions.⁸⁶ In so far as any question arises in connection with the

⁸⁶ No doubt, in the division of a succession, the application of the foreign law by the judex domicilii will often have its difficulties.

succession to immoveable property,' depending upon the lex rei sitæ, the forum rei sitæ must no doubt be held to have jurisdiction.^{87 88} Many authorities think it should have a privative jurisdiction. Actions by creditors of the succession may also be raised at the last domicile of the deceased as in a jurisdiction which must be recognised as having international validity. It cannot be that the right of the creditors, often a valuable right, to sue in this forum in international questions, should be lost by the debtor's death. No doubt in most cases there will be a forum contractus at the debtor's domicile, which, as is well known, was not in Roman law destroyed by the debtor's death.⁸⁹ But the bona fides of international law will only allow us to recognise these different forms of jurisdiction over the succession, provided that either the succession has not as yet been completely divided, or in so far as some appreciable part of the estate is still to be found at the last domicile of the deceased. (See p. 910.)

JURISDICTION propter contingentiam? JURISDICTION reconventionis?

§ 429. The connection which the subject matter of one action may have with another can never set up jurisdiction in the former matter before the tribunal which happens to be dealing with the latter.⁹⁰ The provisions which we find in codes of procedure as to the fora connexitatis, as they are called, rest upon considerations of expediency which are more or less capricious and changeable.⁹¹ The principle that a case must not, if possible, be withdrawn from its natural judge, is a principle which must always be recognised in international law.⁹² Thus, then, jurisdiction recon-

⁹⁰ See Gianzana, ii. § 285.

⁹¹ See a sound and apposite judgment of the Ct. at Nancy of 3rd Aug. 1877 (J. v. p. 142). See, too, a judgment of the App. Ct. at Turin of 6th May 1870, reported by Norsa (Rev. viii. p. 653), and one of the Ct. of Cass. at Turin of 25th June 1870 (Rev. viii. p. 656); see also Trib. Civ. Versailles, 10th Feb. 1882 (J. x. p. 156).

⁹² But a process of "intervention" by means of which a claim is made to something which is the subject of an action between two persons other than the claimant, or to things that have been seized in execution of a decree, is an independent proceeding which is only possible in the court in which the action or execution is proceeding, and operates as a sist upon the original process. See Féraud-Giraud (J. vi. p. 172) on the difference between "intervention" and "demande en garantie," and Demangeat (J. iv. p. 109) on the jurisdiction of French vention is a kind of jurisdiction that has no claim to international recognition. Even when the counter action presents the other side of the action which is already pending (e.g. where one sues upon a contract of co-partnery, and the defender in that action raises an action for the recovery of certain claims arising out of the same relation), if the counter action is recognised as competent in the same court, it implies that the natural rules of jurisdiction are to be neglected. For although the same facts may necessarily form the basis for the decision both of the original, and of the counter action, it will still always be the case that there are two distinct claims. One may frequently be compelled to apply to the courts of a half-civilised State, in order to extract anything at all from some debtor. Must one on that account run the risk of being judged as defender by that untrustworthy court, and acquiesce in the application of its judgment in one's own native country? ⁹³

Forum arresti. IS IT COMPETENT TO ENTERTAIN THE LEADING ACTION?
INCIDENTAL QUESTIONS.

§ 430. The laying on of an arrestment, too, should not in itself found jurisdiction for the main action, which will be recognised in international questions, i.e. should not found jurisdiction to determine the claim, in security of which the arrestment is laid on. ⁹⁴ However, as we have already noticed (supra, p. 912), it cannot be said to be absolutely forbidden by public law to extend the jurisdiction of the forum arresti so as to deal with the main action up to the value of the article arrested, or of the caution that may have been found in lieu thereof, and therefore a condictio ob injustam causam will not be entertained in another State, if that be the whole extent to which the jurisdiction of the forum arresti is stretched.

The rule is otherwise, too, with incidental points arising in connection with complicated claims, the decision of these incidental points being necessary to the decision of the main claim which is made. ⁹⁵ The decision of these incidental or prejudicial points is not an independent action: we are rather dealing merely with the grounds of judgment in the main action.

courts in demandes en garantie against foreigners. In the Franco-Swiss treaty, art. 1, it is expressly said that the "action en garantie" shall not have the effect of withdrawing the person bound by the guarantee from the jurisdiction of the juge naturel (Curti, pp. 50, 51).

⁹³ The discussion in J. vi. p. 57, and in Curti, p. 44, upon the Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869, comes to a different conclusion. Curti refuses to admit the connection between the substantive law of a case and the rules of jurisdiction. But the greatest danger would lie in a simple recognition, in treaties dealing with international jurisdiction and with the execution of judgments founded on such recognition, of actions reconventionne, as a logical consequence, which according to Curti it is. The one contracting State could in this way, by extending the scope of counter actions at its pleasure, withdraw from the courts of the other country a multitude of actions which in their nature fall to these courts.

JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS OF DAMAGES FOR COLLISIONS AT SEA.

§ 431. Special difficulties seem to arise in connection with actions of damages for collisions on the high seas. Claims for damages arising out of collisions which have taken place in territorial waters, as being claims ex delicto or quasi ex delicto, fall to the courts of the country in which the damage was done.⁹⁶ In the case of collisions on the high seas, parity of reasoning would require us to pronounce the courts of the country to which the ship, against which the claim is made, belongs to be alone competent, a view which seems to coincide with more modern English practice.⁹⁷ The older rules of maritime law⁹⁸ subjected even foreign ships to the jurisdiction of the nearest harbour of refuge.⁹⁹ This latter extension of jurisdiction is no doubt a result of the theory which looked upon maritime law as an universal law, the same all the world over.¹⁰⁰ But, now that there is so much difference among the maritime laws of different countries, this doctrine can have no claim to international recognition, unless the court which gives judgment expressly declares that it proposes to apply the law of the country to which the ship, against which the claim is made, belongs. On this condition there would certainly be a practical advantage, in respect of the greater facilities for leading evidence, for pronouncing the courts of the first harbour of refuge to have a concurrent jurisdiction with those of the home port.

In many cases, besides, the first port into which the ship, against which the claim is made, runs, will be brought into play as the forum arresti,¹⁰¹ and to that extent the rules for that forum must be our guide.

⁹⁶ See Walter Phillimore (J. xiii. p. 129) on the English practice. A judgment of the Ct. of Brussels, of 14th Nov. 1871, negatived the jurisdiction of the Belgian courts in the case of collisions in foreign waters. See Haus, Dr. Pub. § 108.

⁹⁸ See judgment of the English Ct. of Admiralty of 11th May 1881 (J. x. p. 105). [The Leon, L.R. 6, P.D. p. 148.]

⁹⁹ Fiore, without any detailed explanation, pronounces in favour of the jurisdiction of the nearest harbour of refuge to which the injured or the injuring ship runs, because it must be assumed that the parties are willing to submit themselves to this forum, which nature presents to them. I can see nothing but a pure fiction in this argument. See, in favour of this jurisdiction, a judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Portugal of 21st June 1880 (J. viii. p. 177). The injured vessel here was Portuguese. There are not many who approve of the jurisdiction of the port of destination. There is not much practical advantage in such a jurisdiction. On the other hand, see Fiore, ut cit.

¹⁰¹ In the decision of 16th May 1876 [re Smith, L.R. 1, P.D. 300], reported by Westlake in Rev. x. p. 541, the Sup. Ct. in England dismissed an action, because the ship against which the claim was made was not in an English port. It was not, therefore, at the date of the action, within the jurisdiction of England.

If the view that salvage for services rendered on the high seas should be fixed by the law of the salving ship is to be accepted as correct, then we must concede to the courts of the country, from which that ship hails, a jurisdiction that will command international recognition. Of course, the courts of the country from which the salved ship hails will also be competent; for no one can decline the jurisdiction of the courts of his own country except in matters which pertain exclusively to the forum rei sitæ. The English statute, however, of 25 and 26 Vict. c. 63, § 59, requires the consent of the State to which the salved ship belongs, as a condition of the jurisdiction of British courts in such cases, and an order by Her Majesty the Queen in Council proceeding on this consent.

JURISDICTION OF THE COURTS OF SEVERAL STATES OVER THE SAME MATTER.

ACTIONS OF DECLARATOR (Feststellungsklagen). ACTIONS OF PUTTING TO SILENCE (Provocationen).

§ 432. In following out the rules laid down, it will very often happen that there will be found to be several jurisdictions dealing with the same subject matter, and all of them entitled to international recognition. Thus, for instance, the forum domicilii of the defender may claim the same international recognition as the forum contractus. In such cases, on general legal grounds, the pursuer has the choice of the various possible jurisdictions; and international law will not allow this choice to be withdrawn from him by the debtor or person against whom a claim is to be made availing himself of some form of process known to one of the States concerned, and turning the natural legal relations of parties upside down, thus making himself pursuer in place of defender; at least, it will not allow it unreservedly. That is, however, the course permitted by § 231 of the German Civilprozessordnung, in cases in which a man raises a negative action of declarator, i.e. brings an action against a person who can pretend some claim against him, to have it determined that in truth he has no such right against the pursuer of this declaratory action. A judgment founded on such an inversion of the natural relations of parties may claim international recognition, if it is pronounced by the court according to whose law the substance of the legal relation in question is to be determined. It cannot claim such recognition, however, if the jurisdiction of the court is founded upon an unilateral and voluntary subjection of the party against whom the claim is made to its authority. Such jurisdiction, e.g. the jurisdiction of the courts of a domicile acquired subsequently to the obligation, is a jurisdiction which the obligant, or person said to be the obligant, cannot dispute, when it is used against him. But he cannot of his own motion deprive the person, who alleges he has claims against him, of his right to resort to a tribunal which is still in existence, by himself having recourse to a jurisdiction which has in the meantime come into existence. For instance, on the general expressions of the German Civilprozessordnung, a person who is said to be under an obligation may no doubt raise a negative action of declarator in the courts of his domicile; he will not, however, by that means be able to exclude, so at least as to command international assent, the forum contractus which has been established against him in a foreign country, or the jurisdiction founded in another country upon some special contract stipulation. Any other view would necessarily lead to contradictory judgments in different States on the same subject matter, and in fact to an unpleasant judicial warfare among different States. For instance, in State A, where there is a forum contractus, some creditors, belonging to A, raise action; in State B the alleged debtor, who resides in B, raises an action for declarator that he is not indebted to them. It may be, then, that the courts of A will find the debtor liable, while those of B will declare that he owes nothing. There can be no doubt that an action raised by the alleged debtor at the domicile of the alleged creditor, and entertained by the court of that domicile, would be recognised for international purposes as fully as an action of declarator raised in the forum contractus; the alleged creditor must submit to the law of his own domicile. In the same way we must deal with actions of putting to silence (provocationen. actions provocatoires). In such actions, where they arise on bilateral relations, e.g. where such an action is brought to obtain a decree of the invalidity of a sale, the process cannot be raised, so as to command international recognition, except at the domicile of the defender. The decisions of that court the defender must accept, because the person who brings the action in question could have come into that court in any case, by direct action, to settle the question of the nullity of the transaction, and this forum may be presumed to be the most favourable for the defender.¹⁰²

JURISDICTION EXERCISED IN FAVOUR OF NATIVES. SUBSIDIARY RECOGNITION OF THE forum domicilii, AND OF JURISDICTION IN THE COURTS OF THE PLACE OF RESIDENCE.

§ 433. There are certain grounds of jurisdiction whereby actions, which would naturally depend before a foreign judge, are brought before a judge of this country, in the interest of natives and subjects of this country. These grounds of jurisdiction cannot, of course, be recognised as having any international validity. We should be justified in using retaliatory measures against such exercises of jurisdiction, an example of which will be found in the French Code of Procedure, § 14.¹⁰³

¹⁰³ See the provision in the Italian Code, art. 105, § 3, as to retaliation in such cases.

The jurisdiction created by § 24 of the German Civilprozessordnung can, like § 14 of the Code de procédure, make no claim to international recognition, although as matter of form it is

But, on the other hand, the courts of the place of residence must take the position that should be taken by the judex domicilii, in the case of persons who have no domicile at all. Not, of course, that we should go so far as to say that such persons may be sued in any kind of action, at any place you please, without further conditions; that would be an injustice: but thus far we should go, viz. to hold that a stay of a certain duration, to be determined by the discretion of the judge—a discretion which will also take into account the character of the action which it is proposed to raise—will be sufficient to found jurisdiction. French law in this spirit recognises the jurisdiction of résidence,¹⁰⁴ while in the law of Scotland a residence of a definite duration (forty days) will found jurisdiction in the Scots courts for all personal actions unconnected with questions of status.

ACTIONS ON IMMATERIAL RIGHTS (INTERDICTS). ACTIONS TO COMPEL THE PERFORMANCE OF OFFICIAL ACTS. PROOF OF FACTS ON WHICH JURISDICTION IS FOUNDED. ACCESSORY PRESTATIONS.

§ 434. The courts of the country in which claims for interdict founded on the rights of an author, a patentee, or a manufacturer with a trade-mark, are made, have an exclusive jurisdiction in actions touching the existence or validity of these claims, and that jurisdiction will receive international recognition.¹⁰⁵ This is a consequence of the nature of the right of interdict, which is directed against the public generally within a certain specified territory. The general rights of the public in State A cannot in any case be taken away or established by any act of jurisdiction by State B, since there can be no ground for alleging that they have submitted themselves to B's authority. But this exclusive jurisdiction will only extend to actions for the recognition of the existence of a right of interdict, or to actions of delict, which postulate the existence of that right. It will not be recognised for personal actions, which are brought to compel the assignation or the exercise of the right.

The courts of a State, lastly, have a privative jurisdiction,^{106 107} in all actions whereby officials of that State are required to do a certain act, or not drawn in the interest of Germans solely. But if any piece of property found in the German Empire, or any outstanding claim of debt there, is enough to found jurisdiction at the locus of the property, or at the residence of the debtor to the defender against such defender, although he have no residence in Germany, at least for all patrimonial claims, then, if a foreigner has left an umbrella in Germany, or has lent an inhabitant of the Empire a sovereign while on a journey, we may raise action against him for thousands of pounds.

¹⁰⁵ In connection with patent law, see Trib. Seine, 26th July 1879 (J. vii. p. 100); on trade-mark law, see Kohler, p. 451. But the recognition of the judgment, in so far as it establishes a right of interdict within the State in which the procedure took place, is a logical necessity. Hence Kohler's expression is not quite accurate. He says such judgments are effectual only within the territory. It seems more correct to say that such judgments have a limited application, viz. within the territory.

¹⁰⁶ See Gerbaut, § 411.

¹⁰⁷ On the jurisdiction to declare a foreign naturalisation null, see supra, p. 163.

to refrain from doing it. The matter here in question is simply a direct injunction or prohibition to be given to these officials. Thus it is not the court of the country to which the parties belong that will decide, but the court to which the official is subject that will decide whether the official shall or shall not celebrate a marriage. In the same way measures taken by the courts of one country, such as the laying on of arrestments,¹⁰⁸ can only be revoked or confirmed by the courts of that same country.¹⁰⁹

The enquiry into the jurisdiction of the court, by which judgment is to be pronounced, must cover not only the question of law involved, but also the facts on which the jurisdiction depends. The question is always one, not merely of a theoretical delimitation of jurisdictions, but also of the actual practical limits of these jurisdictions, often a very important point for the parties. We shall return to the discussion of this point in dealing with the subject of execution.

Lastly, however, accessory prestations, which emerge when judgment has been given in an action, e.g. judgment for the repair of damage caused, will not always be treated by international law in the same way as they would fall to be treated by the law which prevails in the court in which the principal action depends. In so far as they are accessories of that action as matters of procedure merely, they will only be recognised if the other State, in which the judgment is pleaded, agrees in recognising them as consequences of the main claim. Otherwise, jurisdiction to order such prestations must be independently proved, and thus it may happen, that we should have to recognise a res judicata in regard to the principal claim (and to put it into execution, as we shall proceed to show), while we should refuse to hold that any valid judgment had been given on the accessory claim, or to give it execution. We arrive at the simple result that the character of the action is to be determined not by any foreign law, but by our own exclusively.

EXTENT OF THE OPERATION OF A JUDGMENT. (GROUNDS OF JUDGMENT.)

REDUCTION OF A JUDGMENT (res judicata) BY A DECLARATOR OF NULLITY ONLY, OR INCIDENTALLY.

§ 435. The extent of the legal validity of a foreign judgment depends on the law of the court that pronounced it. This must be recognised, both for the question, what persons are affected by it—whether, by some exceptional means, persons other than the parties are so effected—and for the question, whether the grounds on which it proceeds must be accepted as law, as well as the judgment itself. The limits of jurisdiction recognised by international law must not, however, be transgressed in these matters; if they were, then the judgment could not claim international recognition for so much of its consequences.¹¹⁰ In so far as the extension of the obligatory force of the judgment over third parties is concerned, we reach this result as a consequence of what we have already said as to contingency of actions: as regards the grounds of judgment, we rely on the universal proposition (supra, pp. 81, 82) that it does not follow that, because the leading conclusion in an action is subject to a particular system of law, that all the preliminary points, upon which the final decision depends, are subject to that same system, and therefore to the jurisdiction with which that system is connected. A voluntary subjection of the parties, which, no doubt, in our view, enlarges the jurisdiction of the court in all matters that are at the uncontrolled disposition of the parties, is to be assumed, unless there is an unequivocal declaration to the contrary, to apply only to the leading conclusion, and not to the preliminary points.¹¹¹

¹⁰⁸ See Trib. Civ. Villefranche, 23rd December 1881 (J. ix. p. 423). See also Gianzana, ii. § 262.

¹⁰⁹ To determine the question whether a man belongs to the nobility of any country, the only competent authorities are the officials of that country, just as its courts alone are competent in a claim to be a member of some particular family in that country. On the other hand, the courts of this country have no jurisdiction over a foreigner, whose right to a particular title is disputed by a pursuer belonging to this country, on the ground that the sovereign of this country originally gave it to the pursuer's family (see supra, p. 217). In the judgment of the App. Ct. at Rome, 24th March 1881 (J. x. p. 75), these points are not kept sufficiently distinct; the inferior court had declared itself incompetent, and, in our view, rightly done so, although the reasons given were wrong.

The law of the court in which the process depended is, again, the only law by which we can determine whether the nullity of a judgment can only be pronounced by means of a special action of nullity, to be brought before the court in which the previous leading action depended, or may be pleaded as an incidental point in another process by way of exception. If the foreign law and the foreign court were, in the view of international law, entitled to pronounce upon the legal relation in question, they alone can say how that pronouncement is to be taken out of the way. The argument that a foreign judgment can in no event stand higher than a judgment of the courts of this country—can have no less and no greater force—is irrelevant, for in applying the res judicata of a foreign judgment we do not by any means place it on the same footing as a judgment pronounced in this country: we allow it to receive effect as a judgment, but always as a foreign judgment. It is, of course, possible that in spite of all recognition the contents of the judgment itself may, in spite of the fact that it is formally recognised, deprive it of all validity. It may contain some contradiction that cannot be removed by construction, or it may be directed to the accomplishment of something that is impossible, e.g. legally impossible, according to the law of the place in which it is intended to put it in force.¹¹²

¹¹⁰ See C. de Rouen, 23rd May 1873 (Sirey, xiii. p. 233).

¹¹¹ The German Civilprozessordnung, § 253, does not in itself extend legal recognition to the grounds of judgment in the sense I mean, i.e. to legal relations upon which the decision is founded, but allows the parties, by motion specially made before the close of the proceedings, to obtain an extension of the legal validity of a judgment to these points also. But in a sound view, although that is not undisputed, that does not involve an extension of the jurisdiction of the court. See Wach, Civilprocess. i. p. 487.

NOTE YY ON §§ 417-435. LEADING GROUNDS OF JURISDICTION IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

[In Scotland, the two leading grounds for jurisdiction are (1) personal presence of the defender within the territory, and (2) the presence of property belonging to him within the territory, either real property, or moveables fixed in their situs by arrestment. The most common kind of jurisdiction, ratione domicilii, needs no further illustration or explanation, except that it may be noted that the conception of domicile does not demand any Government license; it is constituted by the fact of residence, combined with the intention of residing for an indefinite period; this is the only ground upon which jurisdiction to determine questions of status can be founded, except in cases where the conception of a matrimonial domicile is by some authorities allowed to establish a special kind of jurisdiction. It is, however, now pretty certain that this doctrine of matrimonial domicile is no longer a part of the law of Scotland. In the case of Low v. Low, 1891 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xix. p. 115), it was held that a Scotsman who had married in Malta a Maltese woman, and had lived there for twenty-five years with her, was still entitled to resort to the courts of Scotland for divorce, Scotland being his domicile of origin. It has been said by eminent judges that the domicile required to constitute jurisdiction in questions of status must be as full and complete a domicile as is required to constitute a domicile for the purposes of succession (see Stavert v. Stavert, 1882, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. ix. p. 519). There is at least as much doubt whether any other kind of domicile would found a jurisdiction that would be internationally recognised. At one time the courts of Scotland had held that where adultery had been committed in Scotland, and the adulterer had been served with the summons within Scotland, jurisdiction was founded in the Scots courts to entertain an action of divorce on the ground of that adultery ratione delicti commissi. But this is no longer law. (See Stavert, ut supra.)

Residence in Scotland by the defender for a period of forty days prior pp. 317, 318), upholds the competency of pleading a nullity, ope exceptionis, in accordance with the law which is recognised at the seat of the court where the actio judicati comes to depend, and not in accordance with the law under which the judgment, as to the competency of executing which the question has arisen, falls. The court notes, as the foundation of this judgment, that by the opposite view, if an action was brought in a German court upon some document executed before a French court, the falsity of that document could not be pleaded simply ope exceptionis, but must be urged in the form of a French inscription en faux, a point which must in certain cases (cf. Code de Procédure, arts. 14, 240, 249) be transmitted to a special court in France; no one could maintain such a view. But in my opinion the analogy between the judgment and the document is not complete; the document does not, like the judgment, establish a legal relation—it only proves it. If any law does not permit the plea of nullity to be advanced in another court ope exceptionis, it enacts thereby that the judgment with all its effects shall stand until it is formally reduced. If, then, a third court nevertheless proposes to pronounce the judgment invalid, that is irreconcilable with a recognition of the import of the judgment. On the principle adopted as its guide by the court in the judgment cited above, it fell into the dangerous position of being forced to determine a question by foreign laws of procedure.

to the action also gives jurisdiction to the Scots Courts in all actions arising on contracts, delicts, or quasi-delicts, and in questions of bankruptcy: whether this ground of jurisdiction does or does not continue for forty days after the person has left Scotland is doubtful. See Bapty, 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. 843. In certain cases, too, the court will exercise jurisdiction over persons who have been there for as short a time as can be figured, if personal service of the summons be made upon them; this class of cases consists of actions for aliment of a child, for restitution of moveables seized or hired in Scotland, and for the payment of goods recently bought in Scotland for ready money.

Another ground of jurisdiction is thus stated: "In actions on contract, whether for implement or damages, it is enough that the place of implement was in Scotland, although the place of contract was out of Scotland" (Mackay, Practice of Court of Session, i. p. 169). In such cases upon contract, there must, however, be personal service within the territory. An itinerant—e.g. a hawker or pedlar—may be convened in any court within whose jurisdiction he can be found (Linn v. Cassadinos, 1881, 4th ser. viii. 849).

The Scottish courts will exercise their preventive jurisdiction, by way of interdict, to prevent a foreigner from doing a wrong in Scotland, and will recognise that a foreign court which has exercised the like jurisdiction against a Scotsman, after serving him in Scotland with notice of the proceedings, has done rightly. It may be that it may be difficult to work out the decree by penalties, if the foreigner does not enter the jurisdiction, but that will not affect the jurisdiction of the court of the country where the wrong is threatened (Waygood v. Bennie, 1885, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xii. p. 651). A learned and detailed exposition of the principles that should guide the courts of one country, in recognising the decrees of those of another, is there given by Lord McLaren. His Lordship inter alia points out that a court is not entitled to exact from a foreign court exactly the same principles of jurisdiction as it itself observes, it is enough if the jurisdiction that has been exercised is "reasonably consistent with general international law."

Mere publication of a slander in Scotland will not, however, give jurisdiction to the Scots courts in a consequent action of damages. To give jurisdiction in such a matter, personal citation would be necessary (Parnell v. Walter, 1889, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xvi. p. 917).

So long as imprisonment for debt was competent, it was competent for the Scots courts to issue a warrant against a debtor, who was in meditatione fugæ, so that he might be detained in Scotland to answer with his person any judgment that might be pronounced against him. Since imprisonment for debt was abolished, for almost all kinds of debt, this diligence has to the same extent become illegal (Hart v. Anderson's Trs. 1890, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 169). It may still be competent in connection with obligations ad factum præstandum or taxes due to the Queen, in respect of both of which categories of debt imprisonment may still be used, but it would not obtain international recognition.

A company with a place of business in Scotland may be cited there, but a company which merely does business in Scotland through an agent cannot be cited before the Scots courts (Laidlaw, 1890, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. 544).

The possession of heritable or real estate in Scotland places the proprietor thereof under the jurisdiction of the Scots courts, even although he is not personally cited or domiciled there, and although the cause of action is totally unconnected with that property, and even although the proprietors of heritage have contracted to sell it, if the disposition has not been delivered, the jurisdiction of the Scots courts will still remain (Dowie & Co. v. Tennant, 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. 986).

Where moveables are fixed in Scotland—e.g. by being in manibus curiæ, as the fund in a process of multiplepoinding is, or by being laid under arrestment—then the claimants in the former case, or the owner of the fund or property in the latter case, are subjected to the jurisdiction of the court; this arrestment of moveables founds jurisdiction in the Scots courts in actions arising upon contract, and the judgment that may be obtained in an action so founded is not limited to the amount or value of that which is arrested. The courts of Scotland, also, proceeding on the same principle as has been enunciated in several Belgian decisions, have allowed an action to proceed before them so as to secure the execution of diligence used on the dependence, although the real issue raised in the Scottish action was avowedly not intended to be tried in Scotland, but was already in dependence before the English courts; the pursuer was allowed the benefit of his diligence, although it was used on the dependence of an action which would not of itself have been competent (Hawkins v. Wedderburn, 1842, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. iv. p. 924, and Fordyce v. Bridges, 1842, ibid. p. 1334).

“I repeat, I think the dependence of the suit in England of itself gives us full and complete jurisdiction, the defender having property in this country, if there is any end material to justice between these parties, which the entertaining the suit in this country can promote and serve. I think the furtherance of the interests—the securing of the interests involved in that action, can be stated and founded on in this country as an existing civil right, to be protected, promoted, and secured in the administration of justice in this country. . . . I consider the competency of Scotch process in aid, as it is called, of a Chancery suit, or, as I express it, to secure the ultimate rights and the ultimate payment of a party who has a depending action in Chancery, and finds the whole property, it may be, of his adversary in Scotland, to be a matter of clear, plain, and broad justice in the administration of law in regard to a person who has landed property here” (per Hope, L. J. C., in Fordyce, cited supra). The diligences of inhibition and arrestment—i.e. diligence over both heritage and moveables in Scotland—were used and were sustained in these actions.

The law of Scotland also recognises jurisdiction reconventionne. A foreigner, for instance, who lodges a claim in a Scots process of sequestration for bankruptcy, becomes subject to the jurisdiction of the Scots courts (Barr v. Smith and Chamberlain, 1879, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. vii. 247). See also Walker, etc., 1886, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xiii. p. 816, and Merchant Banking Co. 1886, ibid. p. 1202.

Again, a person who has submitted himself voluntarily to the jurisdiction of the English court was held not to be entitled to oppose the execution of that decree by the Scots courts, in whose jurisdiction he had property (Gudin v. Gudín, 1886, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xiv. p. 213). In that case there are dicta which seem to go so far as to say that such prorogation of jurisdiction would be upheld even in consistorial actions.

In the case of Bapty (1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 843), this doctrine of prorogation received application in a case where a person had been apprehended on an illegal warrant, and found caution to appear in the Scottish courts, as a condition being liberated. The cause of action in that case arose in Scotland. There seems, however, some doubt whether a person illegally seized, and maintaining all along the illegality of the seizure, can be said, by agreeing to find caution, in order to obtain liberation, to consent to the exercise of the jurisdiction in the subsequent action.

With regard to the jurisdiction of the court in matters relating to succession, a distinction must be taken between the powers exercised by the court in questions connected with the transference of estate from the dead to a living representative, and the payment of the liabilities of the dead out of the estate situated in the country in which the liabilities are due, on the one hand, and questions relating to continuing administration of trusts set up by will, or by an inter vivos deed, e.g. a marriage contract, for the regulation and periodical distribution of an estate.

As regards the former class of trusts, or to speak more technically, executries, the law of Scotland, like that of England, is that the court of the country in which there are assets belonging to the estate, is entitled to appoint the administrator, and to control that administrator, so as to ensure the payment of the creditors situated in that country out of the assets also situated there (Preston v. Melville, 1841, 2, Rob. App. 88, Orr Ewing's Trs. 1885, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xiii. (H. of L.) p. 1). The leading administration will probably be in the country of the domicile, and the administrator appointed by its courts will, in general, be appointed administrator of any parcels of assets found in a foreign country, but the courts of that foreign country have jurisdiction to regulate the administration, in this sense, of the assets situated within their jurisdiction. In the case of heritable property, too, situated within a foreign jurisdiction, the courts of that foreign country are entitled to assume the administration of it, with the view of imposing on it the burdens it ought properly to bear. The court of the leading administration will sist its procedure to allow the foreign court to exercise this power, if it shall see cause to do so (Hewitt's Trs. 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 793).

But, again, if the court of Scotland be the court which has granted administration, that fact will give them jurisdiction over the executors so vested with the administration in so far as suits by creditors of the deceased, or beneficiaries claiming an accounting, are concerned, and that whether the executors, or any of them, be resident within Scotland or not (Mags. of Wick v. Forbes, 1849, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xii. p. 299. M'Gennis v. Rooney, 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 817). The application for confirmation is looked upon as a submission to the jurisdiction. The court has jurisdiction in personam in such matters also, so as to entitle them to entertain action against an administrator, who is by domicile subject to their jurisdiction, although there is no estate in Scotland, and no confirmation has been taken out there; but this jurisdiction the court, on the ground of forum non conveniens, will not exercise, if the party who invokes it can as easily obtain his remedy in the courts of the country in which there are assets, and in which administration has been taken out (Peters v. Martin, 1825, Ct. of Sess. Ca. 1st ser. iv. p. 108. Gillon & Co. v. Dunlop & Collett, 1864, Ct. of Sess. Ca. 3rd ser. ii. p. 776. Ld. Watson in Orr Ewing's Trs. cit. sup.).

In cases of the second class, i.e. cases of continuing administration, the leading test of jurisdiction in the Scots courts is, whether the trust was intended to be carried out in Scotland. One leading indication of this may very well be that the bulk of the estate is invested in Scotland, another that the deed is executed by Scots people, and that the trustees originally nominated were Scots, although they may have gone abroad permanently at the time the action is raised. In the case of Kennedy (1884, Ct. of Sess. Ca. 4th ser. xii. p. 275), the jurisdiction of the Scots court was sustained over one of three trustees on a marriage contract, who was domiciled in England, and who had only been cited edictally, in an action by the beneficiaries for an accounting in regard to the trust funds. The marriage was in Scotland, the home of the married persons there, and the language of their contract was Scots. Ld. M'Laren says (p. 282): "Where a trust is constituted in Scotland, and is to be executed in Scotland, the Supreme Court of this division of the United Kingdom has jurisdiction over the whole subject matter of the trust, including in that expression not only the interpretation of the trust, but the duty of making provision for its continuance, and the power, in cases of negligent administration, of calling the trustee or trustees to account." This doctrine was affirmed in the case of a trust for creditors, executed by a Scots tradesman, one of the trustees being resident in England (Robertson's Trs. v. Nicholson, 1888, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xv. p. 914). In cases of continuing administrations, it would seem that the Scots courts have also, like those of England, jurisdiction over a trustee found in Scotland, who is avoiding an accounting in the courts of the country in which the administration was constituted or is to be carried out. The plea of forum non conveniens may often weigh with the court in such cases, so as to induce them to stay proceedings until the trustee shall proceed to do his duty in the courts of the country to which he pleads that he is alone bound to account, but the plea will not avail to oust the jurisdiction in Scotland or in England, if the trustee unduly delays to proceed (see Ld. Watson in Orr Ewing's Trs. cit. sup.).

In England, the leading ground for the foundation of jurisdiction is personal service within the territory of the court, but in actions where the property or possession of real estate in a foreign country is in question, personal service is not held sufficient to confer jurisdiction on English courts; in actions against a company, service may be made at their principal place of business within the territory. In actions to recover land the defender may be brought into court by posting a copy of the writ conspicuously on the property, and in Admiralty actions in rem by affixing the original writ, and subsequently a copy, upon the mainmast of the vessel. Service out of the jurisdiction or territory may be allowed in the case of any defender in the discretion of the judge when the subject matter of the action is land, stock, or other property, situate within the jurisdiction, or any act, deed, or will, affecting such land, stock, or property; or, again, it may be allowed when it is sought to enforce or rescind or otherwise affect any contract, or to demand damages or relief for breach of any contract, which was made within the jurisdiction, or when there has been within the jurisdiction a breach of a contract, wherever it may have been made, or when any act or thing sought to be restrained or removed, or for which damages are sought to be recovered, was or is to be done, or is situate within the jurisdiction. In the case of a foreigner, the court will order notice of the writ, and not the writ itself, to be served. The sweeping nature of the jurisdiction thus claimed by the English courts has been exercised in such a way as to create grave hardships to Scots defenders, and will either be restrained by statute, or amended by requiring a more careful examination of affidavits, and consideration of the rights of defenders, by those who have the jurisdiction under their administration.

The English Court of Admiralty exercises, in actions of damages for collision and in actions for salvage, its jurisdiction, and enforces payment of its decrees, without regard to the place where the collision or other act giving rise to the action took place, if it took place on the high seas where the tide ebbs and flows, and without regard to the fact that one or both of the ships concerned are foreigners, unless they are ships of a foreign State used for public purposes. Foreign sailors, too, belonging to a foreign ship, may recover wages due to them while the ship is lying in a British port. This kind of jurisdiction takes its rise partly in the old maritime jurisdiction of the court, and as regards the competency of actions for damages is confirmed by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, § 6, and 24 Vict. c. 10, § 7: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." But in order to enforce this jurisdiction against a foreign ship by proceedings in rem, the ship must be arrested within British territory, and a collision on the high seas is not an act done within the jurisdiction in respect of which the court can order service abroad upon a defender. Where it is proposed to exercise jurisdiction either in personam or in rem against a foreign owner of a foreign ship, the dependence of the suit must be intimated to the consul of the nation to which the ship belongs. It is, however, doubtful if a foreign court would allow execution of a decree in personam, pronounced after intimation of this kind, and proceeding upon so comprehensive a ground of jurisdiction; the action in rem where the ship is arrested, proceeds upon principles generally recognised, but it may be noted that (re Smith, 1876, L. R. 1, P. D. 300) this arrest of a ship is the only form of founding jurisdiction by the attachment of property belonging to the defender which is admitted in England, if we except the attachment used in the city of London, and some other local jurisdictions.

Arrestment of ships in Scotland is, like arrestment of other moveables, a familiar ground for the foundation of jurisdiction. In so far as the decree does not exceed the value of the arrested ship, this ground of jurisdiction would seem to be one that merits international recognition.

There is also known in English practice a writ ne exeat regno, a process whereby a defendant may be prevented from leaving England. "The king indeed, by his royal prerogative, may issue his writ ne exeat regno, and prohibit any of his subjects from going into foreign ports without license; for this may be necessary for the public service, and safeguard of the Commonwealth" (Stephen's Comm. bk. i. p. 147). See this applied in the case of a defendant who was a domiciled Canadian (Lees v. Patterson, 1878, L. R. 7, Ch. D. 866).]

6. EXECUTION OF FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN THE EXECUTION OF FOREIGN JUDGMENTS ON THE ONE HAND, AND res judicata ON THE OTHER.

§ 436. There is a very deep distinction, recognised almost universally, between the simple recognition of a foreign judgment as res judicata, and the execution of it. Execution implies as a condition a special injunction and approval by the authorities of this country, for execution, being a measure of force, can only proceed in the name of the sovereign authority of the country.¹

There must, therefore, before execution in virtue of a foreign judgment can take place, be some procedure, however short,² ending with the necessary approval and order being granted or refused, and allowing some discussion of the reasons for the one or the other.

There is no doubt, however, that, as a matter of theory—and this we must concede to those who propose to deal with res judicata and execution

See, too, Field, § 670. "A foreign judgment cannot be executed in the territorial jurisdiction of a nation, without a judicial enquiry as to its existence, local validity and extent." Durand, p. 462; Despagnet, § 257.

² Durand's discussion at p. 462 is put on this footing: he is justified in attacking, as he does, the French system of revising foreign judgments.

of judgments on exactly the same footing—the material enquiry into the competency of the execution must necessarily embrace the same questions, not more and not less, as those which have to be discussed in questions as to the recognition of res judicata.³ But de facto it may be quite otherwise. We have seen what a miserable state of affairs must arise in international relations, if res judicata is theoretically refused recognition, or at least would necessarily arise, were it not that the sound sense of commercial men would recognise it, in spite of all that theory may say against the recognition,⁴ and did not the adherents of that theory of non-recognition find themselves forced, in order to avoid a war of jurisdictions, to curtail its operation, silently no doubt, but none the less arbitrarily on that account. On the other hand, there is no doubt that much less evil will attend a refusal to execute foreign judgments. It does not involve, as the rejection of res judicata does, a positive attack upon the foreign judgment. The result rather is merely that assets, which happen to be within the territory of our State, are not allowed to be taken in execution. It may be that in the particular case these are the very assets which make the judgment worth having. The legal existence of the judgment is not affected, and, accordingly, such a state of things can always be endured. A man who proposes to raise an action, should always take care to do so within a State in which assets for execution are to be found. If a man has taken this precaution, his right to the assets which he has thus taken cannot be disputed in another State merely upon the ground that the judgment, in virtue of which he has obtained satisfaction, was the judgment of a foreign court.

Each State has therefore a freer hand to refuse execution than to decline to recognise res judicata. We can see plainly the force of this distinction in practice by looking at French law; in this matter it has to struggle with obscure, one might almost say with reluctant, statutes: still the recognition of foreign res judicata is theoretically gaining more and more ground.

Accordingly, considerations other than pure legal logic may operate in the matter of execution. The sovereign power may, e.g. proceed on the consideration that confidence cannot be bestowed in the administration of justice in all countries: such confidence is a necessary condition of allowing execution within the territory of our State: execution will thus, it may be thought, require a special treaty, or at least a special statutory authorisation, to cover the case of the particular State in question. Or the State may proceed on the consideration, that its own dignity and its own interest require that execution shall only be given if the other State in question gives reciprocity on its side: it may, too, make a distinction according as the foreign judgments to be set in operation are for or against its own subjects.

⁴ Recognition, i.e. by a court that is competent in an international sense.

We pass over in the meantime the consideration of the question whether execution can conveniently and practically be made to depend upon such considerations. They are not absurd or unlawfulerlike, as the theoretical non-recognition of res judicata is.⁵ If this or that State makes the execution of foreign judgments positively dependent on such conditions, doubts may arise in the particular case whether these conditions are present or not. Accordingly, keeping in view the existence of positive legislation of this kind, the question of the execution of foreign judgments becomes more complicated than that of the recognition of res judicata.

Again, every judgment that is fit to be put into execution is not on that account necessarily of final legal force (res judicata): certain objections, too, may possibly be set up against execution, which do not affect res judicata, and vice versa. These, again, are points which make the question of execution a difficult question from a legal point of view.

Lastly, many writers have concerned themselves exclusively, or at least principally, with the execution of foreign judgments, so that many points, which, if we consider the matter carefully, are of importance for res judicata also, have only been discussed in connection with execution. We shall accordingly repeat some of what we might have taken into consideration in discussing res judicata. We shall begin with these discussions, but, first of all, we must subject the theories which modern English writers have enunciated as to the judgment itself to criticism.

DIVERGENT THEORIES. EXECUTION ON THE GROUND OF Comitas. THE JUDGMENT AS FOUNDATION OF AN Obligatio.

§ 437. We must first notice the theory which puts both the recognition and the execution of foreign judicial sentences simply upon the ground of the comitas nationum.⁶ What we have said generally of the principle of comitas applies here. In its ultimate foundations the whole of private international law is based upon comitas, friendly intercourse. But if this friendly intercourse once exists, what is necessarily associated with it, or has historically sprung from it, can by no means be treated as a capri-

⁵ Böhlau, Mecklenburgisches Privatr. i. p. 436, expresses his belief that all these considerations may be met by the rule, that the judge has, once for all, a commission to execute all judgments legally pronounced: and that besides an absolutely identical treatment of res judicata and of execution follows from the character of the jus quæsitum conferred by the res judicata.

Böhlau is also of opinion that the execution of foreign judgments can give rise to no difficulties. It is, he thinks, the separation of purely process law from substantive law that does so.

⁶ So, e.g. Wheaton Dr. international, ii. ch. 2; Fœlix, ii. § 319; Phillimore, iv. § 929.

cious outcome of goodwill. Piggott, therefore (pp. 5-7), is right in pronouncing against the establishment of our doctrine on any such unstable sentiment.⁷ On the contrary, he thinks that, in the logical treatment and gradual development of the doctrine by the judgments delivered in many recent English cases, he has found a sure foundation for it in the idea of a legal obligation, which the sovereign power of each State creates for the parties who obtain decree from its courts, an obligation which then accompanies them into the territory of other States.

It is, however, easily seen that this theory rests upon a mere play with words, a simple self-deception. We may admit that the sovereign authority of the State can impose an obligation upon a person: does it follow that this obligation must be recognised by other States or must be put in force by them by means of compulsitors? Is it not rather certain that there are such obligations, e.g. obligations of military service and obligations arising out of criminal sentences, of which we must say exactly the reverse? Again, an obligation is not an abiding physical characteristic, which really attaches itself to the individual, and follows him wherever he goes. No doubt Piggott (p. 22) requires that the judgment which is to be recognised abroad shall be pronounced by a competent court. But this condition does not improve matters at all; for he gives us no principle on which to base the competency of a court, and we are driven again to ask, how do we come to say that this or that State is competent to lay such obligations as it pleases upon such persons as it pleases, so that other States will enforce them? We can, no doubt, account for this new English theory by remembering that in England the execution of foreign judgments is regarded as the natural order of things; in other countries, the person who is concerned to have the judgment enforced must allege and prove all the necessary conditions for the recognition of the res judicata and for its execution: in England, these things are only brought under notice in the form of defences, objections urged by the other side against the recognition and execution.⁸

CONDITIONS OF EXECUTION. COMPETENCY OF THE COURT IN WHICH THE PROCESS DEPENDED. COMPOSITE STATES.

§ 438. The first indispensable requirement for the execution of a foreign judgment is plainly the same as for a res judicata, viz. that the court which pronounced the judgment should have jurisdiction.⁹ As regards the main question, we may refer to what has been said on this subject in connection with res judicata. But to some extent I must go over the ground again, in view of cases which have occurred, of such a nature as could only be found in connection with execution, and in view, too, of the discussions of other authors. As we have already said, we need not to enquire what particular court in the foreign country was the competent court, if the courts of this country generally had jurisdiction. But a difficulty may arise from the fact that there are composite States of such a kind that we may often doubt whether part of their territory is merely a dependent province, or an independent country but loosely connected with the principal State. This question is, as a matter of fact, of greater importance, the further removed in point of distance the principal and dependent countries or colony are. But we can give no general answer to this problem couched in abstract terms. The leading point will be whether or not there is one judicial establishment for the different territories of the whole State, with power to regulate the jurisdiction of the courts in each different territory, or to decide questions between them. If, on the other hand, the principal State looks upon its subject territories, or if the constituent territories of one State look upon each other, in this matter of the execution of each other's judgments, as foreign countries, then the jurisdiction of the courts of that particular territory in which the judgment was pronounced must be established. Thus, e.g. the judgment of a Scottish court can make no claim for execution, because an English court would have jurisdiction.¹⁰ If, however, there is jurisdiction in the courts of the German Empire generally, then a foreign judge, who is asked to put a judgment of one of these courts in force, will not need to enquire whether the particular German court, from which the judgment proceeded, had territorial competency.¹¹ But still, the State in which the demand for execution is made will not be absolutely guided by the method in which the individual parts of the foreign State treat each other in this matter. If, on some accidental or historical ground, the composite State takes no heed of vital differences, which do in reality exist among its different members, and, in particular, pays no heed to the want of a supreme court to give uniform decisions as to the jurisdiction of the inferior courts, still of judgments is the rule, and make only isolated exceptions from this rule. I think that such a method will cause no little confusion, just as much confusion has already been caused in Italy from the omission of all mention of international jurisdiction in those articles of the Code of Procedure which deal with the subject of the execution of foreign judgments.

⁷ See, also, Daguin, p. 38.

⁸ See Foote, pp. 543 and 546.

¹¹ The judgments of German courts are put in execution in all German States alike. Deutsches Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz, § 161.

these differences do exist in the administration of justice, and this want of a supreme court is of importance for the State in which execution is desired.

ENQUIRY INTO THE JURISDICTION OF THE COURT THAT HAS GIVEN JUDGMENT OVER THE PARTICULAR MATTER.

§ 439. Nor need there be any enquiry into the jurisdiction of the court that pronounced the judgment¹² as regards the subject matter of the decree, if only it is made certain that the judgment is recognised as such in the foreign country.¹³ This, again, is a domestic question of the apportionment of judicial powers, as to which each State and its courts must have the most certain means of judging. But we must have before us the judgment of a court of law. Decrees of administrative officials¹⁴ cannot receive execution here. But the title of the official will not settle this question. We shall have to enquire whether the official from whom the writ that is to be put in execution proceeded is independent, and bound to decide solely according to legal rules.

Just as is the case with res judicata, the facts, as well as the points of law upon which it is said that the competency of the foreign court is based, must be set before the court when it is asked to give execution.¹⁵ No doubt an unprincipled debtor can easily abuse this right, and in a case e.g. in which the enquiry is as to a forum contractus, he may involve the court in what will be almost a complete repetition of the whole process, ¹² I.e. the court that pronounced the judgment of which execution is asked.

¹⁴ See Francke, p. 19; Struckmann and Koch on the German Code, § 660, No. 1. A political decree, e.g. a law directed against some particular person, is of course never to be executed in another State. See Gianzana, iii. § 29, and the decision of the Court of Paris there cited, so famous in its time (16th Jan. 1836), in the process against Duke Charles of Brunswick. The legislature must not, in order to obtain effect for some foreign judicial decree, overstep the sphere which is set apart for it as its regular, normal department.

for the simple purpose of establishing the jurisdiction. Asser¹⁶ proposes for this reason to hold that the judgment of the foreign court shall be held to establish its own jurisdiction, if there is an international treaty between the two countries, dealing with the matter of jurisdiction. In such a case the court pronouncing judgment would be required to affirm that it had jurisdiction in an international sense, i.e. in the sense of the treaty.

But it does not seem to be possible that the courts of one country should place themselves completely at the mercy of the courts of another on the question of law. Absolutely erroneous constructions of the statute, and excesses of jurisdiction, can never be excluded. The experience of the Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869 by no means recommends that in every case judgments of that kind pronounced in the other State should be allowed execution. But, even as regards the question of proof, we must pronounce against Asser's proposal. Points of fact and points of law cannot always be separated with complete certainty: and again, even in questions of fact, we cannot allow the limits of the jurisdiction of our courts to be entirely dependent on the ex parte deliverance of the foreign judgment pronounced by a foreign court. It might, perhaps, be laid down that, if there was a treaty to regulate the jurisdiction, the party who demands execution should not be required to allege and prove the jurisdiction of the court from which the judgment proceeded, unless the defender should at once dispute the jurisdiction the moment an application is made for execution. It is, no doubt, difficult to judge whether any such provision would be of very much practical effect.¹⁷

All other defects of jurisdiction may be removed, so far as actions in which parties have a power of arranging matters as they please are concerned, by a voluntary subjection to the court which pronounces judgment. That subjection may be expressed or implied.^{18 19}

This is everywhere the prevailing opinion. Wach (Civilproc. § 19, note 20) describes it as an inference drawn from indistinct legal theories: "for," says he, "the legal validity of a judgment is not the consequence of ¹⁶ Rev. i. p. 473.

any voluntary prorogation by the party, or of a submission to foreign jurisdiction." I can only throw back the criticism. The legal validity of a judgment is not founded upon the will of the parties. It rests upon the authority of the foreign sovereign. But the voluntary subjection of the parties may be a good reason why our legal system should recognise the effects of the foreign judgment within our territory. It is reasonable, and favours the security of commerce, that, if we allow the party in other respects to deal with the legal relation in question as he pleases, we should allow effect to be given to a judgment upon it, with which the party has declared himself to be satisfied.^{20 21}

It matters not, as we have already remarked in connection with res judicata, what the reasons for this voluntary submission are. Nor does it matter that one of the courts of this country would have jurisdiction over the matter in dispute, if that jurisdiction is not privative. The jurisdiction of the courts of every State, as we have seen in discussing that subject, goes beyond the limits to which the substantive legislation of the State is confined, and that in the interest of commerce and of bona fides. Every State must allow this to take place as against itself: it will only check excess, where it claims for itself a privative jurisdiction. Any other view leads to unpleasant results, and cannot in truth be reconciled with the recognition of voluntary submission. Questions as to the recognition of the plea of lis alibi pendens, and questions also as to a possible conflict between the foreign judgment and a legally valid judgment of this country, are not disposed of by anything yet said.

FOREIGN JUDGMENTS MAY DEMAND EXECUTION ALTHOUGH NOT FINAL.
POSITIVE PROVISIONS TO THE CONTRARY. CRITICISM OF THESE.

§ 440. Any provisional determination upon a legal relation must be recognised and executed in our country in the same way as that in which recognition and execution may be demanded here for a final determination of any such matter. All the more must this be so, since by mere lapse of time provisional determinations often become final, and, in a strict sense, all judgments that can be assailed in any way at all are merely provisional determinations of the legal relation. Execution of foreign judgments is not, therefore, to be confined to valid and final judgments in the strict sense. Rather is it the case that every judgment which, by the law of the court that pronounced it, may be put into execution, must be executed by the foreign court under the same conditions²² under which it would receive execution, if it were a final judgment. The balance of practical convenience, too, recommends this course.

²¹ The other grounds of objection taken by Wach (primarily, no doubt) against the recognition of the exceptio or replicatio have too special a reference to the provisions of the German Civilprozessordn. I cannot, therefore, properly criticise them here. Wach's discussions on this subject seem to me in some measure fitted to promote an erroneous treatment of the most difficult questions of private international law, under cover of a mere discussion of propositions of domestic law. The recognition and execution of foreign judgments can never be satisfactorily defined, unless it is preceded by a determination of the international limits of jurisdiction.

It may indeed happen that the final legal validity of a judgment is made dependent on the possibility of carrying it into execution; in which case, so soon as the defender ceased to possess any subject upon which diligence could be done in the State where judgment was pronounced, the opposite theory would lead to the result that the successful party would altogether lose his undoubted right. But the most cogent consideration of all is that rules of international law can only be associated with facts that are beyond all dispute, or with legal conceptions on which we can say that civilised States are agreed. Now the possibility of executing the judgment, i.e. the declaration of the court that pronounced it, that it may be put into execution, is a pure fact, whereas the conception of final legal validity is one that is sometimes disputed, according to the particular territorial law, and one that may be quite differently defined in different territorial systems of law, and accordingly it is in truth a conception that cannot be made available for the purposes of international law. If, lastly, it has been said that we cannot well give execution in international inter-²² Asser (Rev. vii. p. 389); so, too, resolutions of the Institute of International Law, 1878 (Ann. iii. and iv. i. p. 97), § 3: "Parmi les conditions sous lesquelles l'exequatur sera accordé aux jugements étrangers par les tribunaux du pays où l'exécution doit avoir lieu, sans révision du fond, on doit stipuler que le demandeur aura à prouver que le jugement étranger est exécutoire dans l'Etat où il a été rendu, ce qui implique la preuve qu'il est passé en force de chose jugée, dans tous les cas où la législation du pays dans lequel le jugement a été rendu, ne considère comme exécutoires que les jugements contre lesquels il n'y a plus de recours." Resolutions of the Association, of 12th September 1883 (J. x. p. 564), § 5: "Le jugement doit être exécutoire dans le pays où il a été rendu." Italian practice, see Norsa, Rev. ix. p. 225; Gianzana, iii. § 33; de Rossi, p. 48; Ct. of Rouen, 20th April 1880 (J. vii. p. 59); Trib. Seine, 5th July 1881 (J. ix. p. 530, and J. xiv. p. 673); further exposition of the French doctrine, ibid.

The positive provision of the German Civilprozessordnung, § 660 (i.), is to the opposite effect. Wach, Civilproc. i. § 19, note 31, tries to escape from the obvious difficulty that the idea of legal validity differs in different States, by recommending that we should attain to some universal conception of final legal validity. He understands by the idea what can be no longer disputed or assailed by ordinary legal means, or by any objections taken with the view of prolonging the procedure. What we have to take care of, he says, is whether the foreign judgment can be assailed by such means. But we cannot always answer with certainty the question whether some legal method is or is not a prolongation of the process. But how stands the matter in modern English law? That law knows nothing of the idea of final legal validity in the sense of the German and French doctrine, by which execution is given to such judgments only. Every registered judgment may be put into execution, and this right of execution can only be stopped by the interposition of some legal means, e.g. an appeal. Is, then, a judgment, against which it is still competent to appeal to the House of Lords, to be held as of final legal validity in the meaning of the German Civilprozessordnung? I suspect that Wach would say that, looking to the rarity of the appeal to the House of Lords, he will on practical grounds pronounce such a judgment to be of final legal validity, and therefore capable of receiving execution in the German Empire. But he gives no legal grounds for any such opinion.

In Spain, none but final judgments will receive execution (Sup. Ct. of Spain, 3rd June 1885, J. xiv. p. 366). [In England no judgment which is subject to appeal will be put into execution. See supra, p. 904.]

course to judgments which are not thoroughly well founded—and judgments which are only to be provisionally executed are not thoroughly well founded—it has been forgotten by those who say this that foreign judgments, which are to be executed as such, are not open to be enquired into, so as to determine whether they are well or ill founded; and that, if any such enquiry were to be undertaken, we should be setting up a kind of appeal court to review the foreign judgment. We fall into a sea of troubles if we take up in this spirit the subject of summary procedure, which is so important in international law. Here, no doubt, after judgment further procedure may take place for the purpose of recovering what has been paid in consequence of the summary judgment; this further procedure, however, although it is specially reserved in the summary procedure, only really takes place in the most exceptional cases. If we were to restrict international execution to judgments of final legal validity, all remedies of law in actions on bills would become to a large extent illusory. Wach (p. 230), who follows a strictly logical course,²³ and declares that no foreign judgment pronounced in a summary process should receive execution, himself recognises that this result is unsatisfactory. Does that not indicate that the whole principle, at least as it is adopted by the German Civilprozessordnung, is mistaken?

There is more difference of opinion on the question whether an interim judgment should also receive execution in a foreign State.²⁴ In strict logic, we should have to answer, "Yes, in so far as it commands some prestation which can fitly be made the subject of execution." A mere declaration of its own jurisdiction by the court is not a subject for a corresponding declarator in execution; any such procedure would lead to unprofitable repetitions. A declarator of jurisdiction is simply a proclamation by the court that it has the power of pronouncing judgment when the time comes.²⁵

Conversely, the court which had jurisdiction to determine provisionally any legal relation has jurisdiction to recall this provisional determination, and to regulate finally the legal relation in dispute; and that is an exclusive jurisdiction, for the action has once come to depend in that court; and the second set of proceedings, e.g. a subordinate suit in connection with the ordinary process of execution brought to determine some illiquid objections that have been remitted for separate probation, is merely a continuation of the first action.²⁶ This was the substance of the provisions of some of the older drafts of a statute for the execution of judgments in German courts.²⁷

²³ This logical course is avoided by Francke, p. 33; he prefers the literal words of the Civilprozessordnung to their real meaning.

²⁴ Fiore, Eff. § 215; de Rossi, p. 43.

²⁵ See judgment of the Court of Macerata, of 19th February 1866, which is cited by both the authors named in the foregoing note.

²⁷ "If in the course of a suit before some court which must be recognised as competent in virtue of this law, in which, by common law, only certain kinds of evidence—e.g. documentary

EXECUTION OF JUDGMENTS PRONOUNCED in contumacem.

§ 441. According to sound doctrine, judgments in contumacem must also receive execution from a foreign court. It is a matter for the law of the court in which the process depends to say whether a sufficient hearing has been given to the parties before it. If we give no effect at all to such judgments, we place a premium upon resistance to a judicature which in itself should be recognised, and thus favour unprincipled debtors.²⁸ It is, however, a different question altogether whether we ought not to require certain guarantees for the citation, on which the judgment in contumacem follows, and which in very many cases proceed on mere fictions (see supra, § 391, note 2). If, as in the practice of England, the United States, and [in many cases] of Scotland, we make jurisdiction depend on the circumstance that the action was personally served on the defender within the territory of the court, we have all the guarantee we require.²⁹ But, apart from this, the court in which the action depends must determine, by its own law, whether the citation is sufficient (see supra, p. 851).

If, however, it is desired to make special exceptions in the case of certain judgments in contumaces, to protect defenders against citations which have really never become known to them, such exceptions³⁰ have no point except in cases in which the defender has never appeared at all in the court in which the process depends, or, at least, has never appeared as a party with capacity to sue and defend. If he has answered in any way, it may even be by declining the jurisdiction of the court, then he has evidence—are admitted, some illiquid pleas should be remitted to a special probation, the courts of the country where the process depends, declared by the law of that country to be competent to such probation, must be recognised as competent to determine questions as to these pleas, in so far as they raise questions as to the withdrawal or recall of the judgment in the former process, or the reimbursement of money paid upon that decree."

²⁸ Of course, however, no judgment, and least of all a judgment in contumacem, can be put in force in a foreign country, if it has lost, according to the law of the court in which the judgment was pronounced, the power of being put in force.

See Ct. of Toulouse, 4th Feb. 1886 (J. xiii. p. 332, and Clunet, ibid.). App. Ct. of Florence, 19th Aug. 1875 (Norsa, Rev. ix. p. 219). See J. vii. p. 409, on the provisions of the Franco-Swiss treaty with reference to the French jugements par défaut, which lose their validity after the expiration of six months.

³⁰ But it is not a sound course—although the German Civilprozessordnung prescribes it—to make a distinction according as the judgment has been pronounced against a foreigner or a citizen of the State in which execution is asked.

certainly been made aware of the citation.³¹ The definition of a judgment in contumacem in that international sense may perhaps be a much narrower one than the exception that is entertained in some territorial systems,³² according to which a judgment may be a judgment by default, if the defender fails to appear in the main action, after putting forward some dilatory plea, e.g. declinature of the jurisdiction, which has been repelled.

§ 442. The law of the court in which the judgment was pronounced has also exclusive jurisdiction to determine whether the judgment, and in particular a judgment in contumacem, is still in force, or whether it has in any way been recalled or has lost its validity, and whether also it is to be reckoned as a conclusive judgment.³³ The argument that the foreign judgment must simply be placed on the same level as a judgment of a court in this country, and cannot have any greater effect, is an argument that at once suggests itself, but is ill founded.³⁴ The recognition of a decision pronounced by a foreign court rests upon this ground, that our law commits the disputed point to the decision of the law of the foreign judge, or upon the fact that parties have of their own free will subjected themselves to that law. In both cases the judgment must be accepted with all the consequences and effects which the foreign judge intended to attach to it. No doubt, if the law of this country recognises, for the protection of legal order generally, some period of prescription³⁵ applicable to the execution

³³ Ct. of Toulouse, 4th Feb. 1886 (J. xiii. p. 332), and Clunet's note, ibid.

³⁵ Piggott, pp. 202-204, makes here what is in my opinion an entirely unsound distinction between limitations and prescriptions. He proposes to treat the former in accordance with the law of the (English) court of execution, because the foreign judgment must stand on the

of judgments of all kinds, then there is a great deal to be said for the rule, that so comprehensive an enactment must be applied to foreign judgments also. In several States of the North American Union there are special rules of law to regulate the prescription of judgments pronounced abroad.³⁶

EXECUTION OF PROVISIONAL DECREES.

§ 443. Lastly, it may seem open to debate whether provisional decrees, e.g. decrees of arrestment, given in one country, can be put into execution in another. The Italian Code (§ 943) assumes that it is universally competent in Italy to put such foreign decrees in force. It is right in doing so, but it does not precisely define the conditions under which it may be done.³⁷ In our view, a distinction must be made according as the provisional decree proceeded from the court which had jurisdiction over the main question, the claim for which security is desired, or from some other court. In the former case, this provisional decree must logically receive the same treatment as any other preliminary decree which may be capable of execution. Of course, it will not receive effect in so far as it would attempt to prescribe the means of execution, which the State, in which execution is to take place, must be allowed to settle for itself; nor would it receive effect in so far as it ran counter to the jus publicum of this latter State, is far from unlikely to be the case. In truth, arrestment in security is a kind of execution, but precedent to the judgment; it only, accordingly, ensures the preservation of the object that is in dispute or that is available for execution: it does not make the thing forthcoming to the pursuer, or warrant a sale for his behoof.³⁸ On the other hand, a provisional decree, and, in particular, a decree of arrestment, which does not proceed from the court in which the principal process depends, should not be executed. In this case we have to do with a claim for security which has been independently made. Such a decree can be obtained independently in any place in which, as a matter of fact, a person or a thing that can be affected by same footing as the English. The true ground of this distinction is the erroneous conception of an extinctive prescription or limitation as a rule of procedure, which is generally adopted in English law.

³⁶ In Arkansas, Columbia, Indiana, Maine, Michigan, North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and Wisconsin, see the exposition in Piggott, pp. 524-528.

³⁷ As to this, see Esperson (J. xi. p. 376). He says that cases of the kind only occur very rarely. See also Gianzana, ii. § 252 (and apparently the Italian judgments cited by him there). He, however, gives no definite principles.

³⁸ There cannot, of course, by any possibility be execution of such foreign arrestments or provisional decrees in any country in which, as in the German Empire, execution is only given to foreign judgments that have a final legal validity. Wach, Civilprocess. i. § 19, note 23; Struckmann and Koch on § 661 of the German Civilprozessordnung, note 1.

Arrestment, or any other provisional decree, must be obtained in such States according to their own laws (see Wach, ut cit.); and, we may add, no rule, by which such questions are in domestic matters referred to the court where the principal suit depends, can be used against the person who asks for such a remedy. [Arrestment of this kind is competent in Scotland, supra, p. 936.]

the provisional decree happens to be. Of course, an independent arrestment of this kind can be recalled, or can be renewed for a longer period by the court which originally imposed it. It seems doubtful, however, whether the court, which merely gives an exequatur to an arrestment laid on by the court in which the leading suit depends, is competent thus to recall or modify it. The sound decision of this question must be the same as the decision which we gave (see p. 947 et seq.) with reference to other objections which may be brought against a foreign judgment that is founded on for execution. Objections arising after the court seized with the principal action has given its deliverance, may be pleaded before the court that is asked for execution, others cannot.³⁹

It is in certain circumstances of the very greatest importance for the pursuer that arrestments laid on by the court where the principal action depends can be executed in another country. We propose to make special application of this rule in the law of bankruptcy.

REFUSAL OF EXECUTION BECAUSE OF THE CONTENTS OF THE JUDGMENT.

ERRORS IN RELATION TO INTERNATIONAL LAW: IN RELATION TO THE LAW OF THE STATE IN WHICH EXECUTION IS DEMANDED: CONFLICT WITH res judicata.

§ 444. As regards the contents of the judgment that is to be executed, the first question that arises is whether execution can be refused, if the judgment rests upon an erroneous application of the law. The question must certainly be answered in the negative, if the error in law is in reference to the law of the court which gave the judgment. This court must be presumed to know more upon this subject than the court which is asked for an exequatur.⁴⁰ But we must also answer the question in the negative, when the error in question is an error in private international law (in connection with the application of this or that municipal law), or is an error as to the provisions of the law of the country in which execution is sought.⁴¹ If we admit the possibility of refusing execution on grounds like these, we turn the court of execution into a sort of appeal court against the court in which the principal process depends.

We must, in addition, remember that according to the theory which we

⁴⁰ See Lord Tenterden's grounds of judgment. [Becquet v. M'Carthy, 1831, 2 B. and Ad. 951.] Piggott, p. 123.

Wharton (§ 647), on the authority of Lord Hatherley [in Simpson v. Fogo, 1860, 1 J. and have adopted the foreign court is only competent in cases in which the legal relation, upon which it has directly given judgment, is subject to the regulation of the law of that foreign State ; or in cases in which the parties have submitted themselves to the judgment of that court, either expressly or tacitly (e.g. by a change of domicile). In so far as the latter is the case, this very submission negatives all possible ground for allowing a review by the court of execution. But if, on the other hand, the court, in its judgment upon a legal relation which is governed by its own law, only erred in its judgment on some preliminary points, a power of review, and a refusal of execution following upon that review, would simply be a criticism of the grounds upon which the judgment was put. If, on the one hand, we abandon the unpractical rule that erroneous application of foreign law can give no ground for the reversal of a judgment in the ordinary course of appeal in the same country ; and if, on the other hand, either courts of law or other properly constituted authorities are bound to give information, on the application of foreign tribunals, as to the law of their country on certain specified points, then, as Lammasch remarks (p. 429), there is no need for any such processes of review, which are contrary to all principle, and interfere with the certain application of the law.

§ 445. But our decision may be quite different, if the terms of a judgment pronounced abroad are contradictory of a final and operative judgment by our own courts, to which the same persons are parties. The question then will be, whether in the case of such contradictory judgments upon the same matter, or it may be in the case of several judgments upon the same matter which are not absolutely contradictory of each other, the law of the court that is asked for execution shall treat the earlier or the later judgment as invalid, and whether accordingly the foreign or the home judgment is valid. If we hold that the res judicata contained in the earlier judgment pronounced by our court must be pleaded by the interested party as a ground of action, of objection or exception, in order to make it possible to take notice of it in a subsequent judgment, then the judgment of later date will prevail.⁴² No doubt the theory that a valid judgment by the courts of this country will always prevent the execution of a foreign judgment, has many adherents.⁴³ In reality, however, this view is founded

H. 19], who would refuse execution if the foreign judgment, in defiance of the principles of international law, had failed to apply English law, is of a different opinion, but does not distinctly explain what his opinion is.

Fusinato (p. 65), agreeing with the Portuguese Code of Procedure of 1876, § 1088, would refuse execution, if the foreign court professed to apply the law of the court of execution, but misapprehended it. Lammasch has, however, answered this.

⁴² In agreement with this, Kohler, Zeitschr. für deutschen Civilprocess. x. p. 470. According to § 543 of the German Civilprocessordnung, the discovery of a prior valid judgment is a ground for reducing the subsequent judgment.

⁴³ Ct. of Paris, 1st Feb. 1884 [J. xi. p. 394] ; Gianzana, iii. § 103, and the judgment of the Ct. of Cass. at Turin, of 18th Sept. 1877, there cited : see, too, J. xii. p. 455, and Clunet, ibid.;

on the erroneous argument that the jurisdiction of our own courts must always take precedence of that of the courts of any other country. A judgment of this country cannot, of course, be formally recalled by a foreign judgment: ⁴⁴ but that is not the point here. On the other hand, it will not be admissible to take account of the objection that the judgment which is to be executed is alleged to be contradictory of a valid decision previously given in the foreign court: this is plainly an attempt to institute a new enquiry into a state of affairs which was already in existence when the judgment in question was given (C. de Paris, 19th March 1883, J. x. p. 514).

JUDGMENTS AT VARIANCE WITH THE jus publicum OF THE STATE IN WHICH EXECUTION IS DEMANDED.

§ 446. Again, it is generally laid down that the contents of a judgment must not be at variance with the jus publicum, the ordre public of the State in which it is to be executed.⁴⁵

This exception, however, needs more accurate definition.

In the first place, it is plain that it is impossible to recognise a right, which is legally inadmissible at the place of execution,⁴⁶ or has necessarily as its object something that is impossible, and is thus incapable of execution.⁴⁷ But in this category we must also reckon the case that the act or the state of circumstances, which it is intended to enforce or to bring to pass by means of the judgment, is one that may not be forcibly brought about by the also Weiss, p. 964. According to the German Civilprozessordnung, the decree giving effect to a foreign judgment will not be interfered with by the fact, that a judgment was previously pronounced in Germany. I should fancy that this is the result of French law also (cf. Carré, Lois de la procédure civile, Quest. 739, § 4, note 3), for the exceptio de la chose jugée is lost according to French law unless it is pleaded. An antecedent judgment by a foreign court is not treated in French law as an impediment to an exequatur. Weiss, ut cit. Ct. of Paris, 17th March 1883 (J. x. p. 515); Clunet, J. xi. p. 395.

⁴⁴ On this point an unsound judgment by Trib. Seine, 24th August 1881 (J. ix. p. 306). See Clunet's excellent discussion, ibid. p. 308.

law of the country of execution;⁴⁸ whether it be⁴⁹ that this law thinks it right that the free will of each individual should have full play in the matter, or that it looks upon the act as one that is forbidden or at least is absolutely disapproved by morality, and must therefore not be enforced by the law.

The question is, however, whether we should go further, and refuse execution in cases where it is not the act that is now to be enforced that is condemned by the court of execution, but where the legal relation which has been recognised in the judgment of the foreign court is one that the court of execution must condemn. Asser (Rev. i. p. 482) declares himself decidedly against this extension of the exception. He goes on to say that, if international jurisdiction is properly regulated or is defined by treaty, the matter in dispute is subject to the foreign law and to the foreign judge: accordingly, a refusal of execution would be invasion of a territory, which is not controlled by our laws. A refusal of execution, however, is no invasion of a foreign jurisdiction: it is something purely negative, a refusal to give effect to the operation of the judgment in another territory. If the general theory which we have already laid down (supra, pp. 96, 97) is correct, then that legal relation which is to be pleaded within our territory, and claims effect there, belongs to that extent to our territory, and is so far subject to the control of our laws. Here it is desired to put the decree in operation in a foreign territory. The question, then, is not to be so easily disposed of, as it would seem to be according to Asser's exposition.

Still, the solution of the question which we have already (supra, pp. 96, 97) attempted may suffice. Execution is not to be refused if some legal relation which our law condemns is a condition precedent, or one of the conditions precedent, of that which is sought to be attained by execution within our territory.⁵⁰ It may be refused if the execution which is asked constitutes the real kernel of the legal relation which is thus condemned by our law. In this connection it must be remembered that in some cases the law will not allow action on an alleged claim (e.g. because proof in such cases may offend public decency, or because claims of the kind, unless they can at once be shown to be absolutely clear, may be abused as a means of imposture), while at the same time it will not refuse to give effect to the same claim if clearly established (e.g. by confession). In the latter case, there is nothing to prevent execution being allowed to a claim that has been clearly established by judgment in a foreign country.⁵¹ On the other hand, we should have to refuse execution to a judgment the object of which was the payment of a sum of money which had been promised as the consideration for the performance of some act, which in our view of morality seemed to be immoral, or which was the produce of some game of chance which was forbidden in this country as inconsistent with good morals. The emphasis is to be laid, however, although it may seem peculiar at first sight, on the immorality of the relation. It must not be forgotten, that prohibitions which are purely statutory have, in many cases, merely local reasons to justify them. If in such a case the relation so forbidden must as regards its merits be determined by a foreign law, or if the parties have subjected themselves either expressly or tacitly to the foreign court and its sentence, it would be unjust to refuse to allow this legal relation, which in itself does not deserve any reprobation, to have its course in our dominions to the effect at least of ensuring that a money payment connected with it should be made, and ensuring this by compulsion, if need be.

⁴⁸ The language of the Civilprozessordnung, § 661 (2), viz. "if the execution would compel an act to be done which cannot be so compelled according to the law of the German judge who is considering the competency of the execution," includes both of the cases referred to. On this ground it is possible, although the cases will be very rare, that execution will be refused to a judgment pronounced within one German jurisdiction by the judge in another. The German Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz, § 159 (2), provides: "An application to a court which has not primary jurisdiction must be refused, if the court to which application is made has not local jurisdiction, or if the act that is required to be done is illegal by its law." See Seuffert on § 661, note 4; Struckmann and Koch on the same clause.

⁵⁰ Thus, for instance, the son of a Mohammedan, who lived in polygamy according to the law of his own country, is quite entitled to claim in our courts some asset belonging to his father's estate as his heir; and thus we should put in force a judgment of the courts of his country—if indeed we recognised its judgments as judgments at all—ordaining a brother who lived here to give up the article claimed.

Those who in somewhat vague fashion, following Brocher, take a distinction between an offence against ordre public international and an offence against the ordre public of a particular State, and will only refuse to give effect to a foreign judgment when the offence is of the former kind,⁵² are really thinking of some plain breach of moral sentiment.⁵³ We should then formulate the exception somewhat in this way, viz. : Execution should be refused, when it discloses itself either as the direct embodiment or realisation of some relation which is undoubtedly counter to good morals according to the theories of morality which prevail in the State of execution, or if by allowing execution we should compel any one to do an act which, according to the law of the place of execution, no one should be compelled to do.

The German Code has already found an imitator in restricting the exception to this latter alternative,⁵⁴ and in truth such a limitation is ⁵¹ See supra, pp. 455, 456.

⁵² So Weiss, pp. 960, 968.

⁵³ It is impossible to prevent the conception of immorality, of that which offends boni mores, from having an application to legal doctrine. Try as hard as we will to separate sharply law and morality, the former will always borrow some ideas and theories from the latter. The most recent evidence of this is to be found in the draft of a municipal code for the German Empire. § 105 says, "A transaction which is forbidden by law is null, unless otherwise expressly provided by the law which forbids it:" then comes § 106, "A transaction which offends against morals or public order is null." In other places, e.g. in § 1227, declaring that betrothal has no binding effect, the draft attempts to separate the spheres of law and morality in a way that is almost mischievous.

⁵⁴ Thus in the Austro-Servian treaty, art. 2 (2), quoted by Lammasch.

recommended at least by its clearness. But it leads to substantial dangers of a serious character. Payment of money, as Lammasch (p. 421) points out, is lawful everywhere: therefore—supposing the other necessary conditions of an exequatur are present—execution resulting in such a payment can never be refused within the German Empire, although the foreign judgment may be the most direct realisation of some transaction, not forbidden by any German statute, but undoubtedly stamped as immoral.⁵⁵ As Wharton points out (§ 656), the foreign judgment must not serve the purpose “of overriding any rule of distinctive domestic policy.” This representative of English and American law, which goes so far in the recognition of foreign judgments, proceeds to say that “otherwise all that would be necessary to force the repayment law upon us would be to formulate it in the shape of a judgment.”⁵⁶

Of course, if the defender appeals to the rule thus laid down, we cannot avoid to some extent entering on the merits of the case at the stage of execution. If we remember, however, that we do not propose to refuse effect to any legal relations except those that are, either in themselves or in their immediate consequences, beyond all doubt immoral relations, it will be seen that the grounds of judgment, if stated with the fulness

⁵⁵ Francke (p. 22) thinks that we should consider the object to which the act is directed, as well as the act itself. To make a payment which the receiver may dispose of as he pleases is, he says, in law something distinct from making a payment for a purpose condemned by German law, and in the latter case the German exequatur should be refused. This interpretation, the fallacy of which is pointed out by Lammasch, rests upon the erroneous notion that one can a priori draw a line between an act and the object of an act. Such a distinction is only possible with the help of some positive enactment, which is altogether wanting here. Its absence would result in a comprehensive enquiry into the whole matter, which would often lead to imposture. Struckmann and Koch's commentary on § 661 (4) says, in reference to the German enactment: “Into this category fall, for instance, the celebration of a marriage, immoral acts, prestations that are obviously of an illegal character, etc. It is not sufficient that the judgment proceeds upon some transaction, on which by our law no action will lie, or which is absolutely prohibited, e.g. gaming: the enforcement of the act itself must be forbidden, and its object must be immoral.”

⁵⁶ Fusinato (p. 120) comes very near our rule: he proposes to refuse execution “quando il risultato a cui questa (l'esecuzione) condurrebbe sarebbe in contraddizione con l'ordine pubblico territoriale o con i principii di moralità o di buoni costumi.” Lammasch is almost in the same position: he says that the exception will apply “if from the execution a result will follow which will be at variance with some prohibitory law of the State which is asked to give execution.” But these formulas are by no means identical with ours. Fusinato e.g. will allow (p. 119) the execution of a judgment for payment of a gambling debt in a country, the laws of which allow no action on a claim of that kind, plainly on moral grounds. I cannot assent to this. But if State A, on purely fiscal grounds, forbids gambling in foreign lotteries, but regards it as legal to make money by lotteries of its own at its own discretion from its own subjects, or at least allows its subjects that outlet for their gambling propensities, it cannot, in my opinion, refuse to execute a judgment, which proceeds upon a similar gaming contract, belonging altogether to a foreign State. Here we are not dealing with what the State of execution considers an absolutely and undoubtedly immoral contract, but merely with a local prohibition bounded by the territory of the State (see supra, § 257, note 14).

The resolution adopted by the Institute of International Law at Paris in 1878 (Ann. 3rd and 4th year, i. p. 97) runs thus: “l'exequatur ne serait pas accordé, si l'exécution des jugements impliquait l'accomplissement d'un acte contraire à l'ordre public ou défendu par une loi quelconque de l'état où l'exequatur est requis.” which is required by the law or observed in the practice of most civilised States, will generally satisfy us.

Judgments, however, the object of which is the recovery of private penalties altogether dependent on statute (conventional penalties must be dealt with on the general principles which regulate contracts), are, in my opinion, for the reasons already (supra, p. 637) stated, not entitled to receive exequatur in a foreign country, any more than judgments imposing public penalties. In the one case, as in the other, the State must be convinced of the justice of the merits of the case in accordance with its own laws. Private penalties, although they may be recovered by civil process, occupy just the same legal position as public penalties. The case is different if the demand can be shown to be a demand for payment of damages, however liberal the estimate of these may be.⁵⁷

On the other hand, it will be a matter of no consequence whether the law of the country, in which execution is to be done, regards the act which the judgment is to enforce as one that belongs to the ordinary methods of execution, or as one that falls beyond these limits, provided it is an act which officials will only perform on the warrant of a valid judgment of a court, and one that can be put into execution. For instance, the case may be one of an entry in public registers, books of incumbrances, where entries can only be made at the express desire of a particular person: the defender is that person, and has been ordered judicially to give his consent to the registration, and according to the law of the State where the thing is to be done (e.g. in Germany by § 779 of the Civil Code of Procedure), a judgment to that effect has directly the same effect as an expression of desire on the part of the defender would have. It would, however, be highly dangerous to allow foreign judgments to have such effects, without some special procedure decreeing execution. On the other hand, it would not be possible to deny this effect in all cases to the foreign judgment.⁵⁸

JUDGMENTS AGAINST NATURAL JUSTICE. OBVIOUSLY UNJUST JUDGMENTS. JUDGMENTS OBTAINED BY FRAUD.

§ 447. The theory and practice of common law, which was founded on the older Italian law, established lastly this rule, that no judgment which is affected by a plain nullity should be put in execution by another court.⁵⁹ Although it is quite true that the case particularly contemplated here was the case where the court had no jurisdiction, still, the expression was so ⁵⁷ So, too, Wharton (§§ 4 and 656 ad fin.), and the practice of the United States. In England, too, foreign judgments are not executed, if the result would be to give effect to a demand that has its origin in an offence against foreign revenue laws. Piggott, p. 210.

⁵⁸ See Francke (p. 22).

general, and the application given to pleas of nullity has been so sweeping, that we cannot doubt that the rule was intended to cover cases in which the ground of nullity lay in the merits of the judgment.

We may set alongside of this to some extent the rule of law which prevails in England and the United States, according to which execution will be refused if the judgment is "grossly unjust," or, as Wharton expresses it, "outrageously unjust," or if it rests on a breach of principles of international or so-called natural law that are recognised all the world over.⁶⁰ Here, too, the rule is generally applied to excesses of jurisdiction (especially in the case of judgments in rem) and fictitious citations, which may be presumed never to have come to the knowledge of the person named in them. It cannot, however, be doubted that the law considers it its right and its duty to extend the exception in certain very extreme cases to the merits of the judgment, e.g. in cases where the foreign law makes some unfair enactment for the very purpose of prejudicing foreigners, or, it may be, the fellow-subjects of the judge who is asked to give execution.

It may be questioned whether there is either expediency or justice in retaining any such safety-valve as this. It is quite obvious that it involves this disadvantage, viz. that it may possibly be abused by persons, who, without any good reason, are anxious to delay execution or to make it inoperative, and also it is plain that the whole exception cannot but be vague and ill-defined. If judgments receive exequatur in virtue of some treaty drawn up for that purpose, it will be possible to find in the treaty itself a kind of guarantee against the occurrence of any gross outrages upon justice, since it may be assumed, that no government would conclude a treaty of that kind without first taking some steps to ascertain the state of judicial administration in the other country. If we take the case of the execution of foreign judgments without any international treaty on the subject, then we should have to deal with judgments pronounced in States, which we cannot, indeed, hesitate to treat as civilised States, but in which justice is at times accused of bribery, gross ignorance, or unfairness to foreigners. To refuse to give execution as a matter of principle to judgments pronounced in these countries, if we gave execution to judgments pronounced in others, although we had no treaties with them, would be a sort of insult which possibly, or indeed probably, would elicit measures of retaliation directed against the citizens, and particularly against the judgments of the State that thus refused execution. But, on the other hand, if execution were given and all examination of the judgments—except in the general cases already mentioned—were refused, the courts of the country giving execution would be placed in the very painful position of being forced, at the bidding of a foreign State, to carry into execution an injustice deliberately done to their own citizens. The only resource is the via media of an examination which must of necessity be entirely discretionary. It presents this advantage, too, that, if cases of gross and inexcusable injustice occur, these can be exposed, as they deserve to be, with general profit and approval, without entangling the government of the State in the matter, since the courts of law are independent.

Thus a refusal to give execution may in certain circumstances exercise a very good effect, if the court which refuses it takes a high place in general estimation, and is above all suspicion of national partizanship. But, even in cases in which execution has to be given in conformity with some treaty, we cannot absolutely exclude the possibility of "gross injustice" to foreigners, it may be by means of legislation. We say so because of the ebullitions of national hatred against foreigners, or, at least, against foreigners of some particular nationality, which we have sometimes noticed in very recent times exhibited in the most deplorable fashion. A refusal by independent courts to give execution, because they had discovered some gross injustice which could not under any circumstances be justifiable, or because there had been an obvious offence against clear principles of international law, so far as that was involved in the case, would be an excellent means to bring to reason the people of the country in which the injustice had been done, and, in the long run, the courts which had been carried away by the popular current.

It has, however, often been said in English law and in that of the United States (Wharton, § 654 ad fin.), that an allegation of fraud is no objection to execution, if the dolus in question can or could have been pleaded before the courts of the State, in which the main action is or was dependent. It cannot be denied that this is a sound limitation, if the dolus in question is one committed by the opposite party, or by any other private person; if, e.g. the question is one of perjury by the opposite party or by some witness.⁶¹ The matter is otherwise, if the objection is urged against the court itself. Then the presumption, that the dolus will be best disposed of in the course of the process depending in that court, no longer exists, and if the party who has been prejudiced is thrown back upon the foreign court, he will be very apt to find that the whole value of the legal protection which he invoked by his objection is zero. Field (§ 668) proposes that this defence of fraud should be dropped altogether. In my view that is going too far.

We must, of course, if the discretionary powers, which are necessarily given in these matters, are to be rightly exercised, have courts which stand upon a high moral platform. If they do homage to Chauvinism, to the unfounded hatred of everything that is foreign, then they may do much mischief in the exercise of their discretionary powers. Such powers, too, are just as little suited for courts, which have no training save in the letter of the law, and lose themselves altogether, if they have no express statute to the text of which they can stick.

We can meet any abuse of the process of execution which might arise from frivolous objections, by imposing a substantial fine.

DEFECTIVE GROUNDS OF JUDGMENT.

§ 448. The question whether the absence of any grounds of judgment attached to the foreign decree is a reason for refusing execution to it,⁶² is to be answered by saying that the court of execution must be satisfied, from the grounds of decision of the court that gave judgment, not that the merits of the decree are substantively well founded, but that all the points are established, upon which the formal validity of the judgment, and therefore the possibility of putting it into execution, depend, these points not being subject to a complete and independent enquiry by the court of the country in which execution is asked. In particular, it is not necessary that there should be any finding as to the international jurisdiction of the court; this would be unpractical, since, on the one hand, it is often impossible to foresee whether the judgment will have in any respect to be executed abroad; and, on the other hand, the disputed points in an action should not be augmented unnecessarily by what is often a difficult question, viz. that of international jurisdiction. If we were to require anything more of the court of execution, we should be turning it into a court of appeal from the original court. If the grounds of judgment are too generally expressed, or express nothing, they must in law be considered as if they had not been given at all.

ADEQUATE OPPORTUNITY OF BEING HEARD. CITATION IN THE COUNTRY IN WHICH EXECUTION IS DEMANDED; CITATION BY CONSULAR COURTS. REPRESENTATION IN THE PROCESS.

§ 449. Lastly, is the court of execution bound to enquire whether the defender had sufficient opportunity of defending himself, and was allowed an adequate hearing?

In principle, all such enquiry must be excluded, in so far as it concerns the question whether the defender was properly cited. In cases in which jurisdiction is not itself dependent on the citation, the citation of the party must be tested by the law of the court in which the suit depended, and must therefore be subject to final determination by that court. But, in cases in which citation is necessary to found jurisdiction, it must be made personally on the party or his commissioner or representative, and this is eo ipso sufficient to give the defender an opportunity for defending himself.

⁶² For such a refusal, see Gianzana, iii. § 109, and judgment of Ct. of Cass. at Turin, 29th Dec. 1883.

We have, however, already noticed, that on grounds of convenience many positive systems of legislation make use of fictional citations of parties who are absent: if a foreign State allows itself to execute judgments proceeding on such fictional citations, and perhaps upon further fictions still, it exposes itself to the risk of lending its assistance to what may be a gross injustice.⁶³ In reviewing the procedure that has taken place in so far as citation in cases of judgments in contumaces is concerned—for in other cases the citation has had effect, and therefore the defender has had an opportunity of pleading—we are simply in some measure reviewing the judgment on account of “gross injustice,” as English law calls it, only that this gross injustice⁶⁴ must be laid at the door of the statute law of the State to which the court belongs, and not at that of the court itself.⁶⁵

Execution has also been refused sometimes where the judgment was in contumacem, and there had either been no personal service on the defender, or no service on him in the State in which execution was to take place. In the Austro-Servian treaty (art. 21), as Lammasch notices, provision is made for the case of the defender being deprived, in consequence of other irregularities in procedure, of the opportunity of being made aware of his rights in the process. Lammasch says, quite rightly, that such an enquiry is only permitted because of the exuberant confidence which one necessarily brings with one in concluding such a treaty, in the administration of justice in the other State. As we have already said, in our view it would not be safe to go too far in this happy confiding spirit.

⁶³ This shows still more clearly, how perverse the limitation to Germans of the protective exception contained in § 661 (4) of the Civilprozessordnung is. Are we to allow the execution, of what may be presumed to be injustice, upon a foreigner? We might, no doubt, justify a refusal to apply the protective exception in favour of citizens of the State whose judgment is to be executed. Besides, when we have such a provision as this of the German statute, the doubt arises, whether the possession of the character of a German at the time of the judgment, or at the time of the execution of it, is to be decisive. Francke (p. 39) takes the latter view, since the question is one as to extending the protection in question to a German. Others, appealing to the words of the statute, are of opinion that the question is one as to whether jurisdiction was founded by the citation, and that if jurisdiction was once recognised it would transmit against the party's heirs. Lastly, Lammasch thinks that, in order to invoke the exception in question, a man must have been German at the date of citation and at the date of the application for execution. Where the exception is so entirely capricious, it is difficult to find any decision which will be sound in principle. If the object of the statute is to protect Germans, we are concerned with no date save that of the execution, then it matters not whether the German exequundus is successor of a foreigner or not. But if what we desire to prevent is an excess of jurisdiction by a foreign court, then the opposite view must be sound. But then the limitation to Germans was wrong.

The limitation upon execution which we laid down in § 447 covers this case, and, as we shall show, we by no means entertain a belief in the virtue of State treaties as the only means of salvation in this matter.

In so far, however, as any positive law lays weight upon the fact of citation in the State in which execution is to be given, the citation of any of its subjects by one of its own consular courts must be held equivalent to a citation in the State itself. Otherwise this requirement of citation within the territory could not be satisfied in the case of many of its subjects (e.g. if they were beyond its territory in the East). But, on the other hand, there has been no legal citation of a subject of the country in which execution is to take place, if the citation has been made by a consular court of the State in which judgment was pronounced. That is from want of jurisdiction in the consular court, for consulates have never anything but personal jurisdiction, although they have territorial boundaries, and have no jurisdiction over persons who do not belong to the State which the consuls represent.⁶⁶

If, however, an advocate has appeared for the party in the court which pronounced judgment, his commission to do so must be open to examination by the court of execution, before it can be decided that the party has appeared.⁶⁷ Here, again, no fictions or presumptions of foreign law can interfere. The certainty that the advocate had instructions to appear must be established by the law of the court of execution,⁶⁸ as well as by that of the foreign court.

OBJECTIONS COMPETENT BEFORE THE COURT OF EXECUTION.

§ 450. Objections by the defender to the merits of the judgment belong to the court where that judgment was pronounced, if they were available to him before judgment was given. Then the court of execution must refuse to hear them. But, on the other hand, the judgment of the court in which the process depended, sisting execution on any such subsequent objections, or, to put it more accurately, declaring the original judgment to be no longer capable of execution, must be respected by the court of execution, of course assuming that this judgment is properly placed before it. The matter here is not a mere sist of process, which no foreign court would be entitled to impose upon the court of execution: the fact is that the court which pronounced judgment withdraws from the court of execution the basis on which it asked that court to take up the case, and in virtue of which alone that court could proceed. On the other hand, objections which arise after the court in which the case depended has given judgment, e.g. the objection that after judgment the debt was extinguished by payment or by discharge, must be pleaded before the court of execution.⁶⁹ Such objections are not directed against the deliverance which is embodied in the judgment. But it is alleged that some subsequent legal transaction or legal relation has affected that deliverance, and, according to the view of the defender, affected it so that it may no longer be put into operation. It is plain that on this last question the court of execution must have the decisive voice (see supra, p. 80 et seq.). If a debtor, who is armed with certain specially cogent documents,⁷⁰ can at once and absolutely stop an official from carrying out a judgment of one of this country's courts in this country, surely the same sort of objection must be recognised in the case of the execution of a foreign judgment, the objection belonging, as it does, to jus publicum, and concerned, it may be, with the defender's personal liberty. But even if the defender cannot at once exhibit any such documents, the competency of the court of execution cannot be doubted, upon the general principle already referred to. Although the law of the State of execution refers objections of a certain kind, which have come into existence after judgment has been given, on grounds of convenience to the court in which the principal action depended, we cannot from that circumstance draw any inference as to the way in which a foreign court should in similar circumstances be treated. That provision of the legislature may be quite justifiable in its own country, looking to the subordination of the courts there to each other, and to the different spheres which are assigned to them: e.g. if, as in the German Empire at the present time, courts of execution in connection with judgments pronounced in this country, are courts of inferior rank in which a single judge sits, who, as a rule, has jurisdiction to determine no actions except such as are for a trifling sum. But we must attend to the following distinction. Objections which are of such a character, and are so completely furnished with proof of their own validity, that they check the judge who is asked for execution in any possible attempt to give effect to that demand, enjoy this power by reference to and in accordance with the law of ⁶⁹ See Wach, Vorträge über die Reichs Civilprocessordnung, 1880, p. 231; Lammasch, p. 435. See, too, draft of the Anglo-Italian treaty by Piggott and Paccioni (Asser, Buitenlandische Vonnissen, p. 60). It is rightly pointed out there that the question, whether the judgment has been satisfied, must be determined by the law of the court in which the case depended. Of course, questions as to the intervention of a third party, who claims the property on which execution is to be done, are questions for the court of execution. Francke (p. 81), with special reference to the German Civilprocessordnung: Struckmann and Koch, note 2, on § 661 of that ordnung and the citations which they give, but especially Imp. Ct. (iv.), 5th February 1885 (Blum. Ann. i. p. 381, and Dec. xiii. No. 88). This last judgment proceeds on the analogy of the actio judicati. This argument is, however, of no value, except from the point of view of some particular positive local law. It has no weight in considering the general theory, as we shall see. To the same effect as the text, judgment of the Swiss Federal Court, 24th July 1882 (J. x. p. 544).

⁶⁶ See Francke, pp. 40, 41, who in his results is right on both points.

⁶⁸ De Rossi (p. 89) in this matter proposes to decide according to the foreign law. The court in which the procedure takes place will certainly decide the matter by its own law, and the right of legal representatives, guardian, father, or husband, to appear will be tested by the personal law of those for whom they appear.

⁷⁰ See German Civilprocessordnung, § 691 (3) (4) and (5).

the State of execution, and regardless of the law which governs the judgment itself. On the other hand, in the case of objections which have not this more sweeping and absolute force, their effect must be determined by the law of the court which pronounced judgment originally, although the judgment on the point will be given by the court of the country of execution. There are indeed claims, the operation of which must not be interfered with by illiquid objections that may have arisen subsequently, e.g. by pleas of set-off or compensation which are not liquid. In the case of claims upon bills, this exclusion of all objections, which cannot at once be verified in a particular way, undoubtedly forms part of the substantive law on that subject. On that point, i.e. on the import and character of the claim established by the judgment, no law except that from which the judgment derives its validity, can be consulted. If, however, the defender has urged objections against the execution of a judgment in the court in which that judgment was given, its decision must in all cases govern the procedure of the court in which execution is desired. If the objections are repelled, then the decision must be recognised by reason of the voluntary prorogation of the defender, who has challenged the decision. If they are sustained, then the court which has given judgment has withdrawn from its own judgment all claims for execution, i.e. it has withdrawn from it the foundation on which execution in a foreign country must necessarily proceed.

How stands the law if, after a judgment, a transference of rights has taken place, either on the side of the successful or on that of the unsuccessful party? Take it that the latter dies, and the process of execution must now, it is said, be directed against some other party as his heir. Does the decision of questions on this point belong to the court which gave judgment, or to the court of execution?

The question has recently been a good deal discussed in German law, and in one case has been answered by the Imperial court⁷¹ to the effect that it must be held that the German court in which the action for execution depended had the jurisdiction. These discussions, however, are concerned merely with the words of the German statute (Civilprozessordnung), and have no bearing on the principles of private international law, or on the philosophy of that law.

In accordance with general principles, our answer must be this. The decision is in form simply a determination of a legal relation in which the original parties are concerned. It may be that the result of the decision will affect other persons also, e.g. the parties' heirs, but in the formal decision we find nothing that says so. To obtain a formal decree that will affect them we must have a new judgment, i.e. a new process, in which the judgment already pronounced will, of course, hold as law that cannot be disputed against the predecessors who were parties to it, in so far as its character as a judgment is not disputed. In other words, an actio judicati proceeding upon the former judgment must be instituted by the legal representative or against him, as the case may be; and it was for this very case that almost all over Germany the practice under the common Roman law recognised such an actio.⁷² The judgment, therefore, cannot be directly put in force: it requires the institution of a new action, in which the ordinary rules of jurisdiction must be applied. Thus, for instance, the forum rei sitæ will remain competent as it was in the original action, if real property is in question, whereas it is quite possible that an actio judicati to compel delivery of a moveable thing may have to be raised in a new forum.⁷³

Struckmann and Koch on § 661 (i.) ad fin. of the Civilprozessordnung. But yet, perhaps, there may be dissentients who hold that the foreign court which gave the judgment is alone competent. See Ct. of Aix, 13th March 1879 (J. vii. p. 106).

In most cases execution of a judgment will take the shape of a demand for money, and in most cases application will be made for execution at the domicile of the debtor. These things being so, if we regard the action for what the German Civilprozessordnung calls the "execution judgment" as an actio judicati (see infra, § 460), we find that in the majority of cases⁷⁴ our theory will give the same result as that to which the German Imperial Court came. The transference of legal rights which has taken place can receive effect in the process, which has been instituted before the German courts to obtain an execution judgment, and the pursuer need not be relegated to any other court.

The soundness of our general theory cannot be altered by the circumstance that a statute like the German Civilprozessordnung (§ 665), where a transference of legal rights has taken place, contemplates a very simple procedure, if this transference can be at once verified by certain selected means of proof, e.g. by public documents, or if it is notorious to the court (Civilprozessordnung, § 665). If, again, the question of transference comes up, not at a time when the commission to execute the judgment can be discussed, but subsequently, when the execution has begun by pointing and diligence (see e.g. Italian Code of Procedure, § 569, 2), the point is no longer whether execution is to take place on behalf of a particular person or against a particular person. The procedure has now become real, it is dealing with things, and the question is to whom the produce of the execution is to go, or who is to bear the burden of it, or who in the further course of the execution will be entitled to exercise particular powers, and to guide it in this or that direction. All these questions, from their very nature, must be pleaded in the court of execution, and must be regulated by its law.

METHOD OF EXECUTION. MEANS AVAILABLE FOR EXECUTION.

§ 451. It is generally recognised that the method of execution, the means of compulsion available, are questions that must depend on the law of the place of execution.⁷⁵ This follows, on the one hand, from the principles already (p. 80 et seq.) laid down; for the enforced execution represents the last ramification of the legal relation, and as such belongs not to the legal domain of the court in which judgment was given, but to that of the court which authorised execution. It also, on the other hand, is a consequence of the fact that we have here to do with the actings of the public sovereign authority, which lays hands directly on the property of individuals, and with the restrictions under which these actings are placed in the interests of humanity and of mercy to the debtor.

On this principle, if we find that the court of execution has such-and-such methods of doing execution in the general case (putting aside in the meantime special methods of execution, competent in particular actions, or competent if they are specially mentioned in the judgment), it matters not whether the court which gave judgment knows these methods or not. Thus if the creditor under the ordinary operation of the law in the State of execution has, as a consequence of judgment in his favour, a right of hypothec over the real estate of his debtor (hypothèque judiciaire according to Code Civ. § 2123), it is immaterial whether he has such a right by the law of the court that gave him judgment, or whether he was allowed it by the special terms of the judgment.⁷⁶

The opposite view,⁷⁷ which strangely enough was sanctioned by the Institute of International Law, would introduce a distinction, which must in many cases be unfair, between creditors on a foreign judgment and creditors on a judgment pronounced in this country. It might be that the possibility of execution would be altogether denied to the one creditor, if we shall assume that in State A, whose courts pronounced judgment, imprisonment for debt was abolished, whereas in State B, according to older Roman law, it was the most substantial form of execution.⁷⁸

⁷⁷ "Toutefois la contrainte par corps ne doit être applicable nulle part, si elle n'a pas été prononcée par la tribunal qui a rendu le jugement étranger. L'hypothèque judiciaire n'aura lieu que quand elle est accordée par les lois des deux pays."

⁷⁸ Foote (p. 517) entirely agrees with us, with particular reference to personal imprisonment; he says: "Persons who contract engage simply to perform their promise; and if they fail to carry out their undertaking, they must submit to the control of any law within the reach of which they happen to be when a remedy is sought."

If, however, according to the law of the place of execution, a particular form of doing diligence is only recognised in the case of particular exceptional obligations, this kind of execution, arising out of the contract, can only be applied if it is at the same time recognised as competent in the kind of claim in question by the law under which that claim itself falls.⁷⁹ If, for instance, personal incarceration is by the law of the place of execution competent in obligations upon bills, but is not recognised by the law to which the obligation upon the bill in question is subject, in such a case this form of diligence cannot be required at the place of execution.⁸⁰

The exclusive application of the law of the place of execution cannot be affected by any regulation which the judgment may contain,⁸¹ and if there seems to be any doubt whether such a regulation is part of the decision on the merits, or merely regulates the method of execution, e.g. where the defender is ordered to do some particular act, or, in default, to pay a certain sum of money, then the court of execution must be guided by its own law.⁸² Accordingly, a sound theory will hold that the courts of execution, so far as their own law allows it, are not incapacitated absolutely from granting a sist of execution, although an application may already have been made for that purpose to the court which gave judgment, and refused by it.⁸³

Of course, any additions made to the judgment, which are in the view of the court of execution incompetent, will not have the effect of depriving it of validity. It will receive effect, and these additions will be left out of ⁷⁹ Draft II. of the Code for the States of the German Bund, § 29: "Diligence is to be done according to the regulations of the procedure in diligence recognised at the place where it is carried out. If the judgment pronounced in the one State has allowed personal arrest as a means of doing diligence, that can only be enforced in the other under the condition that such personal arrest is recognised there in the same way as a means of execution competent in the circumstances. If this condition does not exist, then it is only the means of diligence authorised by the other State which can be required." Cf. Story, §§ 568 et seq.

account, in so far as they can be separated from the decision on the merits of the question.⁸⁴

The so-called beneficium competentiae (supra, p. 612) must always be allowed to the debtor in conformity with the law of the place of execution, because it rests on grounds of mercy and humanity. It may also be allowed to him in accordance with the law, which regulates the substance of the obligation, which the judgment is meant to work out.

WHAT COURTS ARE COURTS OF THIS COUNTRY? CONSULAR COURTS.

§ 452. It may at times seem doubtful whether a judgment is a foreign judgment, or a judgment of a court of this country. In a legal sense, judgments pronounced by consular courts set up by the State are judgments of courts of this country, although they actually have their seats in a foreign country.⁸⁵ On the other hand, the mixed courts recently set up in Egypt (tribunaux mixtes)⁸⁶ are foreign courts even to those States who furnish judges to them.⁸⁷ The co-operation of a judge of this country is no security against an excess of jurisdiction which may take place in the judgment of a mixed court of the kind.

EFFECT OF THE ACQUISITION, OR SURRENDER, OR MILITARY OCCUPATION OF A TERRITORY ON JUDGMENTS THAT HAVE BEEN PRONOUNCED.

§ 453. The question whether the union of the territory, in which the court that pronounced the original judgment had its seat, with the State in which that judgment is to be executed, does or does not turn what was a foreign judgment into a native judgment, is more difficult. In our view, the distinction between the execution of native and foreign judgments (see infra, § 454)—putting aside some more or less capricious limitations,⁸⁸ which have plainly no application to the case in hand—lies in this, that in the case of a foreign judgment the courts of execution have to enquire, first, whether the court that gave judgment had jurisdiction; second, whether by giving execution they may not work out by force in the territory of their own State a legal relation, which it is considered unlawful to work out at all there, or at least to work out by force; and third, in extreme cases, to see that no gross and palpable injustice has been committed in the course of the procedure that has taken place, or in the judgment itself, either in form or in substance, which cannot be supported. Since none of these enquiries have as yet taken place in the case we have put, it is plain that a judgment which has been pronounced in the newly acquired province must be treated as a foreign judgment.

The same decision must, however, be given in the converse case in which the judgment was pronounced in the State which is acquiring the province, and is to be executed within that province. It will be so, even although the province is placed under the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the State which acquires it, and the judgment to be executed was a judgment pronounced or approved by that very supreme court. The supreme court may have given a special deliverance, upholding the jurisdiction of the court that pronounced judgment, but it did so on the authority and under the guidance of the laws which prevailed in its old territory, and without regard to the principles of international law. As a matter of fact, it may be perfectly true that objections to the execution of judgments pronounced by the State which is acquiring the province will have less prospect of success than in the converse case. But, for all that, it is necessary to apply for a declaration of exequatur.⁸⁹

On the other hand, if the judgment was pronounced in the province which has now been acquired, and if it is desired to put it into execution there, there is no need of any exequatur.⁹⁰ The enquiry into the three points stated above has already by implication taken place; the claim in the action could not have been affirmed on any other footing. A new declarator would be meaningless. It might be that the judgment was in conflict with some statute of absolutely imperative force, published in the meantime by the annexing State. But this is a possibility which exists in every case, quite apart from any changes of territory. Thus it is not so much a question of private international law, with which we have to deal, as a general question of the extent to which valid judgments may be affected by subsequent legislation within the same State. The external form of execution will require to be altered. It will run in the name of the new sovereign, in place of that of the old.

⁸⁹ De Rossi (p. 172) and Moreau (p. 65) in substance agree with me as regards both cases. Despagne, § 259, holds that the exequatur is not necessary in the second case: "parce qu'il serait irrationnel de demander l'exequatur à des juges établis par le souverain même du pays où l'exécution doit avoir lieu." Fiore (J. v. p. 235, and Eff. § 154), Norsa (Rev. vi. p. 253), and the Italian judgments reported by him, take a different view. The Italian courts have, however, differed much upon the subject (J. v. ut cit.). I cannot think that the arguments adduced upon either side are conclusive. Moreau argues that in those cases the party acquires a jus quaesitum by the judgment. That is a mere petitio principii; the question is whether the jus quaesitum must not give way to higher considerations, as frequently happens. Rossi takes sounder ground in pointing out that the courts in question, at the time judgment was given, were subject to a different jus publicum. This argument, however, does not exhaust the question, for we can conceive a territory being annexed in which precisely the same private law and procedure law prevailed as in the annexing country. We find the opposite view supported by the observation that "there is no longer any duality of sovereignty:" but this is a mere phrase. The adoption of the view that no exequatur is required may, it is quite plain, seriously damage the private rights of the defender, e.g. if judgment has been given against him as in contumacem by a court that had no jurisdiction. Let us put the case of a judgment depending upon an assertion of jurisdiction like that of the much criticised § 14 of the Code Civil.

⁹⁰ To the same effect Moreau, p. 65; Ct. of Paris, 9th June 1874 (J. ii. p. 188).

Again, a judgment pronounced before the separation of the territories, by a court of the province which is now cut off, falls to be treated as a native judgment in the State from which it is cut off. At that time it had ipso jure validity and operation in all the other provinces of that State; no change has been made in its terms since that date, and an enquiry even into the jurisdiction of the court would be altogether unprofitable.

The same thing must be said, for the same reason, of a judgment which, before the surrender of the province, was pronounced in some other province of the State which is surrendering it, in a question as to the execution of the judgment within the surrendered province.⁹¹

But the point of time at which the judgment of first instance was pronounced will not always be decisive. If an appeal depended between the parties, and the court of appeal decides the matter at issue,⁹² then, in a legal point of view, the decision of the court of second instance is the only real decision in the case, although it may be disguised in the shape of an affirmation of the court of first instance or of a rejection of the appeal; the decision of the court of first instance is thereby reduced to the level of a mere opinion. But it is otherwise if no appeal was taken, and the judgment became capable of being put into execution, by reason of the parties allowing the period for taking such an appeal to elapse. In this case the date at which the judgment of the court of first instance was pronounced, and not the date at which the time for appeal elapsed, will regulate the matter. The fact that the judgment might have been assailed is not on the same footing as an actual affirmance, or reversal, or modification of it. The judgment existed before the days for appeal ran out. It was not the lapse of these days that brought it into existence.

But if we take the case of an appeal, in which the sentence of the court below is either cassed, or the appeal refused, in the former case the judgment of cassation, if pronounced after the surrender of the province, is a foreign judgment, which has no operation without an exequatur.⁹³ If appeal is refused, the parties have no further opportunity of challenging the judgment of the court of first instance. On this ground, it must be regarded as a final and conclusive judgment pronounced in that province.⁹⁴

⁹³ Moreau (§ 59, p. 67) proposes to examine abstractly the character of the appeal. But this would involve us in difficult enquiries, and it may happen that an appeal takes the one character or the other according to the discretion of the superior court. (Cf. e.g. § 501 of the German Civilprozessordnung, dealing with appeals, and also § 528.) In principle, however, it is not the abstract law that will decide the point, but its concrete embodiment in the decision of the court.

⁹⁴ See Moreau, ut cit. He puts the result, however, in part at least, upon the theory of droit acquis.

When a part of a country is occupied by an enemy, there is no change in the sovereign right over it until peace is concluded: and the power which is in occupation cannot alter the municipal law. We cannot therefore admit that the occupation will have any effect upon the execution of civil judgments. Judgments pronounced by the courts of the country whose troops are in occupation are foreign judgments for the territory so occupied; and the converse also holds. Judgments, on the other hand, which are pronounced in the province so occupied are native and not foreign judgments as regards the State to which the occupied territory still de jure belongs. The converse here, again, is also true.⁹⁵

The question will wear a more difficult aspect, if the power, whose troops are in occupation, forces the courts of the province to give their judgments in name of this power so in occupation. This would no doubt be a transgression of the strict limits of public law. If, however, it were done, still, so long as the usurpation confines itself to that matter of form, we should give the same answers as we have already given.⁹⁶ It would put another face on things, if the power so in occupation should introduce new judges, or interfere with legislation.

IF THE COURT WHICH GAVE JUDGMENT IS SITUATED IN ANOTHER PART OF A COMPOSITE STATE.

§ 454. No general answer can be given to the question whether a judgment, pronounced in another province of the State, is to be regarded as a native or a foreign judgment. We must consider the actual facts and circumstances of the particular country. But at all events it would be quite unsound to say that, because two territories had the same person as sovereign, one of them could not refuse to give execution to the judgments of the other. In the times of the old French monarchy, judgments pronounced within the territory of one French Parliament did not receive execution de plano within that of another: no doubt, at a later date, judgments specially authenticated by the Royal seal were declared to be entitled to execution without a "pareatis" being required. Scottish and Irish judgments, and judgments pronounced in English colonies, stand by no means on the same footing in England as English judgments: Sweden and Norway, too, although governed by the same Royal House, look each upon the other as a foreign country in questions as to the execution of their judgments.⁹⁷ On the other hand, judgments pronounced in any of the Swiss cantons will receive effect all over Switzerland,⁹⁸ always, however, provided that the limits of jurisdiction prescribed in the federal constitution are not overstepped.

⁹⁵ See Moreau, § 66; Despagnet, § 258; Daguin, p. 371.

Judgments of the French colonies are treated in France as French judgments;⁹⁹ it is otherwise with England and her colonies. Within the German Empire all enquiry into the jurisdiction of the court that pronounced judgment is excluded. It is supposed that the theoretical ascertainment of the jurisdiction by the rules of the Civilprozessordnung, which are common to the whole Empire, is sufficient. But they can never, of course, exclude the possibility of there being an excess of jurisdiction in consequence either of an error in law or of an error in fact.

But, since by far the most important factor in the matter of execution is a close and complete scrutiny of the jurisdiction of the court which pronounced judgment, in logic the important point must be whether the courts of the different parts of a State or of a federation of States are subordinated to one and the same Supreme Court, which has power to enquire into their jurisdiction in all cases. If this is the case, then the party, by taking an appeal against the judgment of the court of first instance, can raise the question of jurisdiction before the very court before which it would be raised if the plea of "no jurisdiction" were taken in answer to a demand for exequatur. This purely logical treatment of the matter is generally modified by usage and by positive law,¹⁰⁰ and the question is not one of such vital importance, if, as is the case in England and in the United States, the execution of foreign judgments is in other respects made independent of arbitrary conditions.

THE CONDITION OF RECIPROCITY: COMMENTARY.

§ 455. One such special condition for the execution of foreign judgments is that there shall be reciprocity. Thus in particular § 661 (5) of the German Civilprozessordnung refuses execution "unless reciprocity is guaranteed."¹⁰¹ In fact, great weight is generally laid in international matters on the rule of reciprocity, which seems simply to be an equitable rule. We must not, however, stretch it too far, especially since the interests of private persons will be directly affected by the attitude of the ⁹⁹ Moreau, § 54.

¹⁰¹ Both in Austria and Hungary great weight is laid on this point. V. Püttlingen, p. 473.

State, and as it may well be that our State will severely damage itself and its subjects if it refuses to apply a principle which is sound in itself, because another State does not recognise that principle in its dealings with our citizens.

If we cannot confide in the administration of justice in other States, then, as Asser has noticed (Rev. i. p. 95), the system of reciprocity in the execution of judgments gives us no better guarantee on the matter. The unjust or erroneous judgments of the foreign State will not be made one whit more just or less mischievous to our citizens, because that State puts our far superior judgments into execution.¹⁰² It is much more logical, if we are to impose restrictions upon execution, and if we cherish distrust of the judicial arrangements of foreign States, to require, as Moreau does (§ 236), a treaty with the foreign State. The Government, or, if the case allows it, the representatives of the people, can then examine the guarantees for the administration of justice which exist in the other State. On the other hand, there is no logic in saying, "We distrust the foreign judgment, and accordingly we shall refuse to give it an exequatur, but, at the same time, we will trust any one who will trust our judicial system." Besides, there may be much dispute as to the application of this condition of reciprocity.¹⁰³ It is enough that the foreign State will execute some judgments of our courts? Or is it necessary that it should execute them in all cases in which our courts would execute judgments pronounced in that other State? Or, lastly, is it enough that, in the same circumstances as exist in the particular case, the foreign State would give execution? If we assume the first of these suggestions, we should very soon find that our State had to a certain extent debased itself, if the foreign State as a matter of fact should give execution to foreign decrees in a very few cases only, and if, for instance, it should give its own courts a very wide international jurisdiction, while it only recognises the jurisdiction of foreign courts within a very limited area. As regards the second suggested system, it will lead to a denial of execution in the vast majority of cases, particularly if codes and statutes continue to mix up, as they are so apt to do, questions of international with questions of intra-territorial jurisdiction. This would be the result, because execution would have to be refused wherever the regulations as to jurisdiction in the two systems of law concerned did not accurately correspond. The third suggested system is, comparatively speaking, the most correct. It labours, however, under the great evil, that in each particular case uncertainty may easily arise, ¹⁰² Still, this is the system of the German Civilprozessordnung. Where reciprocity is ensured it does not allow execution to be refused, even when there is a palpable and gross violation of general principles of law, e.g. it will force the German judge to execute a judgment against a German subject, if the case be so, although that judgment was obtained by bribery, or although to some extent it wilfully put the German subject at a disadvantage. The German subject will have no remedy save recourse to the foreign courts or to diplomatic representations.

¹⁰³ We cannot, of course, require the foreign State to have a process of execution which coincides with ours. For that end we should require to have an identity of procedure, and perhaps also of judicial system. Wach, i. p. 235.

especially if, as necessarily must happen, we have to enquire into the actual way in which cases are treated in practice in the foreign country, as well as into their enactments on the subject. One who is about to sue in the courts of the one country will, as a rule, not know whether he can obtain any substantial success, after he has obtained judgment, within the territory of the other State.¹⁰⁴

But, in view of the variety in rules of procedure and in the theories on the subject, it is often a question of the greatest doubt whether in the particular case a foreign judgment would be recognised as such by the foreign country. Suppose, for instance, that in one State, say England, there is not so much reverence for the formal validity of foreign judgments as to exclude all recourse against judgments that have been fraudulently obtained—although that recourse is only employed in the most extreme cases—and take it that, as in Germany, the other country allows no discussion of any such point in its courts, then in strictness we have a want of reciprocity on the side of England, and consequently must refuse execution.

We may see, from an interesting judgment of the German Imperial Court (iii.) of 19th May 1882, which is stated with the greatest elaboration, in what enquiries this question of reciprocity may land us,¹⁰⁵ and at the ¹⁰⁴ The controversies and doubts which exist as to the provision of the German Civilprozessordn. confirm what is stated in the text. It is said, for instance, by Struckmann and Koch on § 661, No. 10: "The idea of reciprocity involves that the conditions under which the foreign court will execute German judgments must be the same as the German conditions, or at least not more strict. For instance, the fact that a foreign State generally executes German judgments, will not avail to obtain the execution of a foreign judgment where the jurisdiction of the court was put upon the forum contractus, if the foreign State does not execute German decrees based on this forum. In every case, we must enquire whether a foreign State will execute a German judgment pronounced under the like conditions." Wach, i. pp. 235, 236, thinks that there is no want of reciprocity, unless the foreign State recognises the jurisdiction in question for itself, but will not allow it to our courts or to those of any other country.

¹⁰⁵ Dec. vii. No. 124, p. 406. In the judgment, at its close, it is urged against the execution of English decrees in the German Empire, that in England decisions of foreign—and therefore German—courts on points of prescription are not recognised, because, according to English theories of law, prescription is purely a matter of procedure.

The court below, that of Oldenburg, proceeded on the view that the only question was (the question of jurisdiction being disposed of by the voluntary submission of the defender to the English court) whether the defender would in England, in the execution of a foreign judgment, have been allowed to state objections of the same character as he now urged before the German court. The Imperial court reversed this determination, and affirmed that no execution could be allowed to any country in which the legality of a German decision could in any other case be called in question, because in § 661 (i.) of the German Civilprozessordn. it is expressly said, "the judgment of exequatur must be pronounced without examination into the legality of the original judgment."

Piggott, in his 2nd edition (pp. 429, 430), gives a commentary on this important decision, which he translates in full (p. 470). He says that he cannot concur in the decision of the court of Oldenburg, because it made the law of Germany altogether dependent on the law of the foreign State, and if the foreign State required reciprocity in the same sense, then, in future, there could be no execution in either; "a deadlock would be the result." He thinks the judgment of the Imperial Court was sounder, but its results as mischievous. Assume that German law allows objections A and B to be taken in defence, while the law of the other State allows A, B, and same time, how uncertain these questions are, if, for instance, the two systems in comparison are such systems as the German and the English systems. The only satisfactory way of answering the question whether there is sufficient reciprocity is to be found, as in so many other questions, in a sort of unfettered discretion, apart from ordinary legal argumentations, a discretion which may be exercised by Government or by a department charged with the administration of justice, but cannot be exercised by courts of law.

But, as has already been noticed, we are by no means likely to advance in international law by insisting on this demand for reciprocity; as a rule it will impede our advance. Every State which takes its stand on "reciprocity," asks its neighbour to take precedence with some liberal regulation that shall facilitate commerce, and thus they both remain where they were. Even if, as a matter of fact, reciprocity actually were in use, errors of individual judges might suddenly disturb the whole course of practice. In State A, execution is refused on some special ground; in State B, they reply to this by refusing execution on some broader ground, and soon there is a general refusal to give execution in both States.

§ 456. Accordingly, many authors, among them Asser, and, after the experience derived from the German Civilprozessordnung,¹⁰⁶ Beschorener also (J. xi. p. 43), have declared against any such condition:¹⁰⁷ as a matter of fact, too, in England, the United States, and Italy (Code of Procedure, §

C, or A and C, then in either case the reciprocity desiderated by the Imperial Court would be wanting. But since, unfortunately, the rules of procedure in two different States can never absolutely correspond in these matters, this theory will lead to a denial of all execution. I find in a decision of the Old German Imp. Ct. of Comm. on 3rd June 1876 (Dec. xxi. No. 5, p. 14) a better conception of what is implied in the defence of "fraud" recognised in England and the United States, than is contained in this judgment of the Imperial Court.

¹⁰⁶ Wach's survey (i. p. 239) shows that upon the whole the provision of the Civilprozessordnung has had this effect, that it is only the judgments of a very few States, and those for the most part States which on their side do not require reciprocity, that will be executed. Austrian judgments will no doubt be executed, although Austria does require reciprocity (Imp. Ct. (i.) 22nd Sept. 1883; Seuffert, xxxix. No. 171). But this reciprocity may be very easily disturbed. Again, the party who asks for execution within the German Empire has so much trouble in showing that reciprocity does exist, and the different courts to which application is made contradict each other in the particular case so completely, that it would be more convenient for the party to pass altogether from the question of execution in the German Empire, and simply to take up the matter de novo. But as there may be thought to be some doubt whether the party is entitled to throw up the results of the res judicata, and instead of it to advance his original claims anew, he is often driven into a costly and troublesome series of attempts to make good his foreign res judicata. Thus a party who has been successful in an action abroad is often in a worse position in the German Empire, than if the French system, by which there is no execution of foreign judgments, were the rule.

944), foreign judgments are executed without regard to reciprocity. No one can say that the national dignity is in any way thereby impaired. States should do justice to individuals—and that is the first matter at stake here—without caring whether other States do so also or not. As the bold conduct of France in the recognition of literary property has shown, such liberal treatment of questions of private international law has often more effect than an anxious adherence to the principle of reciprocity.

But lastly, it is very difficult to establish the fact of reciprocity, and very easy to dispute it. It is possible to define it precisely in a treaty, but, in the case of a treaty, it is superfluous to appeal to the principle of reciprocity as such, since treaties generally rest on the principle that the stipulated prestations on either side are to be held to be satisfactory to the parties. The point will be seen to be more doubtful where there are mutual declarations or proclamations by two States, for there the reservation is always either made expressly or may be implied without difficulty, that the one party need only follow out its own declaration so long as the other party adheres to its declaration. Further, a law may be administered in such a way that the reciprocity which ostensibly exists should in fact be reduced to a minimum. Indeed, the reciprocity which is hung out as a sort of signboard may be, by other enactments, e.g. as to jurisdictions, the competency of objections, etc., made almost illusory. Finally, a course of practice may very easily be upset by isolated judgments, or, if the fact be not really so, yet the other State may be misled into thinking so. The German Civilprozessordnung requires reciprocity to be guaranteed (verbürgt).¹⁰⁸ But there is much dispute both among theorists and practitioners wherein this guarantee shall consist. Many desiderate a legal rule laid down by the foreign State, specially sanctioning reciprocity (see e.g. Francke, p. 70, Imp. Ct. (iii.) 19th May 1882; Dec. vii. p. 406): others are contented if legal usage be that reciprocity is given (Struckmann and Koch, note 9 on § 661). But, in any case, all are agreed that the party who asks for execution must prove the existence of reciprocity.¹⁰⁹ In many cases the proof of such a practice, almost amounting to a customary law, will be more difficult than the proof of the claim itself. But proof of the claim is in the meantime excluded. (See infra, § 462.)

Much sounder than any system of reciprocity is, as we have already remarked, the principle of retaliation. Accordingly, in drafting the German Civilprozessordnung, it was originally intended to use that weapon in the extreme cases. It is actually reserved by § 4 of the Bankruptcy Statute for use against foreign creditors, who claim in a German sequestration. In making a reservation of that kind, we work upon a sound principle; we do not wait for others to begin, and it is only in extreme cases that we make our neighbours feel the disadvantages of the unsound principle. In the execution of judgments, that may be a very practical matter. If, for instance, our State executes the judgments of State A, while State A will not execute ours, the result may be that parties will prefer to have recourse to the courts of State A, since their judgments will be certain to obtain execution in our country, whereas a judgment of our courts, although they are better administered, will practically have no effect in A. If we have sound rules for the regulation of jurisdiction, the dangers of such an abuse are not very great: if they are felt, however, we should be able, by means of retaliation, to find a remedy for them, and in this way, perhaps, viz. that we should refuse execution, if that will prejudice the citizen of the foreign country who has been successful, but allow it if the judgment is against him.¹¹⁰ If we really act on large liberal principles, we are entitled to use sharper remedies against non-progressive prejudice and national ignorance, and to act in a way that at every turn will wound the State which disregards the community of nations. If we wait in anxiety till some one else takes the first step, we deprive ourselves of this more effectual remedy. It matters not that retaliation cannot be administered by the courts. The courts as such, in deciding particular cases, are not in a position adequately to estimate the general operation of international relations. Of course, retaliation of this kind in civil actions should not be employed as an engine in large questions of international policy. The possibility of so employing it was recognised, no doubt, in the German Imperial Judicial Commission as a reason for requiring that there should be a general reciprocity required by statute. It will be possible, however, to prevent its being used for any such ends, if the Government is only authorised to employ retaliation when they can obtain an opinion from the Supreme Court or a committee of their number, that it ought to be employed.^{111 112}

¹¹¹ Asser (Rev. i. p. 411) no doubt has retaliation of this kind in view, when he says that we must not throw away the demand for reciprocity, as a means of obtaining concessions from other States in diplomatic negotiations.

¹¹² It is, however, of course obvious that if there be a question of the onus of proof, e.g. if the law allows its courts to employ retaliation on certain conditions, that cannot affect the party who asks for execution: the reasonable course is that his opponent should be put to proof that the judgments of the State which is now asked to give execution do not receive it in the other country.

VALUE OF TREATIES DEALING WITH THE EXECUTION OF JUDGMENTS.

§ 457. In close connection with the question of reciprocity stands the question whether the best way of ensuring recognition and execution of foreign judgments is by entering into treaties.¹¹³ Probably most people think it is.¹¹⁴ I cannot, however, bring myself to take this view. The safer way seems to me to be through the legislation of the different States, although at the same time no opportunity should be lost, while we are making liberal progress in our legislation, of working on the legislation of other States by diplomatic measures, taking up, if need be, the weapon of retaliation. Although it is no easy matter to formulate in legislation the conditions under which the execution of foreign judgments is to be allowed, it is still more difficult to do so in a treaty in which we have to do justice to two divergent systems of law, two philosophies of law which may be far asunder, and two different terminologies. Experience confirms these views. The relations of France and Switzerland, for instance, are close and of long standing. There are agreements between the two countries as to execution of judgments and their respective jurisdictions going back to the beginning of the eighteenth century. French law, too, does not differ very markedly from that of Switzerland, and indeed in a considerable part of Switzerland it is substantially the law of France which rules, so that it might be thought to be particularly easy to come to an understanding. But yet the most recent treaty—in 1869—has not put things on a satisfactory footing. Again, nothing has come of the diplomatic procedure by which the foreign minister of the Netherlands, Gericke v. Hercoynen in 1874¹¹⁵ undertook to promote a more general international agreement as to the execution of foreign judgments, upon a basis which in substance was satisfactory: nor has the more ambitious action set on foot by Mancini in 1881, when he was Italian minister of foreign affairs,¹¹⁶ borne any fruit as yet. Then, again, no treaty has ever yet been concluded between the German Empire and Austria, although the same philosophy of law prevails in these two countries. The observation at once occurs that it is not so easy to correct any errors that may slip into such a treaty as it is to correct them in a statute, and the law will gradually work out its own development on a sound basis, unless there is a positive statute, as most lawyers think that there

¹¹³ Lammasch (p. 351) gives a review of the more important treaties.

¹¹⁴ See the resolutions of the Institute of International Law on 5th Sept. 1878 (Ann. 3 and 4, i. p. 96). "Une réforme complète à l'égard de l'exécution des jugements étrangers ne saurait être réalisée par le seul moyen de lois générales, uniformément applicables à tous les jugements étrangers. Il faut en attendre le complément d'un système de conventions diplomatiques à conclure avec les Etats dont les tribunaux et l'organisation judiciaire paraîtront présenter des garanties suffisantes." Lammasch, p. 351, declares against any system of legislation, and exclusively in favour of a system of treaties.

¹¹⁵ See J. i. p. 159.

¹¹⁶ The substance of it is given in J. xiii. p. 35. See Lammasch, p. 354, note 101.

is in France, forbidding the execution of foreign judgments without special directions in a treaty to do so. Such countries as England and the United States, which do not make a fetish of statute law, and in which law has better conserved its natural capacity of developing its rules according to the nature of the subject, are in a still better position. The exposition given by Piggott, in his second edition, of the most recent English law on the subject of recognition of foreign judgments, shows that sound principles are more and more pervading the law, and are being crystallised in pithy maxims. On the other hand, a series of profound errors is attaching itself to the German Civilprozessordnung, which are fettering German law, as we have noticed more than once. Lammasch, who can certainly not be counted among the adherents of the theory, which, with Laurent's, looks for the golden age of international law to be brought about by the operation of treaties, takes a different view of the matter from us (p. 351), and that although he himself points out (p. 357) many of the tombstones which cover the drafts of treaties on the subject between the leading States. He thinks that to do what can be done by treaties has this advantage, that concession will be balanced by concession, and that the points of agreement will fit exactly into the circumstances of both States.¹¹⁷ For that reason he thinks that it would be possible to go into exact details, and to draw up such precise rules for the different heads of the subject, that no room would be left for the play of judicial discretion at all. But we cannot promise to ourselves that any special advantage would flow from so careful a balancing of concessions, or rather from transactions by way of concession in matters in which the question at issue is as to justice. On the contrary, diplomatists are very apt to go wrong in such matters, and subsequent practice shows what was expected to be advantageous in a totally new light. Practice, too, if it is left unfettered in the application of principles, can fit itself much better and with much more elasticity into the judicial arrangements of the States concerned, than a treaty can do. In negotiating a treaty, every attempt to alter the domestic legislation of either country lets loose a flood of doubts and debates, and gives rise to diplomatic difficulties, or even perhaps to reprisals. To go very carefully into details in making treaties is, just as it is in making laws, to breed more controversy. Of course, in all this we assume that the practice of which we have spoken is a practice that has not entirely forgotten how to develop for itself the logical results of comprehensive principles.

RESTRICTION OF EXECUTION TO JUDGMENTS OF CERTAIN SPECIFIED STATES.

§ 458. A critic may start this further question, viz.: Given the general conditions for execution, should we execute the judgments of all States, ¹¹⁷ Feuerbach, Themis, p. 309, is somewhat in the same vein.

even although, as far as we can see, the judicial administration of this or that State is not one that inspires confidence? The question seems a serious one, but in truth it is not, as we see from the case of England, whose subjects live in great numbers in foreign countries, and whose commerce is the most extensive in the world. If the international jurisdiction of the courts is defined on sound principles, there is a good deal less danger, whereas it must be said that a reciprocal international application of the principles of jurisdiction, laid down by the German Civilprozessordnung, would make the execution of the judgments of foreign countries generally a very serious matter. We must, however, add that, as we have already explained, the pleas of gross and palpable injustice, and of improper influence having been exercised on the court by fraud or crime, must be available, as they are in England and in the United States. Lastly, we cannot well put into execution the judgments of a State within which the citizens of our State enjoy the privilege of extra-territoriality, or should claim it in the view of our own Government. Such an exceptional situation is a proof that the civilisation of the country concerned still differs in too serious particulars from the civilisation of which Europe is the centre, while, of course, we cannot for a moment entertain the idea of executing the judgments of any country with which we have not some community of legal ideas. The judgments of such States are not to be executed even against their own subjects; they could not be brought up as against subjects of our State, because the court that pronounced them would not have any jurisdiction. In doubtful cases the law might empower the executive government, acting on an opinion to be obtained from the Supreme Court or a committee of its judges, to declare that the judgments of the courts of this or that particular State could not receive execution from our courts. It does not seem equally desirable to select, in the Code of Procedure or in some auxiliary ordinance, the particular States, whose judgments are to receive execution.¹¹⁸ In the first place, it might in certain circumstances be thought that such a course involved an offensive expression of distrust of the courts that were not mentioned; it would also seem to imply something like a blind confidence in the courts of the States which were mentioned. Further, the adoption of the measures which we have suggested need not make us apprehensive of any unwarrantable interposition by the Government, since it could only proceed after obtaining an opinion from independent legal officials. This opinion will protect the Government in its relations with the foreign Government, and it will not refuse to give effect to the judgments of civilised States, unless it shall be proved or made highly probable that its courts habitually sanction wilful breaches of justice, or that bribery or other influences of that kind are in full swing there.

But it is just as hopeless to look for a world-wide treaty for the execution of civil judgments as for criminal sentences.¹¹⁹ The minimum of guarantees, which may be quite sufficient for a postal or for a telegraphic union, would not be enough to ensure the observance of the provisions of such a treaty. Nor can we draw any analogy from the conventions for the protection of so-called literary property. In these conventions we are not dealing with any question of the confidence to be given to foreign courts, but merely with a part of the attitude which the legislation of each country should hold to foreigners, an attitude which is at once deducible from the conception of the right that is to be protected. It would, too, be quite a mistake to introduce the most favoured nation clause in any such treaty. But it is quite feasible for one State, in its intercourse with its immediate neighbours, to refrain from insisting on the observance of certain formalities, e.g. those which go to prove the authenticity of the judgment, although they may be quite indispensable in intercourse with more distant States.¹²⁰ International treaties are, however, of more service where mere formalities are concerned than where principles have to be dealt with.¹²¹ But if there must be treaties to settle principles, let them be concluded for a specified time, and with a clause providing for withdrawal,¹²² so that our own legislation may not be tied up too tightly, and some room be left for experience. But yet it is more difficult and more dangerous to withdraw from such treaties than might on a cursory consideration be thought to be the case.

¹¹⁸ So § 436 of the draft of a Danish Code of Procedure. See, on the other hand, Fusinato, p. 64.

OPERATION OF TREATIES. RETROSPECTIVE EFFECT.

§ 459. Treaties of this kind, however, unless there be any express provision to the contrary, are not confined to the subjects of the States who make the treaties, i.e. it is not these subjects alone who are entitled to plead them. They apply generally to the judgments of the courts of the States concerned, irrespective of who it is that pleads them.¹²³ In logic, too, these treaties do not fall aside in the case of war between the contracting States.¹²⁴ It is not to be supposed that in civil matters the courts of a civilised State would take sides against the subjects of the hostile State. We cannot, however, in this place exhaust the question as to how far, in the case of war, international treaties should remain intact.

A treaty, which enacts for the first time that the judgments of another State are to be executed, has a retrospective effect. No one has a jus quasitum that a judgment given against him should not be executed in another State. That they have not, up to this time, been executed, is merely a natural consequence of the circumstance that the power of the State from whose courts the judgment proceeded was restricted to its own territory, except in so far as another State should give it aid. It may, however, be presumed, if any aid is to be given for executing foreign judgments, that the party who has been condemned by the competent court of a foreign State is wrong; no other consideration would justify execution, and a State treaty making provision for execution. We cannot suppose that any party so condemned is less wrong, because judgment was given a few days or months before the treaty came into operation. Francke (p. 89), with whom Lammasch concurs (p. 362, note), draws this very sound inference from this retrospective effect of such treaties,¹²⁵ that even although an application for execution has been refused, that refusal taking the shape of a judgment, there is nothing to prevent the application being repeated, if it was only refused because of the want of any means of giving execution, and in the meantime a treaty, which sanctions such execution, has come into force.

¹²⁰ See Lammasch ut cit.

JUDGMENT AWARDING exequatur. REQUISITIONS BY THE OTHER COURT.
ACTIONS FOR OBTAINING exequatur.

§ 460. The law of the place of execution must, of course, determine the shape in which the foreign judgment is to be presented for execution. In old days the ordinary method in use upon the continent of Europe was a requisition addressed by the court which had pronounced judgment to the court which was to give execution,¹²⁶ and sometimes the person against whom execution was asked was only allowed a hearing upon any representation or complaint he might have to make against an order by the court of execution granting the requisition of the foreign court. Nowadays more modern legislation in the more important States has converted the application into a contentious proceeding from the very beginning, in the shape of an ordinary action,¹²⁷ or at least requires a formal judgment on the application; and even in England the foreign judgment serves merely as a foundation for an independent suit.¹²⁸ Unless, however, the advantages of the execution of foreign judgments are to become in great part illusory, we must not allow this action for execution quite the same position as the Roman actio iudicati, which may be fought on special independent grounds, while the party has also the privilege of availing himself of a simple application for execution, or at least might have availed himself of that, before the expiration of a certain period. On the contrary, unless there be some express enactment to the contrary, the action for execution, raised upon the basis of some foreign judgment, can only be met by such objections, arising after that judgment has been given, as could in similar circumstances be pleaded in arrest of the execution of a judgment pronounced in this country. Thus, if a judgment pronounced in this country can only be met by certain specified kind of evidence, e.g. documents, which have become available since its date,¹²⁹ the same limitation must apply to objections against a foreign judgment which has not yet obtained an exequatur. If it is not to apply, the person against whom execution is asked must show that the law of the court in which the judgment was pronounced recognises a wider range of objections. For the procedure that goes before the decree of exequatur has no other object than to test the considerations which tend to prevent foreign judgments being placed on the same footing as judgments of this country; if there are no such considerations, then an exequatur should at once be pronounced. But we shall make it impossible to take this latter course, if we allow objections, even if they be of subsequent origin, to be pleaded in the action for execution, unless they are capable of being instantly verified by proof (in particular by official documents) such as we require in all cases where judgments of our own country are to be put in force. Any unprincipled debtor would otherwise have it in his power, by putting forward objections, which it might take months, or even years to verify, to force his creditor into a new process in spite of his having obtained a judgment in a foreign court; that process might again be carried from court to court, and might cause the creditor in the end as much delay as an entirely new action. If this restriction is not observed, the execution of foreign judgments may turn out to be a snare.¹³⁰ If, then, the defender in the action of execution raises ¹²⁹ According to the older common law of Rome, as it prevailed in Germany, none but liquid objections could be raised; nor could they, unless they were subsequent to the judgment. See Wetzell, § 47, note 124. The German Civilprozessordnung (§ 691) retains for German judgments that require execution the condition that objections to the execution shall be capable of instant verification.

¹²⁷ So in the German Civilprozessordnung, § 661 (2); for French law see Moreau, § 136, Daguin, p. 108. The Italian Code of Procedure speaks of a "Giudizio di deliberazione."

¹²⁸ See Piggott's exposition (J. x. p. 34). It is now recognised that the original ground of action cannot be pleaded anew.

¹³⁰ This specially important point has not been noticed with sufficient distinctness in the literature that deals with the relative provisions of the German Civilprozessordnung. This is just what might have been expected from its formal treatment of the procedure connected with private international law, and from the way in which it adheres to the literal words of the statute. I should like to notice that Wach (§ 19, note 18 ad fin.) insists on the character of the procedure which has for its object a decree of exequatur as an ordinarium, "the objective limits of which are not more narrowly drawn by the statute;" he declares himself in favour of allowing illiquid objections. The formalistic point of view, which leaves the true object of the procedure altogether on one side, comes prominently into view in Planck's Lehrb. d. Deutschen Civilpr. § 27, note 51. "In consequence the party does not submit the objections that are illiquid, he must be referred to the court which pronounced judgment,¹³¹ or he must raise an action of repetition (condictio) in the court that has jurisdiction. Until a valid judgment is pronounced in such an action, it can exercise no influence on the procedure for execution.

But should the court that pronounced the original judgment, or some court of the same foreign State, which can control that court, or some objection raised by the person against whom execution is to be done, withdraw the right to execute the judgment, or withdraw it for a time, absolute respect must be paid to this decision in the process of exequatur. The decision, which, as Piggot (p. 100) expresses it, has to be clothed in our courts with a kind of auxiliary decree, to give it the accessory force that is necessary to ensure its operation there, still remains a foreign decree, and draws all its substantial virtue from the judicial order of a foreign State. It loses, then, all its virtue in this country the moment the foreign judicial authority recalls it. The matter is quite in a different position, if the right of the original judgment to obtain execution has been already formally established:¹³² if, e.g. the judgment of exequatur required by the German Civilprozessordnung has been pronounced, or if, at least, the process of exequatur has already reached the stage at which objections can no longer be received. In such a case the second judgment of the foreign court, in order to be admitted to the effect of sisting the exercise of its imperium by this country, must in its turn receive an exequatur. No officer in this country who has a judgment by one of his own courts, requiring immediate execution, put into his hand with the right and the duty of so executing it, can well enquire whether some foreign judgment must be taken by him as an authority for deferring execution.

NO COUNTER ACTION ADMISSIBLE IN THE PROCESS WHICH IS INSTITUTED TO OBTAIN EXECUTION.

§ 461. It is, however, completely inconsistent with the idea of an auxiliary process to admit a counter action against the claim for execution. An illiquid process of this kind is still more likely than an illiquid objecrequest of a foreign court for assistance; he raises a claim, for which provision is made by the Civilprozessordnung, to be allowed means of execution." The view which holds that objections which have arisen subsequently, are not admissible before the court of execution, even though they be liquid, is in any case wrong. See supra, § 450.

¹³¹ To a different effect judgment of the Imp. Ct. (iv.), 5th Feb. 1885, Dec. xiii. No. 88, p. 349, which lays down that objections that have arisen subsequently cannot be remitted to the foreign court.

¹³² Francke (pp. 12 and 85) overlooks this distinction. He always harps on this, that no foreign court can interfere with execution in Germany. But, in the first case put, it is not proposed that it should. But see Gianzana, iii. § 96, and the judgment of the Ct. of Paris of 3rd June 1881 there cited. An action for repetition of something paid under a foreign decree can only be raised in the courts of the country that gave the original judgment. See Esperson, (J. xi. p. 270), who founds upon a decision of the Appeal Court of Florence of 5th April 1869.

tion, to turn the whole advantage which the victor has taken from the foreign process into a mockery. Even Moreau, § 125 (4), who, in other respects, is cautious enough with regard to any concession that it is proposed to make to the foreign court, regards a counter action as irreconcilable with the "demande en exequatur." The whole foundation for jurisdiction in counter actions lies in considerations of equity, which are unpractical and out of place, as I have shown, in all questions of international jurisdiction, but, in connection with the matters which we have now in hand, result in absolute injustice. If a pursuer proposes to deal exhaustively with some claim in this or that court, it may be thought fair, and in the interests of simplicity of procedure, that his opponent should be able, while he is so engaged, to deal with his claims on the other side in the same court. But, in the case of a process of exequatur, a complete and exhaustive treatment of the subject is impossible; all that is now competent is a secondary enquiry of a formal kind. Would it then be fair, that the one party should be able to draw in his successful opponent, who, as it is, is already in many cases suffering severely from the territorial limits to the operation of the judgment he has obtained, to discuss with him exhaustively some other matter altogether? But eminent German jurists lay down,¹³³ that by the German Civilprozessordnung, which treats a claim for execution in form as an ordinary action, a counter action is allowable. This shows us that such new formalities as are introduced by this German Code, in what we must call an obscure way, not unfrequently indicate a sad retrogression, in spite of all their apparent plausibility. Then, too, as a matter of legal reasoning, the case is made even worse by the limitation imposed by § 33 of the German Code on the competency of counter actions, viz. that the claim which is advanced in the counter action must be connected with the claim advanced in the original action, or with the defences stated in that action against it.¹³⁴ The question whether such a connection does or does not exist, leads directly to a discussion of that claim, which should in the light of the foreign judgment be recognised as res judicata.¹³⁵

ORIGINAL CLAIM EXCLUDED. POSSIBILITY OF ADVANCING IT IN THE END.

§ 462. But, while the foreign res judicata may as such be advanced in support of an exequatur—either by way of action or by way of requisition—

¹³³ Francke, p. 99; Wach, Civilproc. § 40, note 37, p. 485.

¹³⁴ One of the examples adduced by Wach and by Francke on this matter is instructive. The defender alleges that after the foreign judgment has been pronounced he has extinguished the claim for which decree was given by a certain payment or prestation, and, as what he gave was in excess of what was due by him, he has now a claim against the original pursuer. Francke does not state this illustration quite correctly, but Wach corrects it.

¹³⁵ What is to be the result, if the plea in defence, with which the counter action is said to be connected, was brought before the foreign court, but repelled as formally incompetent, or if the judge of this country takes a different view of the plea from that taken by the foreign judge?

it must also be so advanced.¹³⁶ The party is no longer at liberty to choose whether he shall advance his original claim or plead the res judicata of the foreign judgment.¹³⁷

On the other hand, applying again general principles, there is nothing to prevent a party, who could raise an actio judicati to carry out a judgment of a court of this country, from doing the like to carry out a foreign judgment,¹³⁸ instead of availing himself of the method of requisition or of an action of exequatur. These latter methods ensure him certain advantages, e.g. that even objections which have subsequently arisen are only to be looked at if they are liquid: it is competent on general principles for the party to decline to avail himself of such advantages.

Of course, the limitations which are in other cases set upon the execution of foreign judgments cannot be disregarded by adopting this means of execution, viz. the actio judicati. All the limitations which are set upon the ordinary process of execution in this respect are applicable also to the actio judicati. Some positive enactment may exclude the actio judicati; thus, for instance, it may be excluded by implication, if all attempts to put foreign judgments in force must be brought before a superior court in view of the public interest, while the actio judicati is competent only before the ordinary courts of first instance. [An actio judicati will therefore be competent only upon native judgments.]¹³⁹

But, even assuming that the actio judicati is admissible according to the law of the State of execution—and still more naturally, if that law gives no such choice—it is of the very highest interest for the party, who has been successful in obtaining judgment in a foreign country, to know in good time, whether the foreign judgment as such will be recognised as res judicata, so as to aid him in obtaining execution. Any uncertainty on that point may give rise to a costly, wearisome, and entirely unprofitable action. Then, again, if the party has the power, as he certainly has in

¹³⁸ He may have good ground for it: he may, for instance, see that the person against whom execution is to be done would raise a counter action, founding on facts alleged to be of subsequent date, but incapable of instant proof: the party, however, desires to dispose of the whole matter at once from the bottom.

virtue of the German Civilprozessordnung, to combine with his action for execution an action founded on the original legal relation, this combination, thus competent in abstracto, but in truth generally impracticable, will be the source of the greatest delays, at considerable expense, and with no result in the end. Thus the pursuer will, as the whole matter will eventually be taken up de novo, lose a good part of the profit to which he is entitled in respect of his res judicata.

Special prejudice may be suffered, and has already been felt by the necessity, within the German Empire, of showing that the foreign country will give reciprocity, and if we put all considerations together, we shall in the end be still more inclined to say,¹⁴⁰ that, rather than adopt the rules laid down in the German Civilprozessordnung, we should have recourse to the simple position which now prevails in France, where, apart from the provisions of treaties—and the German Empire has not as yet concluded any, although for some of the German States they do exist—foreign judgments are not admitted at all to execution. The parties then know at least where they are, and do not require to learn, as in many, perhaps in most cases they will learn, after marching through several courts, that there is no such thing as an auxiliary judgment for them. In the German system, the decisions of the higher courts are not absolute guides for the future: and, apart from the very various conceptions that lawyers may form of what “reciprocity” is, the actual circumstances of the other State may very possibly alter. A single judgment, refusing to give effect to the judgment of a German court on any ground whatever, may be sufficient to destroy the doctrine, hitherto held, that there is in that country a guarantee of reciprocity.

CONSIDERATION OF POSSIBLE LEGISLATION ON THE PROCESS OF exequatur. TERRITORIAL SCOPE OF THE exequatur.

§ 463. The old forms of the requisition had, as we remarked, many advantages over the form by which the party raises an action for himself, which has been more and more adopted, and has been to a greater and greater extent naturalised by practice. This latter process, however, seems to be better suited to the forms of modern procedure. Our object, therefore, should be to put it in the shape in which the creditor shall be able to get his rights as quickly and as cheaply as possible.¹⁴¹

If then, as seems to follow from the principles we have laid down, all that the party asking for execution is required to do is, in substance, to prove the jurisdiction of the court (in cases of decrees in absence, to show that there has been adequate, and real, not fictitious citation),¹⁴² and to produce the judgment which is to be executed in authentic form, verified, if need be, by a certificate from the foreign ambassador, it seems unnecessary¹⁴³ to allow an appeal from one court to another on the facts, upon which the jurisdiction of the foreign court is rested,¹⁴⁴ so simple are they in most cases. But, on the other hand, the question of the execution of foreign judgments is a question of great and of general importance for the security of international intercourse, and raises sometimes so profound and so difficult considerations of legal doctrine, e.g. when there is a question as to the admissibility of certain objections or as to the value to be set upon prohibitive or coercitive rules of law, that it does not seem proper to shut out review by the higher, or even by the Supreme Courts, or to circumscribe their powers of review more than is imperatively necessary. We must remember, too, that the establishment of uniform general principles, a thing which is in the highest degree desirable in the sphere of the execution of foreign judgments, can only be effected by the interposition of the Supreme Court.¹⁴⁵ Accordingly, the enquiry should in the first instance be conducted by one of the higher courts (in Germany the Oberlandesgericht), a course which is adopted in Italy.¹⁴⁶ The Supreme Court would then have simply to examine the rules of law laid down by this court, in its character as a court of cassation or of review.¹⁴⁷ Any danger of overloading the Supreme Court by cases of the kind might be avoided by requiring the amount involved in the suit to be so and so to warrant an appeal, or by imposing a fine in the event of the failure of the appeal, as is done in the French Court of Cassation.

¹⁴⁰ See supra, p. 977, note 106.

¹⁴² That proof will be furnished by official documents, and accordingly is very simple.

Of course, a simple system of that kind will be unsuitable if the objections to the process of execution are allowed to be unduly extended, or if counter actions are permitted, as they are by the German Civil- ¹⁴³ Of course, the question of transmission of the party's rights, as well as the question whether the debt has or has not been discharged, may in certain circumstances raise special difficulties. In these cases parties might be referred to the court of first instance, if the pursuer should not at once have had recourse to it.

¹⁴⁴ The enquiry into the facts which regulate the question of international jurisdiction will present no difficulties, unless there is some impossibility of separating them from the materialia causæ. But in these cases the parties are completely instructed on the subject by the antecedent procedure in the court which gave the original judgment. One cannot, therefore, use in this case the argument which is generally cited in support of the maintenance of a complete course of appeal, viz. that it is only in the court below that the parties first become thoroughly acquainted with the facts on which the case depends. Again, in other cases, in which the proof is from some special reason more complicated, it is at all events well known what the point of the enquiry will be, since the object is simply to settle the question of jurisdiction.

¹⁴⁵ In Spain, where foreign judgments are executed on the condition of reciprocity, even although there is no treaty, the Supreme Court at Madrid in very simple procedure determines the question of exequatur directly.

¹⁴⁶ See Esperson (J. xi. p. 262) on the reasons which have induced Italy to take this course.

¹⁴⁷ I cannot assent to the view, that, if the judgment has been pronounced by a higher court, then a correspondingly high court shall deal with the exequatur. See Moreau, § 133. Weiss, pp. 869, 870.

processordn., or if the pursuer has the burden thrown upon him of showing that there is reciprocity practised or guaranteed by the other country concerned. If it is desired to have any such troublesome extensions of the enquiry, which are quite inadequate, because they are irrelevant, then, keeping in view the rules of procedure which must necessarily be adopted, it will be necessary to double the courts of review.¹⁴⁸

But, since the pursuer, if he fails to get a judgment of exequatur, will only be able to sue on his original grounds of action in a court of first instance, it will be desirable, in the prospect of such a contingency arising, to give the party who asks for an exequatur his choice between the court of first instance and the court of second instance. In cases where there can be no doubt suggested, he would at once apply to the superior court; if there was doubt, he would have recourse in the first place to the inferior court, and would eventually, if need be, combine with that application his action upon his original claim.

On the other hand, it is desirable that, when the application for an exequatur has once been granted, the decree should be one that can be executed all over the territory of the State.^{149 150}

If we look upon the motion for execution as an actio judicati, then this extension of the force of the exequatur is justified by the consideration that the judgment in the actio judicati is a judgment by the courts of this country, and as such must receive effect all over the territory belonging to this country. But we reach precisely the same result, if we hold the theory, which is less restricted, and in my opinion is more correct, according to which the procedure is simply intended to be the means of obtaining a decision of the point, whether, in the view which the State where execution is asked holds of international law, it should and will allow the foreign judgment to enjoy the compulsitors of law within its territory. Any other theory is a remnant of the old procedure, according to which the court, to which the requisition in the particular case was presented, had in each case to consider whether it should grant the prayer of the requisition. The court in which the action originally depended issued as many requisitions as there were jurisdictions within ¹⁴⁸ The German Civilprocessordn. § 660 (2), allows the ordinary principles of German law to determine the jurisdiction of the courts in so far as the subject matter or the value of the subject of the action is concerned. Accordingly, as a rule, the action will, in the case where the value is small, be raised before a single judge (Amtsgericht); where the value is large, or where it cannot be estimated in money, in the courts of first instance, where several judges sit together. The judgment that is to be executed, and not the original conclusions of the action, will determine what is the value of the cause. See Struckmann and Koch on § 660, note 4.

¹⁴⁹ It is so in England, in the United States, in France, and in the German Empire (Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz, § 161). See Francke, p. 15. Also Lammasch, p. 433.

which measures for execution had to be taken. In addition to this, it was the case that, even in the case of requisitions by courts within the same territory, an investigation into the competency of the judge from whom they proceeded used to take place, and no such marked distinction was drawn between the judgments of the courts of this country and those of another, as in our times is seen to be obvious and necessary.

If, then, the decree of exequatur is to be operative all over the territory, it is desirable that the court of the domicile of the person against whom execution is to be done should be selected as the proper court in which to make the application, and that the court, within whose jurisdiction property available for execution exists, should not be competent, unless the defender has no domicile in the country. That is the effect of the German Civilprozessordn. § 666 (2). Moreau, too, thinks that the same rule should hold in France, and, as we know, in England and Scotland personal actions belong primarily to the jurisdiction of the court where the defender has his domicile, or at least some residence that is not a merely temporary residence. Further, in so far as the res judicata of a foreign country is to be respected as such, and all further enquiry in the matter is excluded, the exequatur is a matter for the consideration of the courts that have a general jurisdiction,¹⁵¹ and not for any of those courts that have a limited and special jurisdiction, e.g. courts of commerce or Admiralty courts. But even if some review on the merits is competent, it is desirable to refer the procedure to the courts of ordinary jurisdiction,¹⁵² for this reason, that these doubts and disputes as to jurisdiction, which will necessarily arise, if the particular kind of court, which is now invoked, does not exist in the foreign country, will be avoided. Logic hardly requires any other course, unless the case is to be treated anew from the beginning. But one would be much inclined even in that case to break through the strict rules of logic, and to hold that the ordinary courts have jurisdiction, in order that it may thus be possible, if the occasion should arise, to dispose of the application for an exequatur and of the merits of the original claim together, if the matter of the exequatur be one that is not referred to the Appeal Courts.

INCORRECT CONCEPTIONS. EXPENSES OF THE PROCESS.

§ 464. The theory, which in our opinion is the sound one, does not acknowledge that there is any separate and independent claim for the execution of the foreign judgment. The truth rather is that we find, in the judgment of exequatur, a declaration that the consequences of the judgment may be enforced by legal compulsitors within the territory. This view of the matter enables us to avoid an illogical conception of the effects of the judgment, which will result from the opposite view adopted in the German Civilprozessordnung. The conception entertained in that code is that it is merely the judgment of exequatur, following upon the judgment of the foreign court, that is admitted to execution, and that that foreign judgment is not itself allowed execution at all. Accurately considered, that involves a right to demand execution in the second degree, and is a logical contradiction, for the judgment of exequatur does not itself contain anything that can be enforced by compulsitor. It is quite true that the decree of exequatur must contain the clause of execution which is required in ordinary circumstances by the German Civilprozessordnung. That is so, because the process of diligence is worked out by officers who act upon their own responsibility, and must have some evidence that is at once available in their hands, which will show on simple inspection that there is no reason for delay in executing the judgment that has been pronounced, and that that judgment is not liable to be suspended by any form of legal process still available. But any such clause as that must in logic be referred to the foreign judgment, and not to the judgment pronounced in the country of execution, although it may no doubt be controlled by any limitations or modifications attached to the former by the latter.¹⁵³ And thus even a provisional sentence of execution, which may be awarded on account of some circumstances that have chanced to emerge before the court dealing with the exequatur,¹⁵⁴ must, accurately speaking, proceed upon the original foreign judgment.

¹⁵¹ See Weiss, p. 969, to this effect; Daguin, p. 189. In the sound view of the German Civilprozessordn., motions for exequatur can never come before the commercial courts. See Francke, p. 94; Struckmann and Koch, § 660, note 4.

Primarily, of course, what we have said is concerned simply with matter of form; but many mistaken conclusions are drawn from incorrect ideas on matters of form. Thus, for instance, some French decisions have proposed to throw upon the person who applies for the exequatur the whole expense of the procedure even although it is entirely successful, because the applicant desires to have a document, the foreign judgment, declared to be capable of execution. If we hold fast to the true theory, by which the process of exequatur is merely a continuation of the leading process, we are secured against any such fallacious conclusions. The ordinary rule must, of course, prevail, and one who sets himself to carry out this further procedure in a wrong way, or without good cause resists that procedure, must bear the expense. It would be wrong to relieve any one of expenses who has nothing to say against the exequatur, but, as a matter of fact, by his failure to pay compels his adversary to apply for an exequatur in another country. Our theory, too, unlike the theory which holds the foreign judgment to give in some vague way a foundation for an independent claim or action for execution, results in this, viz. that, when an exequatur is granted, the decree granting it has necessarily a retrospective effect in the State which grants it, and that the right thus clothed with an exequatur dates from the point of time at which the decree, or the law of the court that pronounced the decree, puts its origin.¹⁵⁵ No additions to the subject matter of the action, or modifications of it, are competent in the course of the process of exequatur.¹⁵⁶ If the claim in which the pursuer has succeeded is transformed into some new claim, from the fact that the object to recover which it was directed has passed into our territory, then a new action, to give effect to this new claim, must be raised in our country: the foreign decision may afford a prejudicial or an incidental point to the parties in this second action.

¹⁵⁴ §§ 653, 654, of the German Civilprozessordnung no doubt require that, if execution is to take place, the decree in virtue of which it is to take place must be a final decree. The device adopted, to evade the difficulty, is that the decree of exequatur, and so indirectly the judgment on the merits, are declared to be provisionally capable of execution. But the German Civilprozessordnung would prevent even judgments that had been declared by a foreign court to be provisionally capable of execution, from being executed. See supra, p. 947.

JURISDICTION OF THE STATE TO WHICH APPLICATION IS MADE FOR exequatur TO ENTERTAIN SUCH AN APPLICATION EVEN WHERE FOREIGNERS ARE CONCERNED. AUXILIARY JURISDICTION TO AFFIRM THE ORIGINAL GROUND OF ACTION.

§ 465. The courts of the State in which an exequatur is desired, derive, however, under all circumstances their jurisdiction to entertain that application from the fact that what is desired is an order upon the officials of that country (see supra, § 436), and that irrespective of whether all the parties are foreigners or not. If the State refuses on some other ground to give its exequatur to a judgment which has been pronounced by a competent court, it must at least allow the original claim to be founded on in a new action, if the defender has assets within the territory on which diligence can be done.¹⁵⁷ The nature of the case justifies this peculiar jurisdiction: but for some such jurisdiction a refusal to give an auxiliary decree would involve an absolute denial of justice. Any State, which, in place of recognising the res judicata, would not even allow the original claim to be sued on with the object of attaching any assets situated within its own ¹⁵⁵ To the same effect Moreau, p. 133.

¹⁵⁷ A judgment of the Ct. of Paris of 15th June 1861, to an opposite effect, has been subjected to the sharpest possible criticism in France. See Daguin, p. 96. Art. 9 of the Brazilian statute of 27th July 1878 (translated by Constant, p. 23) very properly provides: "Lorsque le jugement aura été déclaré non exécutoire les pièces, documents et autres preuves qui lui auraient servi de base, pourraient être exhibés dans les actions qui seraient intentées dans l'empire pour le même objet et seraient reçues selon leur valeur d'après le droit."

In the German Empire the jurisdiction created by § 24 of the Civilprozessordnung applies, and in this case properly applies. It is: "In actions of a patrimonial nature against a person, who has no domicile in the empire, the court within whose territory property, or the article claimed in the action, is found to exist, has jurisdiction."

territory, would convert itself, to its own loss, into an asylum for the unprincipled debtors of all countries. To this extent at least a judgment pronounced by a court which, on the principles of international law, had jurisdiction, must give a title to sue all over the civilised globe.

FORM OF ENQUIRY IN APPLICATIONS FOR exequatur. (AVERMENTS OF THE PURSUER AND DEFENCES FOR THE DEFENDER. OBJECTIONS.)
ENQUIRY ex parte judicis.

§ 466. By English law the foreign judgment is treated as prima facie valid and operative, and it falls upon the person, against whom execution is asked, to show the English court as a defence that the judgment is invalid or should not be respected. On the other hand, in a German court, the applicant is required to show that there is reciprocity, and logically therefore will be required to show that all the other conditions, necessary for an exequatur, are present. An intermediate course seems to be the sound one. Jurisdiction and, in the case of decrees in absence, citation, are substantially conditions indispensable to every exequatur. Accordingly, these the applicant must prove. The other points, however, to which attention may require to be given, constitute exceptions, and, according to ordinary legal rules, the burden of pleading and of proving them must lie on the party who appeals to them; that, for instance, would be the case with the objection that the judgment was based on gross injustice, in particular on fraud. There is no danger involved in this division of the burden of proof, provided that the court is free to weigh the evidence that is laid before it. If an application is made for execution of a judgment pronounced in some country in which there is good ground for saying that gross irregularities of procedure exist, it may perhaps with some probability be inferred that in the particular case in hand something of the kind has taken place, and some corroborative circumstances, combined with the general impression of the whole case, or even the terms of the judgment itself, may be sufficient to warrant us in pronouncing that this objection is well founded. We see, then, that if sufficient liberty of discretion is left to the court, there is no such danger as some people think, in recognising that execution may be allowed without any special treaty to that end, even as regards distant countries. On the other hand, a State treaty in which, from considerations of international courtesy, there is no mention made of the plea of gross injustice or of fraud, and where therefore these pleas are incompetent, is a much more dangerous matter. To refuse execution in that case is at the least an offence against the letter of the treaty, and will readily give rise to diplomatic questions. If the Government should venture to depart even slightly from the treaty, that may be regarded as a slight upon the other State. Accordingly, there is much to induce the Government to refrain from doing so on grounds which cannot be reconciled with the claims of justice. On the other hand, the somewhat cheaply earned laurels of concluding a treaty for auxiliary executions of judgments, according to a fixed plan, may have a charm for the diplomatist. It is very likely that, in concluding the treaty, the judicial arrangements of the other State may be found to be all that can be desired. It is only after it has been concluded that it is discovered how much danger is involved in it.

The result of what has been said is that—at least where the court is unfettered in its discretion—there is not the least necessity for introducing any special rules of procedure to regulate the process of exequatur. It is not, e.g. necessary to impose any duty upon the judge or any one else of making an official enquiry to determine the presence of the necessary conditions for exequatur, or to exclude on principle the admissions of the parties with reference to these conditions. The question of the effect to be given to any concessions of the parties as to the jurisdiction of the court, must depend upon the extent to which the parties are free otherwise to deal as they please with the subject of the action. On the other hand, as regards the question whether a particular act may be enforced within the territory of the State in which execution is demanded, no declaration by the parties can avail, since the matter to be determined is a pure matter of law, and belongs to jus publicum. Even Moreau¹⁵⁸ (§§ 128, 129), although, as we have noticed, he is by no means inclined to concede much to foreign jurisdiction, distinctly declares in favour of giving the largest possible effect to an admission or a voluntary submission by the parties, and that even from the point of view of the French law, which requires, if there be no treaty in existence, a revision of the judgment on its merits by the French court. He very properly describes as erroneous the opinion that the rights of the sovereign power of France exclude parties from making any such arrangement. If that were so, we should require to hold that a payment could not validly be made on the strength of a foreign judgment, and that it would in all such cases be competent to reclaim the money.

It is remarkable that the commentators on the German Civilprozessordnung, holding fast to the letter of the statute, have come to the conclusion that, as regards all the conditions (1-5), expressed in § 661, there is a special duty upon the judge to take up the enquiry,¹⁵⁹ but what the special character of that enquiry is to be they do not make very clear. There are no real grounds for this interpretation springing from the necessity for protecting legal intercourse between different States; while I have not been able to discover that any such interpretation is obvious upon the words of the statute.¹⁶⁰

¹⁵⁹ See a judgment of the Ct. of Turin, of 6th October 1870 (Rev. ix. p. 262), for the erroneous view, which holds that it is pars judicis to hold enquiry into the jurisdiction of the foreign court, because the question is one of public order. See, on the other hand, Gianzana, iii. § 113, "The plea of no jurisdiction is lost, if the defender appears and does not take it."

¹⁶⁰ It seems from Francke, p. 77; Struckmann and Koch, note 3 on § 661; Seuffert, note 2; v. Wilowski-Levy on § 661, that the inference is rested on the expression, that a judg-

ANY ENQUIRY INTO THE MERITS IRRECONCILABLE WITH THE RECOGNITION AND EXECUTION OF THE JUDGMENT. SYSTEM OF REVISION ON THE MERITS.

§ 467. We must regard it as incompatible with the recognition of res judicata, and with the execution of foreign judgments, that there should be any enquiry into what has already been decided in the judgment of the court in which the suit originally depended, whether it was so expressly decided, or merely by implication, some part of the pursuer's demand being refused by ignoring a point which must necessarily have been presented for consideration. A judge, who revises a judgment and adopts modifications of it according to circumstances, or who finds that on the merits it is ill founded, in reality is pronouncing a new judgment. The practical effect of such a revision on the merits will be that the judgment of the foreign court will be more often recognised than it will be under the principle, by which the parties have to discuss the whole matter anew. There is, too, this further difference between a revision and a completely new discussion of the subject, that, in the former case, as Moreau (§ 110) points out, the parties must confine their application to the limits of the conclusion of their original action,¹⁶¹ although it is within the power of the court to arrive at a different result in disposing of these conclusions. It must always, too, be the case, if the system of merely revising and then executing a foreign judgment is to be brought into play, that the court from which the judgment proceeded should be recognised as having jurisdiction according to international law. A judgment pronounced by a court having no jurisdiction would simply leave it open to follow out entirely anew the original claim: that does not necessarily imply that the new process should be before the courts of the country in which there happen to be assets open to diligence.

The system of revision, which may be described as that most commonly in use, is liable, besides, to be to some extent indefinite. At times parties may find it more for their interest to begin proceedings de novo rather than to proceed under these indefinite restrictions.

But, even although the foreign judgment may not be recognised as the basis for actual execution in another State, it may be regarded as prima ment of exequatur is not to be pronounced, if, etc., etc. If, however, a statute were to say that a defender is not to have decree given against him, unless the pursuer proves his grounds of action, could it be inferred that this proof was not intended to fall under the ordinary rules of proof and of admissions in civil actions? The explanation of the whole of the somewhat absurd idea is that the legislator first proclaims the principle of the recognition of foreign judgments without examination as a great achievement, and then, with much anxiety, takes back part of his concession. There is no want of such instances in German law, especially where, as is often the case, you have some compromise between the factors on either side, some transaction of their differences. See e.g. the ideas expressed in § 11 of the preliminary part of the Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz, where the beginning of (2) is directly contradictory of (1).

¹⁶¹ This application of the principle of concession or admission is, however, sound.

facie proof of a legal fact,¹⁶² under this limitation, as I think, that the court in which it was pronounced had jurisdiction, or at least may prima facie be assumed to have had it. Thus, for instance, an arrestment in security may proceed on a foreign judgment, and a security may be allowed to be provisionally recorded, although it has been constituted by such a foreign decree. That is held to be the law in France, in spite of the incompetency of putting foreign judgments into execution there. Of course, a foreign judgment, which might be put into force under the law of the court which pronounced it, must be in that position, i.e. must be capable of execution, before an exequatur can be given.¹⁶³

AWARDS BY ARBITERS IN A FOREIGN COUNTRY.

§ 468. Awards by arbiters pronounced upon contracts of submission under the Roman law are simply contracts.¹⁶⁴ Parties who agree to such an arbitration, make a bargain that they will recognise the sentence of the appointed arbiter or arbiters. There is this further condition in the contract, that the award shall be pronounced by the individual named, or by the majority of the individuals named. We have nothing to do in this contract with direct execution: that is a matter for which application must be made to the competent court, while, on the other hand, the deliverance of the arbiters will always afford an exceptio pacti. But, supposing that some code of procedure gives direct execution to such a sentence under certain conditions, e.g. if all the necessary proof is furnished by documents publicly attested, we should still have to consider the question, whether a decree for execution could be pronounced upon a contract embodied in documents attested by the public authorities of some foreign country.

It would be altogether unscientific to put deliverances of this kind, which are based simply and solely on a contract between two parties on a level as regards international relations, with judgments by a judge.

We need not, therefore, discuss whether we should give or refuse recognition and execution to such deliverances under the conditions under which we should do the one or the other to judicial sentences.¹⁶⁵ It is, too, immaterial whether the deliverance has or has not obtained an executorial power in the foreign country: that will not make it a judicial decree, and the declarator in the foreign country that it may be put in force has no meaning within our territory.¹⁶⁶ But, if the law which is applicable to the ¹⁶⁴ See Fœlix, ii. § 424.

¹⁶⁵ German Imp. Ct. (i.), 5th Nov. 1881; Dec. v. No. 114; Struckmann and Koch on § 868, note 1.

deliverance pronounces that it cannot itself be put into execution, but must be followed out by an action at law, as was the case in Roman law, then all that can be done with the award in another State is to sue upon it: execution cannot follow on it directly. The opposite view would give the award a meaning which it does not possess according to the law which governs it.¹⁶⁷ Accordingly, it is not quite accurate to say, as Francke says in general terms (p. 29), that foreign awards may be set on the same footing as awards in our own country.

But it is a different thing if the court in which an action is pending leaves certain questions, emerging in the course of the process, to be determined by arbiters,¹⁶⁸ or even perhaps refers the final decision to arbiters to whose award the parties must submit.¹⁶⁹ In such cases, the deliverance must rank in international matters as a judicial deliverance: for in international matters the only possible question is whether the authority of the deliverance rests upon the compulsitor of the State or on the free will of the parties. It is just as much a matter of indifference to foreign States as any other point in the internal constitution of the State can be, whether the State appoints permanent judges, or jurymen, or persons in the selection of whom the parties may have a voice, to pronounce decisions that are to be invested with its sovereign authority.

§ 469. Special difficulties may be raised by mongrel varieties of arbitration,¹⁷⁰ such as are created by the provisions of the German Civilprozessordnung (§§ 851-872). According to these enactments, on the one hand, judicial authority may step in to supplement the arbiter's powers, and, on the other hand, the arbiter is bound to observe certain rules of procedure, and if he shall transgress these rules, a special form of action is laid down for setting aside the decree-arbitral. In such cases, the circumstance that must decide is, whether as a matter of fact¹⁷¹ the foreign

¹⁶⁷ To this extent we agree with Wach, pp. 248, 249. There is no object in associating with the foreign laudem effects that are strange to it under the law in accordance with which it was pronounced. The nationality of the parties and of the umpire will, as a rule, be of no consequence: the parties will, as a rule, be desirous of submitting themselves to the law of the place in which the court of arbitration has its seat. But it may be otherwise, if, e.g. all the parties are of the same nationality. Wach speaks too generally on this point. [It is quite competent for a foreigner to act as an arbiter; he is truly a mandatary (Albertoli v. Gonthier, 15th March 1875; Ct. of Chambery, J. iii. p. 101).]

¹⁶⁸ This may happen in English actions of count and reckoning. See Schuster, p. 180.

¹⁷¹ The bare possibility of the interposition of the sovereign authority cannot be taken into account. Even in States where the common Roman law prevails, and where, therefore, the judicial authority has nothing to do with the nomination of the arbiters, and the arbiters are not tied down to any special rules of procedure, arbiters may of their own accord respect judicial authority has been interposed: if it has, then all that has followed must be regarded as a consequence of that authoritative interposition of the sovereign authority.¹⁷² The decree-arbitral in such a case can no longer rank as a private contract, but must in reason be dealt with as if it were the sentence of a judge. Whether special provisions in a statute or in a treaty have the same effect on the decree is another question, to which no general answer can be given. As, however, it is not the lex fori that determines in a case of a private contract whether or not it can be challenged, but the law to which the contract is otherwise subject; so a decree-arbitral which has to be carried into a foreign country for execution must be subject, in all questions as to the possibility of challenging its validity, to the law of the country of the arbitration.¹⁷³ If by that law some particular formalities and methods are prescribed for setting it aside, e.g. if a particular court must be approached for that purpose, then these formalities and methods must be observed: they are part of the contract stipulations. Accordingly, so soon as the person against whom diligence is to be done pleads that the decree has no binding effect, the court to which application for execution has been made must await the decision of the court specially appointed to decide such questions, and must necessarily appoint a time within which the action of reduction must be raised, if, indeed, the court of arbitration has not appointed a time for itself. Again, as Lammasch (p. 441) points out, execution cannot be refused on the ground that the law of the place of execution would not permit the legal question in dispute to be referred to the determination of arbiters: it is not the law of the court of arbitration, but the law that regulates the substance of the legal question in dispute, that must determine that question.

such rules, and will often consider themselves bound in conscience to follow them. See Fiore Eff. § 214. He does not, indeed, formulate the principle with sufficient sharpness, but remarks that the decree-arbitral can no longer be treated as a private contract if one of the arbiters has been named by a public authority. See Fœlix, ii. § 425; Fusinato, p. 128.

¹⁷² If, however, the interposition of a foreign court is confined to a declaration that the decree is to be put into execution, the effect of that upon the treatment which is to be accorded to the decree-arbitral in another country is simply that that declaration will be taken as a satisfactory proof that execution can competently be asked on the strength of the decree-arbitral. Asser (p. 47) does not quite agree with us.

Wach himself says (p. 249), "It is impossible to apply our law to the foreign laudum." And yet he proposes that § 867 shall apply.

In the same way as Wach, Ct. of Montpellier, 21st Sept. 1883 (J. xi. p. 70).

§ 470. If we adopt the principle that the execution of foreign judgments should not be made dependent on any capricious conditions, such as reciprocity, then it is obvious that all foreign decrees-arbitral must be put in force, to which the authority of the State has been interposed, in so far as the authority of the State was competently interposed, and the contract for arbitration was valid in itself.

If, on the other hand, the execution of foreign judgments is, as a matter of principle and in the absence of treaties, refused, then logic demands that we should also refuse to execute foreign decrees-arbitral. If we distrust foreign judicial authority generally, we cannot put any confidence in it when it mixes itself up with arbitration procedure. Execution can only be given if, as a matter of fact, the foreign decree has come into existence without any interference from public authorities.

If we have to adjust a treaty, then we may without any risk allow the decree pronounced within the State which takes part in that treaty to be executed. Voluntary submission by the parties must, in all matters which they are free to deal with as they please, give at least as good a guarantee as is to be found in a judicial sentence pronounced by a court in the proper exercise of its jurisdiction. As a rule, treaties make no mention of decrees-arbitral. They are, however, mentioned in the Austro-Servian treaty, as Lammasch (p. 440) points out, and with the good practical result of anticipating and disposing of some doubtful questions.

The question presents most difficulty when judicial sentences are only executed on condition of reciprocity: but, even in this case, we must allow decrees-arbitral to be put in force. The ground on which we support the extension of the treaty provisions to the case of decrees-arbitral is decisive in this case also.¹⁷⁴

EXECUTION OF JUDGMENTS PRONOUNCED IN MATTERS OF VOLUNTARY JURISDICTION.

§ 471. In any case, we shall be very safe in allowing execution to proceed upon foreign instruments connected with matters of voluntary jurisdiction. However little reliance we may place on the judgment of a foreign judge, we cannot assume that instruments issued in matters of voluntary jurisdiction by the courts of any civilised country are false or grossly misrepresent facts, especially as parties can generally seek out for themselves the tribunals most suitable for the case that has to be dealt ¹⁷⁴ Wach refuses to admit the analogy between judicial sentences and decrees-arbitral, because such sentences and decrees pronounced within this country are disposed of on different principles. I cannot accept this conclusion. Because two persons do not play the same part in a house, it does not by any means follow that they may not fairly claim equal treatment from persons outside.

On this subject, Wach reaches results very different from mine, because he does not advert to the distinction between the purely private arbitration and that on which the foreign judicial authority has operated.

with. Such false statements as that persons, who in truth did not appear at all, are represented as taking part in the transaction, are happily rare. Accordingly, all that we require is that the rules of the foreign law must allow immediate execution upon the instrument; while, on the other hand, the instrument must satisfy the conditions required by the law of the country in which execution is to be done. We need not insist on this latter point, if the procedure of the court ordains that there shall be a contentious procedure and a formal judgment, in order to make such instruments capable of being put into execution; in that case the foreign instrument is invested with all the force of an instrument belonging to this country.

Modern treaties concluded by the Kingdom of Italy have provided specially for the execution of notarial instruments or of the atti autentici of foreign States in general.¹⁷⁵ On the other hand, there is no mention of such instruments in the Franco-Swiss treaty (Curti, p. 154). Whether the omission to mention such instruments in a treaty which ensures the execution of foreign judgments implies that these instruments are not to receive execution, or, on the contrary, that they are to be regarded as not requiring separate mention in the treaty, cannot be absolutely decided. It will be necessary in each case to have regard to the previous practice of the States in question. In doubt, one would be inclined to adopt the latter and more reasonable alternative.

REVIEW OF THE PRINCIPLES ADOPTED IN A NUMBER OF LEADING STATES.

§ 472. Although the plan of this work does not as a rule admit of statistical comparisons of the systems of law prevailing in different countries, it will be useful, in view of the great diversity which we find in connection with the execution of foreign judgments, to give a sketch of the works from which one may gather what the attitude of different States and codes of law on this matter is.

(1.) Argentine Republic. See Daireaux (J. xiii. p. 417) and Palomeque (J. xiv. pp. 539-558). The principles of the statute of 1878 are: execution is given, with certain exceptions, which are perhaps not very clearly defined, e.g. decrees in absence, and in the case of obligations which are invalid by Argentine law.

(10.) Great Britain. We have shown in detail in the course of the discussion what is required here. The result [so far as England and Ireland are concerned, and probably in Scotland also] is that execution is given without any enquiry into the merits (unless in exceptional cases a plea of fraud is urged against the judgment), and without reciprocity being required. This doctrine is established by decisions only, and accordingly is now and again made matter of dispute in some particulars. See Piggott, pp. 377-551, and supra, p. 902 note.

(b.) In Finland, according to the Prussian official publication just cited, there is no exequatur.

(c.) For the rest of the Empire, the effect of the Code of Procedure of 1864 is doubtful. V. Martens (J. v. p. 139) asserts that there is exequatur, and adheres to this position (Völkerr. ii. p. 351) in spite of Engelmann's allegations to the contrary (ut cit. sup. and translated, in part at least, in J. xi. p. 113), and a more recent judgment of the Russian senate. But the negative view is probably the correct view (see Wach's exposition, p. 245). The same code of procedure has been recognised since 1876 in Russian Poland. (See, too, Flamm, J. xi. p. 494, and the judgment of the Court of Warsaw of 11th June 1884 there referred to; according to it, exequatur is refused unless there be a treaty.)

We may also refer to an interesting paper by Salem in J. xv. pp. 603-619, entitled "De l'exécution des jugements en Turquie." Judgments which have been pronounced in the country to which the unsuccessful party belongs require no exequatur in Turkey. They may be executed at once, because the matter of execution is one that is in the hands of the consular court of the country to which the unsuccessful party belongs. A foreign judgment, which should give or refuse to give a party a right over landed estate in Turkey, would have absolutely no effect; and if it were necessary to execute a foreign judgment by selling real property, the aid of the Turkish officials would to a certain extent need to be invoked, but they would not investigate the merits of the judgment pronounced in the petitory action. If the unsuccessful party does not belong to the State whose courts have pronounced the judgment in question, then the officials of the State to which he does belong must declare the judgment to be capable of execution; whether his consular court has jurisdiction to do so, is a question for the law of the country to which it belongs. Judgments against Turkish subjects will not receive an exequatur, and judgments in their favour will only do so if the other party belongs to the country, the courts of which have pronounced the judgment in question.

THE PLEA OF Lis alibi pendens WHERE THE OTHER ACTION IS IN A FOREIGN COUNTRY.

§ 473. The common law allows a defender to plead lis alibi pendens against a new demand in a different court upon the same grounds. It is debated whether and under what conditions that plea is available in the case of a process in a foreign court.¹ The answer, as Wach (p. 246) has recently put it, must depend upon the recognition which may be accorded to the foreign process; that, again, will be determined by the recognition that may be given to its judgment; or, to speak more exactly—since a recollection of the capricious provisions of the statute law of different States forces us to take a distinction between a recognition of the res judicata and the execution of the judgment—it will be determined according as execution is given or refused by our country.² In cases in which the pursuer cannot reach any substantial result after he has obtained judgment abroad, i.e. cannot put it in force, but will be required to bring a new action, or in cases in which he must be content with an arbitrary revision of the foreign judgment, he cannot in fairness be denied the right, in order to obtain speedy satisfaction, of raising his new action forthwith, since he cannot in any event escape a double trial of his claim. That the same matter should be under discussion simultaneously in two States, or possibly even in three, no doubt puts the defender in an unpleasant position; but this is the inevitable consequence of a wilful refusal to recognise or to execute foreign judgments.³ Here, as in many other instances, we see the injustice and inconvenience of this maxim to the subjects of the States which act so exclusively, or, as they call it, nationally. If we were to recognise the exceptio litis pendentis in cases where there was no execution of foreign judgments allowed, that would very easily result in a simple denial of justice to the pursuer. He would in all probability obtain no decree on which he could do execution until the debtor had had ample time to remove all his assets into another State, where the same game would have to be played all over again.

¹ Among older authors who are in favour of the recognition of the dependence of an action before a foreign court, see Martens, § 94; Klüber, § 59; Feuerbach, Themis, p. 318 (Draft of a State treaty, § 21); Felix, i. §§ 181, 182, pp. 366 et seq., and the extract which he gives from a judgment of the French Ct. of Cassation.

But it is a condition of the execution of foreign judgments that the foreign court should have jurisdiction, as that is understood in international law. Jurisdiction may be given by implied prorogation in cases in which the subject matter is one that is at the free disposal of the parties.⁴ The pursuer, therefore, may always, looking to that condition of affairs, be met by the exceptio litis pendentis, if he has raised action in a foreign court, and, the defender having failed to plead want of jurisdiction, the court has entered upon the materialia causæ. If, however, the defender takes a plea of no jurisdiction, and this is repelled by the foreign court, that would not be enough to give the defender the right to plead lis alibi pendens in our courts, since the foreign judgment or jurisdiction cannot in any way affect the jurisdiction of our courts. But the defender may acquire a title to plead lis alibi, if he recognises in a legal way the competency of the foreign court.

These propositions have been more and more recognised of late, even in the law of England and of the United States.⁵ It is, however, easily understood that, as the exceptio litis pendentis is in any case only admitted in England and the United States subject to the discretion of the judge, or the pursuer has this privilege only, that he may choose between the court to which he has first appealed and the other, these same principles are applied in the case of a lis which is dependent in a foreign court.

The grounds on which the recognition of the plea of lis alibi pendens has been opposed in the case of a foreign action, within the limits we have indicated, are entirely unsatisfactory. It is perfectly true to say that while foreign judgments can be recognised and executed here, a foreign process cannot; and that even foreign judgments require for their execution a special declarator of exequatur which can only be obtained in our courts, and cannot be obtained at all until the process is decided and over. But the plea of lis alibi pendens is certainly not to be placed on the same footing as the execution of foreign judgments. We have nothing to do here with the direct compulsitors of the law: the object is, on grounds of fairness, to protect the defender against a multiplication of actions. Accordingly, the non-recognition of the lis alibi pendens has no sort of connection with the maintenance of the sovereign rights of the State: this is in the present connection merely a vague phrase. The maintenance of an exclusive jurisdiction in our own courts is the only thing that will justify a refusal to give effect to the plea of lis alibi pendens: in so far as the foreign court has a concurrent jurisdiction, the choice of the pursuer, and the precedence in time of the one or the other action, must decide the question just as in a question between two courts, both belonging to this country. This last consideration has an important bearing on a case in which a defender who is domiciled in this country could make the action an action in the courts of this country by raising it here as pursuer. Again, it is a mistake to reject the exceptio litis pendentis, because it is a plea which rests upon a delimitation of jurisdiction to be made by the court itself, while no such delimitation can affect the courts of a foreign country.⁶

It is peculiar that on these and similar grounds some French lawyers⁷ still obstinately refuse to recognise the plea, and that even in Italy there is still some hesitation on the point.⁸

Lastly, it would be the height of absurdity to make the recognition of lis alibi pendens dependent on reciprocity, i.e. dependent on the law of the State, in which the other process is going on, recognising the plea as we do. The first effect of this demand for reciprocity would be to damage our own subjects who were defenders in this country. Again, if we may assume that every rational code of procedure will protect in one way or another the defender against double pursuit on the same grounds, this protection, as the law of England shows, need not absolutely take the form of a recognition of the exceptio litis pendentis, and a consequent dismissal of the second action. The precise course to be taken is a matter that the law of each court must determine according to its own rules of procedure.⁹

⁶ Gianzana, ii. § 276, takes this ground. But his theory lands him in a host of difficulties.

We can, however, pay no heed to the plea that the question is awaiting decision in one of the courts of our country, if that plea is urged as a reason for refusing exequatur to a foreign judgment, if the foreign court has jurisdiction in a sense known to international law.¹⁰ The decision of a court that has such jurisdiction has effect all over the world, and therefore furnishes a basis for execution in every other country, except those which have declared themselves on principle against the recognition of any foreign judgments, and gives the party a right to resist the repetition or the continuation of the action in any other court.

NOTE ZZ ON § 473. LIS ALIBI PENDENS.

[The plea of lis alibi pendens is a plea recognised in England as a ground which may give a defender a good cause of complaint. But, the question being one of the balance of convenience, it by no means follows that the mere fact of the dependency of an action in the English court and in the foreign court about the same matter, will induce the English court to interfere so as to force the plaintiff to abandon one or the other. It must be shown that there is vexation actually caused to the defender, and that without necessity for it. The court will be "very cautious" before it interferes in such cases, for it cannot fully appreciate the object which the pursuer may have in view, and the advantages he may hope to gain by his double pursuit. One obvious advantage is that he may be able, by arrestment on the dependence of the foreign action, to secure a fund for payment of his claim in the event of ultimate success. Where the English court is familiar with the procedure of the competing court, e.g. where that competing court is a Scots or Irish court, affording remedies of the same kind as are available in England, and where execution on the English judgment can easily be done, then the double proceedings will be more readily interfered with. M'Henry v. Lewis, 1882, L. R. 22, Ch. Div. 397; Peruvian Guano Co. v. Bockwoldt, 1883, L. R. 23, Ch. Div. 225, and other cases cited by Westlake, § 338, pp. 357 et seq.

The course to be taken is the same whether the English or the foreign proceedings are prior in date. Peruvian Guano Co. ut sup. Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 1840, 4 M. and Cr. 596.

The Scottish rule is stated by Lord Neaves in the case of Cochrane v.

⁹ See German Sup. Ct. of Comm. 30th March 1876 (Dec. xix. pp. 417, 418, and Seuffert, xxxii. § 180).

¹⁰ See Fusinato, p. 104, and the judgments of Italian courts cited by him.

Paul, 1857, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xx. p. 178, thus: "There seems no incompetency in a creditor bringing several suits against his debtor in several countries for the same debt, if there is jurisdiction in all, though there is always an equitable power and duty of control in each tribunal to see that there is not on the whole an improper and oppressive accumulation of litigation or diligence." In the case of Young v. Barclay, 1846, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. viii. p. 774, where the pursuers of an action raised in the Scots courts for declarator that a person had had at his death a Canadian domicile, and that the pursuers were entitled to his succession, proceeded, upon this action being defended, to take steps in Canada for uplifting the estate there, the Scottish courts interdicted them from following out these proceedings in Canada during the dependence of the suit in Scotland: this interdict the court had power to enforce, all of the pursuers being domiciled in Scotland. Where an action has been commenced in a competent court, which can dispose of all the questions raised, and another action is subsequently raised in Scotland, the Scots courts will not sist procedure, but will dismiss the second action. (Ferguson v. Buchanan, 1890, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xviii. p. 119.) It does not, however, by any means follow that an action, even under these circumstances, would be dismissed if it were the best or the only available means of securing funds within the jurisdiction of the Scots Court, which might eventually be required to satisfy the pursuer's demands.

It may be interesting to notice shortly the plea of forum non conveniens, a plea well known in the practice of the Scots courts. The import of this plea is that, although jurisdiction exists in Scotland, the court should not exercise it if they are satisfied that some other court can more conveniently settle the points at issue, although no action may as yet have been taken in any other court. This plea has most frequently been sustained in cases belonging to two classes, says Inglis, J. C., in Clements v. Macaulay, 1866; Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. iv. 592, 593)—viz. cases in which executors have been called to account, and in cases arising out of the terms of copartneries. The court has regard to the interest of the parties generally. In such cases there is ex hypothesi a concurrent jurisdiction in the two courts. If no good object can be served by keeping the Scots action in court, if, e.g. it is an action for accounting against trustees who are willing to account, and who can be called to account in the forum in which they assumed administration, then the result of sustaining the plea of forum non conveniens will be to dismiss the Scots action.

If, however, the Scots court should see a prospect that it may aid the action and supplement the powers of the foreign court, so that full justice may be done, it will, in place of dismissing the Scots action, sist procedure, and refrain from interposing, until some stage in the foreign process is reached at which it can resume consideration of the case cum effectu (see Lord Watson in Orr Ewing's Trs. 24th July 1885, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xiii. H. of L. p. 1). It would seem that the plea is equally applicable to "all cases of double jurisdiction in which the ends of justice seem to require its exercise" (per L. J. C. Moncreiff in Williamson v. N. E. Ry. Co. 1884, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xi. p. 596). In that case, the Scots court refused to entertain an action for damages against an English Railway Company, although their jurisdiction to do so was not doubtful, because the event from which the claim sprung occurred in England, the witnesses were in England, and a plea involving considerations of the English law as to right of way was raised. "Although jurisdiction exists," if "it appears that it is not convenient nor fitting for the interests of the parties" to try the question in Scotland, then the Scots court will not exercise its jurisdiction.

It may be very difficult to reconcile this rule with the maxim "judex tenetur impertiri judicium suum," i.e. that a judge who has jurisdiction is bound to give justice to those who come to ask it. The solution of the difficulty is to be found in an application of the principle which the English courts take as their guide in considering the plea of lis alibi pendens: there must be a risk of injustice being done, or of hardship or inconvenience falling upon the defender out of proportion to the advantage which the pursuer promises to himself by having the action tried in Scotland rather than in another country. The reasons in the case of Williamson (sup. cit.) seem slight enough for declining jurisdiction. The doctrine has been stated to the foregoing effect in the recent case of Sim v. Robinow, March 17, 1892, 29 S.L.R. 585.]

APPENDIX.

INTERNATIONAL COURTS OF ARBITRATION WHEN EXECUTION IS REFUSED.

§ 474. It is possible that, though all the conditions necessary for an exequatur are present, the courts of a State may erroneously refuse to give it. We have had occasion to notice this particularly in cases in which the foundation for allowing exequatur was a treaty, a fact which confirms what we have said as to the worthlessness of the doctrine if it has to rest upon treaties and the express provisions of statutes.¹ What is to be done in such cases? It has been proposed to set up a court of arbitration composed of eminent jurists belonging to the countries concerned.² But the bare conception of such a court is met at once by difficulties that are almost insurmountable. It would be difficult to bring about an agreement as to an oversman skilled in the law of both countries, who should make an uneven number, and so determine the opinion of the majority. The only remedy we have to suggest is to be found in the better understanding of the subject, which will by degrees grow up, so far at least as we do not make the mistake of constantly calling in artificial and inappropriate expedients, or of setting up treaties upon false bases. In questions that concern the domestic municipal law of a country erroneous judgments are often pronounced, and must now and again be borne by the parties. Could we hope that it could be otherwise in the sphere of private international law?³

LAW OF BANKRUPTCY

I. INTRODUCTION.

THE DIFFERENT THEORIES. UNIVERSAL OPERATION OF SEQUESTRATION ?

§ 475. Procedure in bankruptcy is a fruitful source of difficulties in international intercourse. It is set on foot with a kind of judicial deliverance, pronounced either on the application of a creditor or of a person who is overloaded with debt. This deliverance has, however, peculiar effects. It does not decide any legal dispute. Its effect rather is to place the debtor under a kind of curatory: it bars his debtors from obtaining a valid discharge by paying their debts to him. It prevents the creditors of the common debtor from following out such means of execution as may have hitherto been open to them. It compels all creditors, putting out of the question any who may be fortified by some real preference, to put forward all their claims in one court, with a view to satisfying all alike, on pain of exclusion if they fail to do so. These are very complicated effects, which we shall not be able to regulate and control in a satisfactory manner in international relations, by any body of rules framed either on the footing that an award of sequestration is a judgment, or that it is an act of voluntary jurisdiction dealing with the status of the debtor.¹ On the other hand, the questions of international bankruptcy are the very questions which in our time press most urgently for solution. It is perfectly clear that we shall often find ourselves in a state of hopeless bewilderment, if an insolvent person has substantial parcels of property in different countries, while the courts of the one country are quite regardless of what the courts of the other may have ordered in the various sequestration proceedings: while, on the other hand, the necessities of commercial credit seem likely to be best served if the whole substance belonging to one and the same person is subjected to one uniform treatment.

§ 476. More modern German legal philosophy, after Savigny,² has hardly given sufficient attention to the subject of the international treatment of bankruptcy. The only thorough discussions of the subject to be found in Germany are in the careful judgments of the old Supreme Court of Commerce for the Empire, and now in those of the Supreme Court of the Empire.³ English law on many of the leading points has reached fairly satisfactory results, less perhaps by a discussion of general principles, than by the exercise of practical good sense. The French theory, however, has shown the most praiseworthy endeavours to find from various points of view a real solution of the difficulties of the subject, although, as Daguin in particular has pointed out (p. 169), it has in the end fallen into the greatest confusion. Lastly, the most recent Italian doctrine, which has found adherents in France, rises above all these difficulties. Identifying what it thinks desirable with what actually is, it simply sets up as an axiom the universal validity of the sequestration which has been instituted at the domicile of the debtor, a result which Savigny (§ 374, Guthrie, p. 261) had already attempted to show must necessarily flow from the aid which the courts of one country give to those of another in international questions.⁴ Of course, there are many others who in despair rush for the only harbour of refuge they know, viz. the conclusion of treaties: they are driven to this by the belief, which we think very doubtful, that what lawyers cannot make clear, may be revealed to the penetration of diplomatists.

The first and most obvious consequence of sequestration being awarded, or bankruptcy being ascertained, is that the common debtor loses his power of dealing with his estate. He is for the future represented by the trustee

* ² In older German law the question of the vis attractiva of the sequestration, as regarded property of the bankrupt in a foreign country, was often discussed. But the older writers reached no certain or abiding results. Pufendorff, Observat. juris univ. i. obs. 217, pronounces in favour of the universal effect of a sequestration even as regards property in another country. He makes this exception, however, that secured creditors may remain in the forum rei sitæ, if the law of the court of the sequestration would be unfavourable to them. Strube, Rechtliche Bedenken, seems to assert that, as a general rule, there was a separate sequestration in foro rei sitæ. Dabelow, Ausführliche Entwicklung der Lehre vom Concourse (1801), p. 746, endeavours to combat the views of those who hold that there must be separate processes at the places where assets are to be found. He thus defends the doctrine of the universality of bankruptcy, but has to confess in the end, that it is impossible to carry out this theory in practice, even as among the different German States.

Again, the most recent and somewhat more detailed discussion by Endemann (Das Deutsche Conkurs Verfahren, p. 640) does not wander far from the literal interpretation of the German Ordinance.

(curator, syndic, or güterverwalter). French law draws from this fact the conclusion, that the proceeding is one which shows something as to the status of the bankrupt, and is therefore dependent on a statut personnel, and as such claims universal recognition, and that too without there being any necessity for a special declaration of exequatur being pronounced upon a foreign award of bankruptcy,⁵ since in judgments which simply modify the status of a person this latter requirement is waived. It seems that an exequatur by the French Government is not necessary unless the foreign award of sequestration is intended to have some further direct compulsitor, e.g. to bar any special actions by other creditors in the courts of France.

But it is incorrect to treat the effects of an award of sequestration on the same footing as an alteration of status, e.g. as an interdiction on the ground of prodigality. The bankrupt does not become incapable of acting for any effect, as a pupil is:⁶ he simply loses his power of dealing with the estate attached by the sequestration. Our first enquiry then must be whether the foreign property at once falls into the sequestration; this argument, then, when we look closely at it, moves in a circle. The fact, however, which makes this view entirely untenable is that, in the theory which is now universally adopted in France—in our opinion a correct theory—the personal law, which is decisive in questions of capacity to act, is the law of a man's nationality; whereas there can be no doubt, on the other hand, according to the Franco-Italian theory, that it is the court of the domicile that has jurisdiction to award sequestration, and that it is the law of the domicile that must regulate that sequestration. This contradiction cannot possibly be explained away on any theory of statut personnel. Besides, what are we to understand precisely by a decree of exequatur upon an award of sequestration? what are to be its conditions, what shape is it to take, and what are to be its effects? Are its effects confined to the parties immediately concerned in it, e.g. to persons who are asked by the trustee to make payment of some outstanding debt due to the bankrupt, or does it affect third parties also? It would be more in accordance with the universality of the original award that it should affect third parties, the public in general; any restriction upon its operation would in truth be a mutilation of it. But to give it the larger operation would require substantially a public proclamation, and nothing of that kind is suggested by the French authorities. Again, on what points is it to be lawful to raise a debate when application for execution is made? On jurisdiction only, or may other conditions of the foreign decree be questioned? To none of these questions does the French law give us a satisfactory answer: its procedure does not seem to be guided by any definite plan.

In close connection with the theory of the personal statute is, on the one hand, the theory which attributes a certain universal operation to the sequestration in respect that the trustee, or trustees, holds the position of a mandatary,⁷ and on the other the theory which traces the same result, i.e. the universality of the sequestration, to the notion that, in the award of sequestration, the creation of a juridical person, into whose hands the estate passes, is to be descried.⁸ But the powers of the trustee are not merely those of a mandatary: the effects of the sequestration go much deeper, both as regards the creditors and the debtors of the bankrupt. To do justice to the theory of mandate, it would frequently be necessary, if we were to go strictly to work, to make a distinction in practice between a voluntary declaration of insolvency and a compulsory sequestration. Again, the theory of a new juridical personality is not in harmony with actually existing law, and besides that does not advance us at all, for this reason, that the rights of juristic persons that come into existence in a foreign country are by no means treated on the same footing in all respects as those of juristic persons belonging to this country. The question would necessarily arise, whether a juristic person would not have to be created in this country for the estate which is situated here, to correspond with the foreign person in charge of the foreign property.

Just as little satisfaction is to be got from another theory, which seeks to set up an indefinite kind of universality for an award of sequestration by declaring that all that is affected by this award is to establish a fact, viz. the fact of insolvency, and points to this as the effect of sequestration in France.⁹ This theory proceeds just as if all positive systems of law were content with establishing this simple fact of insolvency, and then left it to the creditors, after they had been advised of this fact by the decree of the court, to secure themselves as best they might; just as if the truth were not that every actual system of law associates very definite and very far-reaching effects with an award of sequestration, these effects undoubtedly in some degree bearing the character of the most direct compulsitors.

Further, the argument based by Fiore (Fall. p. 48) on an appeal to the idea of res judicata, is deceptive. He thinks that the award of sequestration is to be respected all the world over as a res judicata, and, on general principles, will only require a decree of exequatur in another country in so far as it is intended to be followed by direct compulsitors there. That decree of exequatur will apparently—but this is not quite clear—be pronounced without any special enquiry, except, perhaps, an enquiry into the jurisdiction of the court that originally made the award.

A decree awarding sequestration is, however, a very different thing from a true decree pronounced in foro contentioso. It confers no definite right on any one. It involves a general measure of security for all concerned, and in general sets up rules for a quasi-curatorial administration. This is enough to warrant the rejection of the analogy between it and an ordinary decree. But there is another reason. A res judicata cannot claim general recognition, unless it applies to some legal relation, which was either from the first subject to the legal authority of the State whose court pronounced the original judgment, or became so subject by the voluntary submission of parties to the jurisdiction of that court. Can we say that of an award of sequestration? In our view this question must be answered in the negative, unless we are to make use of the wildest fictions. The judge in bankruptcy draws into his own court the obligations of the bankrupt, contracted in the most distant countries, and ruled, it may be, on that account by the most diverse systems of law. That will be the case, in the view of Fiore and of all those who uphold the universal operation of the sequestration, even if all the conditions for jurisdiction, and even for execution, are to be found in some other country. But that is a step far in excess of the conditions of res judicata in other matters; and while, in other matters, the pursuer has the choice among any concurrent jurisdictions that may exist, in this case he is not allowed his choice, but the jurisdiction of the court of the bankruptcy of the domicile is made an exclusive jurisdiction in so far as the bankrupt estate is concerned.

The whole of this argument, upon the idea of res judicata,¹⁰ is like a transparent sheet of glass behind which we get sight of the real argument, that the universality of the sequestration is postulated simply because it is desirable.

This is in fact the simple argument advanced by Carle and by Dubois, his French translator and commentator¹¹ (p. 54).

§ 477. Now, of course, it is true that a body of creditors cannot all be dealt with alike, except by subjecting the whole body to the same law in so far as the division of the sum of the estate is concerned, and by refusing to allow the accidental circumstance of this or that asset of the estate being beyond the territorial limits of the State in which the court of the bankruptcy is situated, to make any difference. There is every reason for attributing to the law which has to consider the award of sequestration a tendency to give it as wide an operation as possible.

¹¹ The law of England has struck out a kind of via media. It respects theoretically the universal operation of a foreign bankruptcy in so far as moveables are concerned, by treating the sequestration as an universal assignment of the estate to the creditors, i.e. a kind of succession; it applies to the case the rule "mobilia personam sequuntur." But this theory is but ill carried out. Moveable succession is subject only to one law, that of the domicile, but under certain circumstances bankruptcy is awarded in England against persons who have no domicile there, and without caring whether a similar award has or has not been made simultaneously in another country. On the law of England, see Westlake-Holtzendorff, §§ 118 et seq. The law of the United States does not allow a foreign bankruptcy any effect even upon moveables beyond its own territory. Story, § 403; Wharton, § 390.

But is it then so simple a matter that other States should recognise this claim of "universale judicium," as Carle calls it, without requiring any guarantees? Is it so obvious that creditors who belong to this country, and have contracted here with the bankrupt, and who were entitled to expect fulfilment of that contract here, should be robbed by a decree pronounced in some distant country—upon what grounds no one can say, for there are many places in which the awarding of sequestrations is a profitable branch of the legal trade—of the jurisdiction which has been established in the courts of this country, and of the assets in this country available for execution, and be forced to go to a distance in an uncertain search for their rights? Besides, we have to remember that an award of bankruptcy affects the legal position of the debtors, and of persons who then for the first time make contracts with the bankrupt, in a most marked way. All systems of law pay attention to this fact, and make provision for it by prescribing public advertisements, and setting up certain presumptions as to the knowledge or the ignorance of parties of the existence of the bankruptcy. Is it possible to extend the operation of these rules to other countries, which the advertisements of the court of the sequestration perhaps do not reach, which at least we have no guarantee that they will reach, and where no single member of the public knows or is bound to know the law which will rule matters in the distant foreign court in which the bankruptcy is pending? Indeed, it may be that bankruptcy has a certain retrospective effect. Is this to be so, to the prejudice of creditors who have contracted with the bankrupt in a foreign land? Another result of the universality of the bankruptcy would be, that it would cover the distant trading or manufacturing establishments of the bankrupt. If it is not desired to make so serious an extension of its operation, on what ground can it be excluded? Lastly, creditors living at a distance may actually be seriously prejudiced. It is quite possible to set them on a level with native creditors in so far as the letter of the law is concerned, and at the same time de facto to shut them out, by paying no attention to the difficulties of intimation to them. It is also possible to deprive them of almost every opportunity of taking part in the administration of the bankrupt estate.¹²

To maintain the universal validity of the bankruptcy in the face of these considerations, it has been argued that, if you contract with a person who lives in another country, you must make up your mind that it is quite possible that it may turn out that this debtor will become bankrupt in that foreign country.¹³ But this is precisely a thing that cannot always be foreseen: your debtor may change his domicile, while the creditor may not always be in a position to raise his action before he has done so.

If it should be possible successfully to conclude practical international treaties, the future may belong to the recognition of the universality of bankruptcy.¹⁴ We cannot, however, by any means treat that universal operation of bankruptcy as a doctrine of law that is positively recognised;¹⁵ it is all the less possible to do so that on careful investigation we shall perhaps discover that the advantages that belong to a recognition of this universal operation of bankruptcy may approximately, or to a certain extent, be attained through the remedies that are already at the service of existing systems of law.

Let us then, with this object in view, attempt to settle the character of the sequestration process in its main features.

II. SYSTEMATIC EXPOSITION ACCORDING TO THE PRINCIPLES OF POSITIVE LAW.

A. THE PRINCIPLE: BANKRUPTCY A GENERAL EXECUTION OF DILIGENCE:¹⁶ AWARD OF SEQUESTRATION A GENERAL ARRESTMENT.

§ 478. Procedure in bankruptcy is simply a general execution of diligence against the whole estate of the bankrupt for the purpose of due ranking and payment of all creditors: this process is carried on where the law places the centre of the bankrupt estate—i.e. at the domicile of the bankrupt.

To this end, the whole estate is laid under a general arrestment in favour of the whole body of creditors, and by this means the bankrupt loses all power of alienation, although he retains his general legal capacity of acting¹⁷—so that, for instance, he is able to take up or to renounce a succession falling to him, which no one who had lost his capacity of ¹³ So Despagnet, § 626.

¹⁴ So Lyon-Caen et Renault, Dr. c. ii. § 3138.

¹⁵ See to this effect Bard, § 254, and Rivier (Asser-Rivier, § 123, note), who declares against Asser on this point. Asser maintains the universal validity of bankruptcy.

¹⁶ See German Sup. Ct. of Comm. 13th June 1871 (Seuffert, xxvi. No. 1); App. Ct. of Celle, 29th Feb. 1872 (Seuffert, xxvii. No. 1); Sup. Ct. at Stuttgart, 29th Nov. 1879 (Seuffert, xxxv. No. 90).

acting could do, although, of course, he cannot lay the bankrupt estate, which consists of his whole present property, under any obligations. The estate is sequestrated by a representative of the creditors (curator bonorum, syndic, trustee), who also represents the bankrupt, and, where it is necessary, is managed by him and realised with the assistance of the court, while all the creditors are called upon by public notice to give in their claims against the bankrupt.

But, since it is assumed that the estate is not sufficient to pay all its debts, any claim which may be made affects the interest of every creditor, and, therefore, any creditor who believes that his interest is endangered by the claim of another creditor, he is entitled to interpose in the suit of this creditor against the bankrupt, and to lay claim to the subject under sequestration, which may either be the whole estate or a part thereof, so as to operate his own payment either preferentially or pari passu. This right to interpose, in which the bankrupt has no interest, leads to special suits between individual creditors for preferable rankings.

B. CONCLUSIONS.

POWER OF THE BANKRUPT TO DEAL WITH FOREIGN PROPERTY. LEGAL POSITION OF THE TRUSTEE. COLLECTION OF FOREIGN PROPERTY BY THE TRUSTEE.

§ 479. The first result that flows from the nature of a general execution of diligence is that, without regard to the nationality of the debtor, it will take place where the centre of his dealings with his property lies, i.e. at his domicile. All actions whose conclusions can be expressed in money's worth—and with such actions only are we concerned in bankruptcy—may be brought there. This is a view which is not disputed by any one.¹⁸ Those, however, who refer the universal validity of bankruptcy to the fact of its being a statut personnel cannot make this assumption any more than those who reason from its being a statut réel.¹⁹

By article 6 of the Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869, the place where a trading establishment is situated settles the question.

Since it is the forum for actions upon debt that has to be taken into consideration here, it follows that, where a distinction is taken between authorised and non-authorised domicile as it is in France, a non-authorised domicile is not enough. So Ct. of Paris, 23rd Nov. 1874 (J. ii. p. 434). The Trib. Comm. at Brussels, 7th Dec. 1885 (J. xiv. p. 360), has decided, and rightly decided, as we think, in certain circumstances, that a mere résidence is sufficient to give jurisdiction.

¹⁹ Of course, "ordre public," "ordine pubblico," is used to compel conviction here. See de Rossi, Studi, p. 186.

From the nature of arrestment, it follows that the withdrawal of the power of disposal from the bankrupt does not extend to property belonging to him which is situated abroad,²⁰ and, therefore, that he is in a position to grant perfectly valid conveyances of property so situated, so long as it is not withdrawn from him by a special decree of arrestment on the part of the foreign judge, and that whether the property is real or moveable property.

Goods, however, which are despatched after an award of bankruptcy by the bankrupt to a foreign country, do not really become the property of the receiver.²¹ That is not because the incapacity of the bankrupt follows him to that extent into the foreign country,²² but because articles which have been attached in this country by the general arrestment implied in bankruptcy, pledged, that is, to the creditors, cannot simply shake themselves free from that real burden, by passing the frontier. (See supra, pp. 497, 498.) If, again, the bankrupt is a juristic person (e.g. a limited company), any alterations which, according to the lex domicilii, are effected by the award of bankruptcy upon the way in which that juristic person is represented in law, must ipso facto be recognised abroad.²³ For alterations, which the lex domicilii introduces into the constitution of a juristic person, are effectual beyond the territory. The question is not, as it is in the case of physical persons, what legal consequences are to be attributed to a factum which is independent of law altogether: we are here considering an organisation, which is necessarily attached to some particular local centre. Again, the bankrupt does not necessarily, as a result of an award of bankruptcy in another country, lose his capacity of suing. At the same time, the trustee named by the court of the bankruptcy may appear, if the foreign bankrupt can competently be sued in this country, as a party in that process, the trustee's interest being that nothing shall be withdrawn from the estate by means of diligence following on that process: and he may as representative of the bankrupt conduct that process to its conclusion. A remarkable judgment of the German Imperial Court proceeds on these views of the law (iii. 28th Mar. 1882. Dec. vi. No. 125, pp. 401 et seq., particularly pp. 407, 408).

It must, however, be conceded that it is an object which the law under which the general execution is awarded must necessarily have in view, that the operation of this execution shall be as broad as possible. The theory of the universality of bankruptcy, viewed as a tendency in this direction, has a direct practical value. Accordingly, the trustee in the sequestration must, by virtue of his appointment, and without the necessity of any special exequatur, as a consequence of the award of bankruptcy in a foreign country, be held to have a title to have arrestments laid on the property which he finds in the foreign country,²⁴ ²⁵ for the benefit of all the creditors who are concerned in the sequestration, and to collect generally all the debts due to the estate, except in so far as a separate process of bankruptcy has been instituted or an arrestment laid on from some other quarter.²⁶ It is because the administration by a foreign trustee is merely an exercise of the right of arrestment, belonging to the foreign bankruptcy, that actions against foreign trustees, by means of which it is sought to enforce some personal obligation undertaken by the bankrupt, must be thrown out.²⁷ It would be impossible to allow such actions to interfere with the preferential right which the creditors who take part in the foreign sequestration have acquired in virtue of the arrestment implied in it; and thus the pursuers of such actions would take nothing by them, as they desire to do, until the whole body of creditors who have taken part in the foreign sequestration have been satisfied.

Indeed, unless the execution of arrestments laid on by a foreign court is forbidden by some general rule, such as for instance we find that the German Civilprozessordnung erroneously enacts, the trustee may obtain a decree of exequatur upon the general arrestment, imposed by virtue of the foreign award of bankruptcy, wherever property belonging to the bankrupt happens to be.²⁸ This will not, of course, be carried out in the form of a general public notice. Such a method would imply a direct recognition of the extra-territorial operation of the bankruptcy, and would necessitate the framing of rules as to the form of such notices, which could only be done by positive legislation: any existing rules of the court regulating similar

²⁶ See Ct. of Brussels, 13th May 1879 (J. viii. p. 79); Ct. of Liège, 24th May 1879 (J. viii. p. 80).

²⁷ So, too, English practice. See Westlake-Holtzendorff, § 127.

²⁸ The practical difference [between recognising his title to apply for arrestment and granting such an exequatur] may not be great, and if the forms for obtaining an exequatur involve much delay, it may be found advisable to make an independent application for arrestment. The fact of bankruptcy is sufficient proof that there is risk of loss.

notices could in themselves only be applicable to bankruptcies within the territory. If, however, the bankruptcy was awarded on the motion of the insolvent himself, or without any opposition on his part, then it might well be held that the trustee, as agent for the bankrupt, was entitled to deal with any assets of property that were in the possession of the bankrupt, or to raise and prosecute an action against a debtor of the bankrupt.²⁹ Still more certain is it that the persona standi in judicio of the foreign trustee must be recognised, if he is asked to surrender some asset of property which he has reduced into possession, or if an arrestment which has been laid on by him is disputed. Although the foreign bankruptcy by no means renders the bankrupt incapable of raising or prosecuting, without the co-operation of the trustee, a suit in our courts, and although it does not interrupt any such process (as, by § 218 of the German Ordinance, an award of bankruptcy in Germany interrupts a German action), still we must allow the foreign trustee, in virtue of his appointment, to sist himself as a party to any such action,³⁰ since he represents the interests of the creditors who are concerned in the foreign bankruptcy, and the issue of any action, although conducted by the bankrupt in a foreign country, has an effect upon the dividend that will in the end be available for them.

OPPOSITION TO THE WITHDRAWAL OF PROPERTY IN THIS COUNTRY WITH A VIEW TO PLACE IT UNDER A FOREIGN BANKRUPTCY PROCESS.

§ 480. If we do not proceed upon the theory of the universality of bankruptcy, which is open to dispute as a matter of positive law, unless there be some express provision in its favour in any legal system that may be in question, it is a point of the highest interest to consider, whether and under what conditions creditors, and in particular creditors belonging to this country, are entitled to resist the withdrawal of property belonging to a foreign bankrupt from this country to be placed under a foreign administration in bankruptcy.

The answer to this question must simply be to this effect, that they are entitled to do so in so far as the law of this country secures them a jurisdiction in which to sue out their claims in this country, but no further.^{31 32} In that case they have in the nature of things a right to vindicate that jurisdiction by applying for arrestment of the funds in this country, and against that arrestment any application for arrestment subsequently made by the foreign trustee would be ineffectual.

³⁰ See German Sup. Ct. of Comm. 28th Feb. 1871 (Dec. ii. p. 68). I cannot join in the doubts raised by the Sachs (Rev. vi. p. 258) as to the soundness of this decision.

If, then, the forum obligationis is reduced to its proper limits (see supra, § 424), and if the computation and division of the dividends among personal creditors is not in a legal sense allowed to be at all disturbed by real rights being advanced in a forum distinct from that in which the bankruptcy depends, it is plain that the operation of a sequestration which has been awarded in foro domicilii cannot be effected by prosecution of any special execution or diligence, or arrestment of particular articles in a foreign country, save to a very limited extent. In many cases, and in the most important aspects, the result will be to give an universal operation to the sequestration, without the necessity of any special rule of law to that effect. This explains how in older practice the evils, which, as it seems, must spring from the want of a special rule of law establishing the universality of a bankruptcy, were not so much felt, and how, on the other hand, these evils have come prominently to the front in very recent times. For it is to these very recent times that we owe the enormous extension of the forum contractus over matters of international law, which we have already noticed, and also the discovery of these arbitrary kinds of jurisdiction, with as many arms as a polypus, such as we find in art. 14 of the Code Civil, and § 24 of the German Civilprozessordnung (see supra, § 419, note), [which gives jurisdiction to the German Courts

³¹ On the other hand, the view which was at one time maintained, and in the Hannoverian Proceßordnung of 1850, § 605, sanctioned by law, was that in all cases in which a sequestration had been set on foot in a foreign country, a separate process should be started in this country to deal with the property that was situated here (see Schmidt, Zeitschr. für Deutschen civilprocess. vol. vi. p. 1). If, for instance, there was only a single creditor in this country, it would be absurd to set on foot a separate process; again, if in ordinary circumstances a process of bankruptcy cannot be set on foot by the court without a motion being made to that effect, neither should a separate process be so started in the case we have put. The German Ordinance in bankruptcy, § 208, very properly will only allow a second formal process of bankruptcy in Germany in cases where there is some aggregate of property, e.g. a manufactory or trading house within the empire; but in other cases it contents itself with sanctioning (§ 207) execution of the decrees of the foreign court of bankruptcy. From this it follows, as a matter of course, that an action in the German Empire is competent, as that may be the initial step towards execution, provided always that there is some court within the empire with jurisdiction to entertain the action. The omission to mention the competency of raising action is explained by the force which is attributed to the vis attractiva of the bankruptcy. Even a German bankruptcy does not prevent actions being raised in a court other than that of the bankruptcy, although it does prevent execution being done on any of the property belonging to the bankrupt estate.

³² French courts have in many cases refused to allow a French creditor to oppose an exequatur of a foreign sequestration, if he has taken part in the foreign sequestration, particularly if he has received dividends in it. Ct. of Rennes, 19th February 1879 (J. vii. p. 476); Trib. Seine, 28th July 1881 (J. ix. p. 200); in this latter case an agreement concluded in the foreign country had, at least by implication, been ratified by the representative of the creditor.

in respect of the existence of any property of the defender within the territory, irrespective of its value.] These throw the greatest difficulties—how could it be otherwise?—in the way of a satisfactory settlement of the question. Claims of jurisdiction of such a character, dictated simply by national exclusiveness, set a judicial warfare on foot in the domain of the law of bankruptcy as well as elsewhere.

POSSIBILITY OF A PLURALITY OF BANKRUPTCIES. SEVERAL BUSINESS CENTRES, OR TRADING ESTABLISHMENTS. SHARES IN PUBLIC TRADING COMPANIES. PLURALITY OF DOMICILES.

§ 481. The consideration that those creditors only whose claims can competently be dealt with by the courts of this country have a right to say that the estate in this country shall not be made forthcoming in the foreign bankruptcy, leads naturally to the solution of the further question, viz. whether there should not be several bankruptcies, where a man has trading establishments in several countries, or has a share involving personal liabilities in several trading companies. The question must be answered in the affirmative.³³ The creditors, who have given credit to a particular trading establishment, in their view may fairly demand that this, with all its appurtenances, should be primarily available for their satisfaction. It would be unjust to send these persons, who might well expect that all their claims should be worked out in connection with this business in this country, away to a court that may be a long way off. If we reflect that in many cases one and the same person has interests in trading establishments, or firms, in different countries very far removed from each other, the only practical course will be seen to be, in such cases, that separate bankruptcies should be set on foot. Doubts, too, might easily arise in such cases, if there was any attempt to transfer the whole procedure to the forum domicilii, as to where in truth the domicile of the person was, and it might, as a matter of business, be quite immaterial where it was, as, for instance, if a man on account of health lives with his family in some place other than that in which he carries on his trade.

From what has been said, it follows that a process of bankruptcy against a public trading company must be set on foot at the place where the company has its seat, and not at the domicile of the individual partners.³⁴ We do not need in order to produce this result, so obviously called for by practical necessities, to make the assumption, which in itself is untenable, that a public copartnery is a juristic person.

Now, since the bankruptcy must be set on foot at the place where the creditors were entitled to expect that their claims upon the bankrupt estate would be satisfied, it follows also that the bankruptcy has nothing to do with the nationality of the bankrupt, that the place where it is to be set on foot must be the bankrupt's domicile,³⁵ and that it is the actual domicile, the domicile which is accepted as the foundation of the ordinary forum domicilii, that must be taken, and that we should not insist upon the domicile being an "authorised" domicile, if, as is the case in France, a distinction is taken between "authorised" and "unauthorised" domicile.³⁶ This is the universal opinion, and, as regards this latter distinction, it is at least the ruling opinion. Indeed, since the point of interest here is not so much the voluntary subjection of the party to any particular system of law, as the actual security of the creditors, we may hold a long-continued residence a sufficient foundation for jurisdiction: provided that this residence is of such a character as to wear to other persons the appearance of a centre of business life.³⁷ Wharton (§ 794) goes so far as to say that "there can be as many bankruptcies as there are countries in which a man does business." If, however, we attempt to treat the operation of bankruptcy in connection with the doctrine of general incapacity to act, the results we shall reach will be, as we have already noticed, quite different.

If it shall happen that any one has more than one domicile, it follows from what has been said that there may be a bankruptcy at each of them; priority will not, as Feigenwinter thinks (p. 59), decide where it is to be.³⁸

³⁵ For Belgium, see Humblet (J. vii. p. 87). A judgment of the Ct. of Neufchateau reported by Dubois, Rev. vi. p. 280, recognises the competency of the court of a foreign domicile to declare a Belgian subject bankrupt. Glasson, J. viii. p. 126; de Rossi, Esecuzione, p. 138; Carle Dubois, § 23; Fiore, Full. p. 15. In the common law of Germany, as in the laws of England and of the United States, no doubt on this point can possibly exist, as in these systems all questions of private law are regulated by domicile, and not by nationality. The grounds on which domicile is supported by modern French and Italian writers, viz. that the question here is one of "ordre public" or of police matters "loi de police," seem to be too vague. Domicile is undoubtedly regulative in the law of Austria. See Starr, Rechtshülfe, p. 73; Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 485; Supreme Ct. of Austria, 11th Jan. 1887 (J. xv. p. 285). As regards England, see Foote, p. 302.

³⁶ Ct. of Paris, 23rd Nov. 1874 (J. ii. p. 434).

³⁸ Feigenwinter, no doubt, argues in the first place from the expressions used in the Concordat which is recognised in a great number of Swiss cantons. But his reasons seem to go deeper.

If it were so, this mischievous result would follow, that the most importunate creditors would obtain this practical advantage, that the whole process of bankruptcy would be carried through in their neighbourhood, and it might very well happen that we should thus start a premature race for bankruptcy, to the great prejudice of all concerned. At the same time, too, we should have to make all the more careful enquiry as to the true seat of the domicile, since from the answer given to this question would flow quite other consequences, than if a plurality of bankruptcies were sanctioned for the different business centres of the same person situated in different countries.³⁹ It is plain that, if there were such an exclusive and universal court, there would be a larger crop of divergent decisions from the courts of the different countries concerned on the question of domicile. For these serious consequences would dispose each court to stand up for its own jurisdiction. Instead of the unity and universality hoped for, we should have all the more insoluble conflicts.

On the other hand, however, just because our subject is to set up a forum where business is really carried on, we cannot allow any fiction to come in place of a true domicile or business centre.⁴⁰ International law, therefore, will not allow a bankruptcy process, in the case of a limited company, to be set on foot at the place where that company is as a matter of form constituted; it will take the place where the real centre of its business lay. The nominal seat of the company has no importance as a matter of international law.⁴¹ Thus, again, the "élection de domicile" for any particular business, as it is termed, cannot give the jurisdiction which is required in this case.⁴²

RELATIONS OF THE COURTS inter se WHERE THERE IS A PLURALITY OF BANKRUPTCIES. POSITION OF THE CREDITORS. SPECIAL AGREEMENTS.

§ 482. If we were in a position to dispute the jurisdiction of any foreign court, which had the conduct of a bankruptcy, we should, of course, not comply with any requisition which it might make,⁴³ and in the same

⁴⁰ The view that a business centre of any kind is enough to warrant a special bankruptcy procedure in the German Empire lies at the bottom of the German Ordinance in bankruptcy.

⁴¹ Feigenwinter, p. 36.

⁴² It may, on the other hand, be right in conformity with the English statute of 1883, to lay down that the jurisdiction of the court in which a person has once had a domicile shall not cease at once upon that domicile being changed. The creditors must have time to advance their claims in that forum, if any property of their debtor remains in the State. The English statute provides that the jurisdiction to which we have already referred shall last for a year after the English domicile is given up.

⁴³ See §§ 6, 16, 17, of the Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869.

way the trustee named by an incompetent court will not be recognised in any other State as having a title to take legal proceedings.⁴⁴ Here, then, the question, whether the bankruptcy has been set on foot at the domicile of the person, or in the place where his trading establishment has its seat, is not without importance. The trustee appointed at the place where a trading establishment has its seat, to take charge of the bankruptcy there, can only recover in another State assets that are undoubtedly connected with that establishment: the rest of the assets must be left for the bankruptcy which has been set on foot likewise at the bankrupt's domicile.

But it by no means follows that there must be several bankruptcies in relation to the same person, because there may be. The attitude of the creditors who are interested will really settle whether there are to be. If the creditors who have a right of action, i.e. who have a forum for their claims, in some other country than that of the domicile, do not apply for a special bankruptcy, then the trustee appointed in the domicile can ingather any assets which he finds in that other country to enlarge the general estate. And even if a special procedure had been set on foot, there is nothing to prevent the creditors, who are concerned in it, from making, by means of a voluntary agreement, the estate forthcoming, as part of the general mass. It may be that it will be for the interest of such creditors to renounce their rights to a special process and special execution, if they hope by taking part in the general process which is pending in foro domicilii, to get more than they would get in a separate process. For of course it is impossible, and would offend all equitable principles, that a creditor should take part in several processes of bankruptcy against the same debtor simultaneously, to the same effect as if each of his appearances in these respective processes were his only appearance. The English practice follows a safe and sound course in refusing to allow any one to take part in an English bankruptcy, unless he throws into the estate in England anything which he may have got in a foreign process. We might indeed go a step further.⁴⁵ The creditor should not only throw in whatever dividend he has got, but should make up any sum which he has lost to the estate, e.g. lost to it by the comparatively severe expenses which he has caused by setting a separate bankruptcy on foot for himself alone.

Lastly, no creditors should be allowed to appear in any such special bankruptcy except those who can show that there is a jurisdiction in the courts of the country in which it depends to deal with their claims. Of course, nothing will justify us in putting foreign creditors at a disadvantage, and to do so would properly be described as a measure that would injure the credit of the country that did it.⁴⁶ But a special process of bankruptcy is simply a kind of arrestment with a process of distribution attached to it. In place of applying for a special bankruptcy, creditors who have claims that establish a forum in that country may join in obtaining arrestments, and thus secure for themselves a prior opportunity of execution. But if a creditor cannot show that he has any special forum in this country, then, as in other cases, he must have recourse to the general forum of the domicile.⁴⁷

The priority thus given to claims which have their origin in this country, in any special process which may be set on foot here, is not in reality unfair. We say, no doubt, that the idea of bankruptcy requires that the whole property of the bankrupt should be impledged to the whole body of creditors in common. But if a man has a kind of business centre in country A, is it not quite reasonable that creditors, who gave credit with reference to that business, should rely upon the security of the property that actually is in the country? Or must they first make sure that their debtor, whose property here seemed to afford them abundant security, has not, it may be in some very distant country, a multitude of other creditors, whose participation in his bankruptcy here will swallow up that security? Many creditors, on whom the law of this country, on grounds of humanity, confers a right of preference, without any real right over particular assets,⁴⁸ would be most cruelly disappointed, if, in following out some abstract theory of the universality of bankruptcy, we should unconditionally transfer the whole assets to the foreign court, by whose law no such right of preference is given. Thus we reach this proposition: the application by the trustee of a foreign bankruptcy for delivery of the assets in this country, or for arrestment of them, must be refused if the foreign bankrupt has a business centre in this country, whether by way of a manufacturing or trading establishment, or by the ownership of landed estate or of a dwelling-house. In addition, every creditor who has a right to invoke the jurisdiction of one of the courts of this country, is entitled, either to anticipate the application by a foreign trustee for arrestment of the bankrupt's property, by obtaining from the court arrestments on his ⁴⁶ On the equality of native and foreign creditors in bankruptcy, see Bayer, Theorie des concursprocesses nach gemeinem recht, § 21. Decision of the English Ct. of Chancery, Kannreuther v. Geiselbrecht, 1884, L. R. 28, Ch. D. 175 (J. xiv. p. 212). The German Ordinance, § 4 (1) provides, "Foreign creditors stand on the same footing as native creditors." But (2) reserves a right of reprisals against subjects of a foreign State and their legal representatives. But no such reprisals can be put in force except upon an ordinance of the Imperial Chancellor, with the concurrence of the Federal Council (Bundesrath).

⁴⁸ See, e.g. the German Ordinance, § 54 (1) and (4), as to the preferential rights of servants, doctors, and druggists.

own account, or, within a certain time after arrestments have been used by the foreign trustee, to come into court to get rid of them.⁴⁹ This latter course he can only take if there is positive law permitting him to do so, a law which is recommended with the view of protecting creditors who belong to this country.⁵⁰

MOVEABLE AND IMMOVEABLE PROPERTY. FORMALITIES OF REALISATION.
OPERATION OF THE MODERN JURISDICTIONS IN RESPECT OF PROPERTY WHICH HAVE BEEN CAPRICIOUSLY SET UP, OR AT LEAST EXTENDED.
OBLIGATION TO MAKE THE SURPLUS OF ANY SPECIAL PROCESS FORTH-COMING.

§ 483. No distinction should be made between moveable and immoveable property in bankruptcy. Moveable property within the territory is just as much and just as little subject to the sovereign authority of that territory as real property is; and any such distinction is, in a practical view, discouraged by the large value which the moveable property, e.g. the fittings and implements on a farm, or the contents of a warehouse, may possess.

The formalities of realisation, however (subhastation), in the case of real property, are of course regulated by the law of the place where it is, that law being in this respect a coercitive law, and specially adapted to protect the interests of the creditors who hold real securities. It is possible that similar provisions may have to be considered in the case of the sale of moveables by auction. So far as possible, however, the rules of the court in which the bankruptcy depends, with regard to realisation, should be observed.

On the other hand, the sound view is that the regulations which we have deduced as logical and legal inferences are impossible, if the arbitrary polypus-like jurisdictions which every modern system of legislation has introduced as seemed good to it, without regard to principle, are to remain in force. One of these, which creates special confusion in bankruptcy procedure, is § 24 of the German Civilprozessordnung.⁵¹ If every creditor, without exception, can sue in any country in which he can find

In Austria (see Püttlingen, p. 486), the property of a foreign bankrupt which happens to be in Austria will be surrendered to the foreign bankruptcy. On the other hand, they proceed on the principle that, as regards real property, the bankruptcy belongs to the courts of the State in which that property lies. (See Ordinance, 1868, § 61.)

any assets belonging to his debtor, it becomes impossible to divide the creditors into classes as we have recommended. Every creditor may appear in any place he pleases, and we are lost in a general chaos. Creditors, who had any sort of preference, would, by applying for satisfaction of their whole claim in this or in that place at their own good pleasure, in substance control the division of the assets situated in another country as they pleased, or as it might surreptitiously be made worth their while to do. Is it not the case that, if all creditors were allowed in this way to plead in different places, the best possible opportunity would be afforded for such an evasion of the law? What a much more simple shape things would take, if, in any special processes of bankruptcy that may be set on foot, only those creditors who are by the very nature of their claim assigned to that jurisdiction should be settled with there, while every creditor should at the same time have a right to resort to the proper forum domicilii, only on condition, however, that he should contribute to the estate which is being administered at the forum domicilii anything which he may have received elsewhere.

Of course, any surplus that may result in a special bankruptcy procedure, must be made over to the leading process if the trustees there ask for it.⁵² On the other hand, the bankrupt must be allowed to oppose this, just as he must be heard against the award of bankruptcy and every order in the process. The court will deal with these other matters of opposition according to its own law. As regards the transference of the surplus, all it will do will be to enquire into the jurisdiction of the foreign court of bankruptcy.⁵³ For the debtor is unconditionally subject to the forum domicilii in all patrimonial actions, all actions which eventually come to a money payment, and these are the actions with which one has to deal in bankruptcy matters.

RIGHTS OF SECURED CREDITORS AND OF PERSONS ENTITLED TO RETAIN, ON THE ONE HAND. RIGHTS OF THE TRUSTEE OVER PROPERTY BELONGING TO THIRD PARTIES.

§ 484. All secured creditors have a right to resist the things which they hold in security being made forthcoming in the bankruptcy.⁵⁴ Their ⁵² See the old Prussian Ordinance, § 294. This provision is wanting in the present German Ordinance.

⁵⁴ This is so, beyond all doubt, according to §§ 39, 40, of the German Bankrupt Ordinance: for these sections give secured creditors, even if their security is moveable, a right of instituting a separate process as against a process started in Germany. The lex rei sitæ must of course say to what extent rights of retention are equivalent to securities. The rule mobilia personam rights, in competition with the arrestment of bankruptcy, which gives no more than a security right, are prior, and so preferable. They are entitled to ask that the judex rei sitæ (or, if their security consists in some claim of debt belonging to the bankrupt, the judex domicilii of that debtor) should decide their case, and should satisfy their claims out of the objects held in security, if need be, after a process of division. Any other court might refuse, in settling the ranking of creditors, to apply the lex rei sitæ, which they are entitled to have applied, and might decide according to its own law, whereby the rights of these creditors might suffer in consequence of their surrender of the subjects in question. After secured creditors have been cited in some convenient and public manner, and have been satisfied, the foreign trustee and the foreign creditors being entitled to come in and debate questions as to the liquidity of their claims and their rights to preferences, the surplus must be given up to the foreign bankruptcy court under the conditions which we have already mentioned.

On the other hand, we may find in some systems provisions by which, in the interest of public credit, assets of property may, under certain conditions, be made part of the bankrupt estate, although they do not belong to the bankrupt, but have been entrusted to him to assist him in his trade or manufacture. This is the "reputed ownership" of English law: see on it the English Bankruptcy Statute of 1883, § 44 (3). The primary point for consideration here is the rule of the lex rei sitæ: in truth, the matter we are dealing with is a peculiar extension of the general right of security or arrestment over things which are the property of another. Such an extension of the bankruptcy over the property of another person can, however, only take place if, in addition, the law of the bankruptcy process itself, the lex fori, allows it.

PREFERENCES AND EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT CLAIMS IN BANKRUPTCY.

§ 485. The law of the court of the sequestration will determine all questions of preference.⁵⁵ A right of preference is a right over the sum of the bankrupt estate as such, and is therefore subject to the law which holds that estate together, i.e. to the law of the court of the sequestration. In so far, however, as the ranking depends on the existence of any security right and its effect in questions with other competing securities, sequuntur is not to be recognised to the effect of holding moveables which are not actually in the bankrupt's possession to be subject to the law of the bankrupt's domicile (see Laurent, vii. § 467). See Heuser (Ann. ii. pp. 534-554) as to the old practice in Hesse. The ordinance of 25th April 1826 introduced some alterations in this practice to the advantage of Hessian subjects.

⁵⁵ Judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Dresden, 28th October 1859 (Seuffert, xiii. p. 321), and at Rostock, 19th October 1846 (Seuffert, xi. p. 3). Haus, Dr. Pr. § 130. See, too, Carle-Dubois, p. 64; Despagnet, § 641; German Imp. Ct. (i.) 11th Dec. 1884 (Dec. xiv. No. 115).

the law of the court of the sequestration must allow the ranking to be settled by the rules of preference which obtain in the law of pledge. This is the lex rei sitæ in the case of immoveable property and such moveables as are permanently intended to remain in some particular place, or which the debtor has not in his possession (goods delivered in pledge or property laid under arrestment), and the lex domicilii of the debtor in the case of all other moveable.⁵⁶ It may happen that it will be necessary to test the existence of the security rights by one law, but their relative ranking by another (see supra, p. 533). Ranking means simply the determination of the relation of one security right to another: that relation will always be regulated by the law of the place in which the thing last was, the law of the possessor's last domicile.

The proof of all claims must of course be taken in accordance with the law of the court of bankruptcy,⁵⁷ or with the lex fori of the special forum, in the case in which the claim is to be disposed of by a special forum. The general rules for regulating the application of foreign law, which are recognised in the court thus investigating the claims, will say whether and to what extent foreign law is to be used in the investigation, particularly as regards the forms of evidence required or admissible. The obligation of the bankrupt to pay interest is regulated by the law, which would regulate the question of interest in other circumstances. If, however, the law of the court of bankruptcy restricts claims for interest in any way, this restriction must receive effect,⁵⁸ although in other respects they must be regulated by some other law. On the other hand, however, any exclusion of a claim on the ground that it comes too late can have no effect, except in so far as the court which enacts it and the estate administered or collected by this court are concerned.

RIGHT TO RECLAIM GOODS THAT HAVE BEEN SENT AWAY; STOPPAGE in transitu. ARTICLES THAT CONTINUE TO BELONG TO THE BANKRUPT.

⁵⁶ In accord with this, Rodenburg, ii. p. 1, c. 5, § 16; J. Voet, in Dig. xx. 4, § 38; Ant. Matthæus, de Auction, i. c. 21, No. 35; Ricci, Entwurf, pp. 552, 560; Bouhier, chap. 32, No. 9; Boullenois, i. p. 553; Danz, Privatr. i. § 53, p. 179; Burge, iii. pp. 770, 771; Fœlix, ii. §§ 537, 538; Story, § 423a. An exception is, of course, admitted, if delivery of the subject can be refused by reason of some opposing right, or because there is another process of bankruptcy depending. Laurent, vii. § 404; Trib. Civ. Bordeaux (J. xi. p. 190). On this point, see German Imp. Ct. (iii.) 20th Oct. 1882 (Dec. viii. No. 28, p. 114), and judgment of the Swiss Federal Court of 1st Sep. 1877 (J. v. p. 66) as to the right of a creditor, who is in possession of a pledge, to have it dealt with on a separate footing. See, too, Brocher (ibid. p. 67), App. Ct. of Darmstadt, 1855 (Seuffert, xxii. No. 205).

⁵⁸ See German Ordinance, § 56: "In the bankruptcy process, no claim can be made for interest which has accrued since the outset of the process."

to a bankrupt, right, under certain conditions, to claim them for himself.⁵⁹ This is stoppage in transitu, or droit de suite.⁶⁰ This right exists absolutely and unconditionally, in so far as the law of the court of the bankruptcy sanctions it, for the rights of the general creditors can never be extended beyond what that law appoints. But it exists also in conformity with the law of the consignor's domicile, so long as the goods have not reached the territory of the court of the bankruptcy. For he may appeal to that law as the complement and the interpreter of his contractual intention, so long as that intention has not to give way to some unconditional command of the lex rei sitæ. The law of any intermediate stations can never affect the matter: it is not the object of these laws to protect either bankruptcies or consignors in another country.⁶¹

On the other hand, in considering the question what assets of the bankrupt's property are not liable to be taken by the creditors, the law of the bankruptcy, as well as the law of the place where these assets are, interposes for behoof of the bankrupt whichever of the two is the more favourable to him. On the one hand, the law of the bankruptcy can never drag any assets into its clutches, if it is forbidden to do so by its own lex fori on grounds of humanity; and, on the other hand, bankruptcy, as a general execution of diligence, is subject to the law of the place in which immediate execution has to be done.⁶²

CHALLENGE OF ACTS ALREADY DONE. (Actio Pauliana.) RETROSPECTIVE EFFECT OF BANKRUPTCY.

§ 487. Systems of law give, sometimes to creditors who have suffered prejudice—i.e. who have not been paid in full—sometimes to the trustee the ⁵⁹ A right to claim any particular article from the bankruptcy can, so far as moveables are concerned, never be exercised beyond what the law of the court of bankruptcy permits. This is a result of the doctrine that the right of the general creditors, as a right of arrestment or security, defeats even any real right that may have been founded in another territory, if the former is, according to the law of the place in which the article last was, the stronger (see supra, p. 499). It is besides in accordance with the requirements of credit, especially as regards the wife's right to claim certain property, in cases in which the bankrupt has changed his domicile. Muheim, p. 224, thinks differently. On the other hand, the wife has only a claim to the articles that she has brought to her husband, if that claim is sanctioned also by the law, on which the law of the married persons is in other respects dependent. A simple right of preference in a wife is a thing that must be determined exclusively by the law of the court of the bankruptcy, without regard to the law of the spouses' property which is ruled by some earlier personal law. App. Ct. Darmstadt, 9th November 1885. (Seuffert, xli. No. 322.)

⁶⁰ See Code de comm. § 576. German Bankruptcy Ordinance, § 36.

⁶² See on this point judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Stuttgart, 29th November 1879. (Seuffert, xxxv. No. 90, p. 134.)

right of challenging acts done by the bankrupt, or, it may be, diligence that has been done against him,⁶³ and thus of compelling one who has got something from the bankrupt to restore it to the estate. The general security of commerce is the object of these enactments, and hence we find that this right of challenge, like the Roman actio Pauliana, is generally used against persons who knew, at the time at which they got the advantage in question, that the person, who afterwards became bankrupt, was already overloaded with debt, and who knew therefore that the payment or performance in question was done to the prejudice of the equal division of the estate in bankruptcy, which was then in sight. Accordingly, the right of challenge is, as a rule, exercised when, in other words, it can be said that there has been some unfair dealing in fraudem creditorum. German law draws from this circumstance the inference, that this is a case of obligation ex delicto, and thus they have applied to it, in its international relations, the rules which are generally applied to obligations ex delicto.⁶⁴

We cannot say that such a construction of the matter as this, where the essence of the thing is left out of account altogether, and the course of argument seems to be "delus, ah then delict!" leads to results that are satisfactory in practice. The place of the action, purely accidental as it is, decides whether an act done previously, and done under the control of an entirely different system of law, was or was not valid.⁶⁵ Cosack⁶⁶ has very properly pointed out that this theory of delict or of quasi-delict is not satisfactory for modern German law and procedure, putting international questions out of view altogether. He has recourse to the simple method of construing the right as an obligatio ex lege, i.e. he gives up all attempt to construe it philosophically. But in such a pure and hopeless positivism we can find no foundation for an international treatment of the case.⁶⁷ But, as I pointed out in my first edition, we need not thus give up all hope. The whole right of challenge rests upon an antedating of the effects of the decree in bankruptcy to some extent. If there were no such retrospective force in the decree, the whole process of bankruptcy might be ⁶³ See German Bankruptcy Ordinance, § 23 (2), and Wilmowski's comment on it, No. 8.

⁶⁴ See Sup. Ct. at Stuttgart, 3rd January 1871 (Seuffert, xxv. No. 115); Sup. Ct. of Comm. 24th May 1875 (Dec. xvii. No. 63): in this latter decision the ground put forward is rather "possession without legal title" on the part of the defender. Förster-Eccius, § 11, No. 10; West, Archiv. für die civil. Praxis, vol. lx. p. 358. Francke, Archiv. f. d. civil. praxis, lxii. p. 487. Of course, our old friend, the deus ex machina, the appeal to the coercitive character of the law, has opportunity for coming into play. Thus, for instance, in the judgment of an older date, viz. 19th October 1846, of the Ct. at Rostock, reported by Seuffert, xi. No. 4, in which, in as few words as possible, almost all the conceivable theories touching international bankruptcies—coercitive law and universality of the process—are mixed up together.

made illusory before it ever had begun.⁶⁸ The right of challenge is limited to the case of fraudulent conduct, not with the object of punishing that conduct. It arises from an equitable and necessary consideration for conduct that may have been in perfectly good faith. We can see what the leading idea of making the date of the bankruptcy draw back was very clearly from the remains of the actio Pauliana of the Romans, which are still to be found in modern systems of law.⁶⁹

§ 488. The Franco-Italian lawyers accordingly take the point of view that the retrospective effect is the thing that must be attained, and that the law of the court of the bankruptcy must rule these questions.⁷⁰ They overlook, however, the fact that when anything has once been well acquired by another, his acquisition of it cannot be annulled or be laid open to challenge, by a change of domicile on the part of his author, in consequence of which he becomes subject to some new system of bankruptcy procedure. Further, they forget that the bankruptcy can only have over estate situated in some foreign country, and still in the direct possession of the bankrupt,⁷¹ such effect as it is allowed to have by the law of the place where the estate is situated, that is if the question is as to an attempt directly to annul a disposition of any immoveable property. In the same way, in any attempt to give this retrospective action of the law the direct effect of an obligation to refund or to furnish an equivalent, it can only operate as the lex domicilii of the person who has taken the disposition allows it to operate.

If the defender changes his domicile, he may appeal to the provisions of the law of his former domicile, if they are more favourable to him; for

⁶⁹ See e.g. Code de comm. § 443: "Nul ne peut acquérir privilège ni hypothèque sur les biens du failli dans les dix jours qui précèdent l'ouverture de la faillite." § 444: "Tous actes translatifs de propriétés immobilières, faits par le failli, à titre gratuit dans les dix jours qui précèdent l'ouverture de la faillite sont nuls et sans effet relativement à la masse des créanciers." The present French law dates from 28th May 1838. By this law, an earlier point than the stoppage of payment may be fixed by the court. Certain transactions entered into after this period are null, or may be reduced, e.g. gratuitous dispositions, payments of debts before they were due. Instead of the fixed point of the Code of Comm. in every case a point of time is fixed, back to which the power of challenge on the nullity extends.

See § 53 of the English Bankruptcy Act of 1883, which provides that the title of the trustee shall date back to the commission of the Act of Bankruptcy. [In Scotland, by the Act 1621, c. 18, alienations without just cause by an insolvent person to "conjunct and confident persons" may be cut down on bankruptcy supervening. By 1696, c. 5, all securities granted within sixty days of bankruptcy may be reduced.]

⁷⁰ See Carle-Dubois, § 44 (p. 95), and Asser-Rivier, § 128; Despagne, § 640. To the same effect Weiss, Francke, Petersen, and Jäkel.

what he has once irrevocably acquired cannot be taken from him again. Such a case will hardly ever occur, since the inducia of actions in such cases are very short.⁷²

The law of the place in which the transaction which is now to be challenged took place, will not, as such, be of any consequence.

But, even although in other matters we do not recognise the operation of a foreign sequestration in this country, it is still quite possible that that sequestration may be accepted as a fact in any process of challenge which is to take place in this country,⁷³ in so far as such a challenge must be rested upon insolvency in the disponent. This is declared by the foreign sequestration.

RIGHT OF COMPENSATION (Set-off). ASSIGNATIONS MADE WITH THE VIEW OF REARING UP COMPENSATION.

§ 489. Difficulties may arise, again, from the question of compensation. In the first place, the question of compensation must be kept entirely distinct from all questions as to the substance of the claim, which is put forward to found compensation.⁷⁴ Apart, then, from the circumstance of bankruptcy, the creditor has, in conformity with the rules laid down, supra, p. 612, the right of compensation on the footing that compensation is allowed either by the law to which the bankrupt's claim is subject, or by the law to which the counter claim is subject. Any one who desires to plead compensation may appeal to the law which is more favourable to him. Compensation is, on the one hand, a kind of discharge of the obligation; on the other hand, it is a right bound up with the counter claim. The necessary result is that in bankruptcy the same law obtains; the counter claim is subject to the law which prevails at the place in which the bankruptcy court has its seat (i.e. generally the lex domicilii of the bankrupt); the bankrupt's own claim, now pleaded by his trustee, is subject to the lex domicilii of the person who pleads compensation. If, however, the bankrupt has changed his domicile, or the counter claim should become in some other way subject to some law other than that of the bankrupt's domicile, the trustee would be required to allow any compensation, which might be sanctioned by one of these laws, to be pleaded by the person who has a counter claim. But no one who declines to renounce his claim to take in ⁷² App. Ct. of Celle, 29th February 1872 (Seuffert, xxvii. No. 1), is completely in accord with the doctrine of the text. See, too, the judgment of the Ct. of Köln, noticed in the decision of the German Imp. Ct. of 6th July 1886 (Dec. xvi. No. 13, p. 62). See, too, Förster Eccius ut cit. Eccius thinks that the law of the place in which the transaction took place is in a secondary sense the law that should be consulted.

⁷³ See judgment of German Imp. Ct. (ii.), cited in the last note.

⁷⁴ So decided by Sup. Ct. of Comm. 25th January 1873 (Seuffert, xxviii. No. 246, and Dec. ix. p. 7).

a foreign sequestration shall be allowed to appeal to any other law than that of the court of the bankruptcy.⁷⁵

It is plain, from what has been said, that the bankrupt estate may be prejudiced by assignments of claims of creditors to persons who are domiciled in another country, if the foreign law admits compensation to a greater extent than the law of the court of the bankruptcy does. It may also be prejudiced by the alienation of claims in the sequestration, if the law which prevails at the domicile of the person who acquires the claims, gives him a right to keep back on his claim some article of property which would otherwise fall into the bankrupt estate, or to claim a preferential satisfaction out of the thing conveyed to him before giving it up. If the law lays upon the cedent or the disponent in such cases (as the German Ordinance, §§ 49, 42, does) an obligation to make good to the bankrupt estate any loss it may suffer, this is an obligation ex quasi delicto, which delict must operate at the seat of the court of the bankruptcy. The obligation to pay damages will be recognised in so far only as it exists both according to the law of the cedent's domicile and the law of the court of the bankruptcy.^{76 77}

Beneficium Competentiæ. DISCHARGE OF THE DEBTOR IN THE PROCESS OF BANKRUPTCY. OPERATION OF A COMPOSITION-CONTRACT (Concordat).

§ 490. Systems of bankruptcy generally give the bankrupt under certain conditions some indulgence (beneficium competentiæ, an indulgence until he shall have again acquired some property) or a final release from all claims against him that have not been satisfied in full in the course of the bankruptcy process. The international effect of such indulgences and releases is most keenly debated.

The first thing that meets us is, as we can well understand, the far-reaching set of conclusions drawn from the principle of ordre public, with which we are so familiar.⁷⁸ It is said that no laws dealing with exceptional releases of this kind can claim an extra-territorial operation, because they ⁷⁵ To this effect the grounds of judgment of the Ct. of Comm. already cited. These grounds of judgment seem to hold that the last-mentioned effect will be produced by appearing in a foreign sequestration. I should not care to go so far. The creditor who is sued by the trustee might for a time look upon the claim of the bankrupt as extinguished by a compensatory claim, and might advance another claim altogether in the court of the bankruptcy. It seems fair that his power of choice should not be cut off by anticipation.

⁷⁶ As to the beneficium separationis, see supra, p. 842.

belong to the sphere of ordre public, or are of a coercitive character. It will not be necessary to refute the attempt to apply this reasoning to the doctrine of releases at any length. Laws and systems of bankruptcy have each and all to do with public order: if this reasoning were sound, foreign bankruptcy laws could never have any extra-territorial operation, even where it is indispensable that they should.

It will be quite unsound to make any distinction between indulgence and final release.⁷⁹ Any such indulgence is not a mere bar to action in the sense of a rule of procedure to that effect, so that it should as such be dependent on the lex fori, and should only be capable of having its due effect within the limits of that law. Action in such circumstances is not barred as a rule of process; the debtor must first plead the beneficium competentie as an answer to the action. What is desired is to give the bankrupt a protection that shall be a real protection, such as might be afforded, as regards particular creditors, by a pactum de non petendo intra certum tempus, possibly within a time fixed by reference to some specified condition. If we must allow the law of the bankruptcy the stronger privilege of finally discharging all claims in all countries, we should be the less able to refuse it the lesser privilege of extending an indulgence merely to the bankrupt.

Further, it will be obvious that the law of the court of the bankruptcy must desire to include all foreign claims under this particular operation of its processes, and that, within the State in which the court of the bankruptcy is situated, they must be allowed to have this effect, and that without reference to whether the particular creditor whose claim is struck at has appeared, except, that is to say, in cases in which it requires the assent of all the creditors to give the indulgence. Any other view would give foreign creditors an intolerable privilege, which would defeat the whole object of the bankruptcy statutes. We can all the less allow any such privilege, as the case of the bankrupt having contracted debts abroad, and of foreign creditors being interested in the bankruptcy, is so common. The legislator, who desired any such exception, would hardly forget to mention it.

§ 491. Those who maintain the universal operation of the bankruptcy justify the universal validity of the discharge, which they also maintain, on the one side, by arguing that the discharge operates by way of a contract (concordat, accord), and by appealing, on the other hand, to the consideration that what you have to deal with here is a judgment pronounced by the only competent court, the court of the bankruptcy, which must be generally recognised. Carle (§ 50) takes the former ground; his translator, Dubois,⁸⁰ takes the latter. But the weakness of the one is as easy to see as that of the other. We cannot speak of a contract, as Dubois very soundly points out, in connection with creditors who have refused to accept part payment of their debts, and whose claims have, notwithstanding their opposition, been disposed of on such part payment. The term will only apply to creditors who have agreed to take a part for the whole of their claim. We may add, that the discharge of the English law (Bankruptcy Act, 1883, §§ 28 and 30), by which the bankrupt is set free, cannot fall under any idea of an agreement or contract, for the creditors do not require to assent, but are only looked upon as persons who may be able to give information. But, again, the court of the bankruptcy has not exclusive jurisdiction to decide upon the claims that have been advanced: its jurisdiction is exclusive only in so far as these claims are put forward with the view of obtaining a share of the estate collected by the trustee in the bankruptcy. So soon as we have several bankruptcy estates and processes, completely independent of each other, the argument fails, and the question we are dealing with postulates that, subsequently to the discharge, some new estate is brought to light in some other quarter. The argument leads us back to the petitio principii of the universality of bankruptcy. Lastly, it is very clear that the release of the debtor in a bankruptcy process is a very different thing from a release by some other judicial decree, by which the claim of the creditor is declared to be unfounded, instead of a perfectly good claim being declared to be extinguished.

⁷⁹ So Supreme Ct. of Comm. 25th Jan. 1873 (Dec. ix. p. 7).

§ 492. The law of England and that of the United States, on the other hand, only recognise the discharge of claims in the bankruptcy beyond the territory, if the obligation on which the claim depends is, on its merits, subject to the law of the court of the bankruptcy.⁸¹

No objection can be taken to this theory on principle. It requires, however, to be qualified on one side, and to be extended on another.

It needs extension in this respect, that every one who desires to share in the advantages of a process of bankruptcy must accept any disadvantages that are necessarily connected with it into the bargain. That is to say, if a man has taken dividends as a creditor in the bankruptcy,⁸² or has even appeared in it, he must afterwards acquiesce, even in a foreign country, in his claim being docketed in consequence of the procedure in bankruptcy.⁸³ A contract of composition often presents undeniable advantages to creditors. It cannot be, and in our view is at variance with good faith, that particular creditors, although they claim dividends from the composition in the sequestration, should also demand a privileged ranking for a subsequent prosecution of the remainder of their debts, although that claim is asserted in a foreign country. They may, by these very means, in certain circumstances, prevent a conscientious debtor from working to improve the condition of his finances with the object of satisfying all his creditors alike.

⁸² So Trib. Seine, 23th Feb. 1886 (J. xiii. p. 331). See on the tendency of the law in California to go in this direction, J. xiii. p. 378. See also Field, § 684. The judgment of the German Sup. Ct. of Comm. of 13th June 1871 (p. 3 of Seuffert, xxvi. No. 1) leaves the question open whether a mere admission to the process of sequestration and the acceptance of certain percentages can be held per se to involve the subjection of that creditor to the law of the court of the bankruptcy.

§ 493. On the other hand, we cannot extend the operation of a composition contract, or of a discharge which is granted by the direct operation of the law, so as to cover sequestrations which are set on foot simultaneously in other countries. It cannot be held that the law of the court of the bankruptcy is desirous of extending the discharge which it gives so as to exclude the prosecution of claims over estates, or over individual assets of property, which it would itself have applied in paying creditors, had it not been prevented by the territorial limits of its jurisdiction.⁸⁴ No one can say in this case that the prosecution of the claim in another court is contrary to bona fides. It is rather a step in supplement of the operations of the court of the principal bankruptcy, and has not these mischievous consequences which the prosecution of claims upon estate subsequently acquired by the bankrupt involves. In our view, too, it would be quite immaterial, in the case of a process of bankruptcy set on foot in a foreign country at the same time as the principal process, whether the individual creditor had assented to a composition. For his consent to the discharge involved in the composition has reference to any property the bankrupt may have in the future, and not to what he at present has, the latter being, as a matter of fact, only excluded from the grip of the sequestration by being beyond the limits of the territory.^{85 86} It is not

⁸⁵ Stobbe, § 330, note 31, agrees with the view taken in the text.

⁸⁶ German law is not much inclined to give any extra-territorial effect to the discharge of obligations by bankruptcy. See e.g. judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Lübeck reported in the Göttinger gelehrte Anzeige, 1868, p. 312; Förster-Eccius, § 11, No. 10; Sup. Ct. of Comm. of Germany, 25th Jan. 1873, 7th Nov. 1874 (Dec. ix. p. 7, and xv. p. 8), and in particular German Imp. Ct. (ii.) 20th March 1888 (Dec. xxi. No. 3, p. 10). In this latter decision it is specially remarked that it deals with property which is not touched by the foreign bankruptcy. That is the point of view last noted in the text. An interesting judgment of the Sup. Ct. at Brunswick, 31st March 1882 (Seuffert, xxxviii. No. 336), goes decidedly further in the very easy to see how the international operation of the discharge of all claims in the sequestration is to be made dependent on the grant of exequatur to the foreign sequestration. The recognition of the plea of discharge is not really a measure of diligence, or a compulsitor of any kind.

DELAYS GRANTED TO THE BANKRUPT. SIST OF DILIGENCE AN INITIAL RULE IN BANKRUPTCY.

§ 494. A general moratorium, or delay, granted to the bankrupt, be it sanctioned by the court or granted by the creditors, which, for a time, without securing the creditors in any satisfaction of their claims, stays the bankruptcy or prevents it from being awarded, can have no effect beyond the territory, unless the judge of the other country is directly bound, i.e. by virtue of a treaty, to refrain from setting up an independent process of bankruptcy, unless, therefore, the universality of bankruptcy is recognised in an eminent degree in both countries. A moratorium, or sist, such as we speak of has this meaning and effect, that for the present an award of bankruptcy is refused. Such a refusal cannot, as a rule, of course stand in the way of the general execution of bankruptcy, or of a special execution on account of any special claims in a foreign country.⁸⁷ Of course, the individual creditors, by giving their consent, could invest the moratorium, or sist, with an extra-territorial operation in so far as their claims are concerned: and if, as may be the case with limited companies, a suspension of payment to which the judge interpones his authority is a step preparatory to an award of bankruptcy, this must be respected abroad as much as the award of bankruptcy itself would be.⁸⁸

SUBSEQUENT CHANGE OF DOMICILE BY THE BANKRUPT. OBLIGATION OF THE CAUTIONER.

§ 495. If a bankrupt, after the sequestration is brought to an end, changes his domicile, he cannot on that account lose any defence of international recognition of the effect of bankruptcy as a discharge. A judgment of the Sup. Ct. at Berlin, 15th April 1875 (Seuffert, xxxi. No. 105), recognised the general operation of a discharge on a composition contract, in cases where the question was one as to different systems of law in different provinces of the same State. But there is nothing in that circumstance (see supra, pp. 87-94). In my first edition (§ 78) I laid down that the discharge must have a general operation. In the Munich Critical Vierteljahrschrift für Gesetzgebung (xv. p. 36), I subsequently modified this opinion.

⁸⁷ Asser-Rivier, § 131, denies all effect to such a sursis. In illustration of the operation of the Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869, see the mutually contradictory decisions of the Trib. Civ. Seine, 21st Nov. 1883, and the Trib. Comm. Lyon, 4th May 1882 (J. x. p. 620). The former refuses effect in France to a Swiss sursis.

discharge which he has once been entitled to plead against a claim, nor can he lose the beneficium competentiæ which has once been his. For, as we have noticed, if these objections are good for anything, what they are good for must be the estate that is subsequently acquired.⁸⁹ Conversely, if the bankrupt had no such beneficium by the law of the court of the bankruptcy, he will not get it in his new domicile, although the law of that domicile would give it to a bankrupt in a like case.⁹⁰ This latter law takes no account of any sequestrations save those that are set on foot within its own territory. It cannot be directly applied to sequestrations awarded in any other country, in which it may well be that the want of such a humane provision is made up by some other advantages that are secured to the honest bankrupt or to all bankrupts.

The operation of the award of bankruptcy upon the obligation of the bankrupt need not have any effect on the obligation of his surety or cautioner. The simple question is, what import is attached to the subsidiary obligation of the cautioner? Is it only to be valid in the event of the principal debtor being, as a matter of fact, merely unable to pay, or is it to be valid also in cases in which, on account of the actual insolvency of the principal debtor, the principal obligation is held in law to be lost? This is not in substance a question of private international law.⁹¹

CLAIMS THAT ARE EXCLUDED. CHALLENGE OF DISCHARGES OR OF COMPOSITIONS.

§ 496. The exclusion of a claim, so far as that implies merely that it is thrown out of account, but not that it is destroyed,⁹² cannot in itself exclude it from a sequestration which is opened in another country. It simply means that it will not be taken into account in the division of the estate which is before the court. Objection can only be taken to the claim, if it primarily in its essence belonged to the foreign bankruptcy, while the creditor, by advancing it here, would prejudice the creditors in some other process of bankruptcy that has been awarded concurrently in the affairs of the same person. In our view, no such objection can be taken where a creditor, who has not followed out the personal claim that was open to him in the forum domicilii of the debtor in the bankruptcy proceedings that have been begun there, now sets up an action upon some hypothec which he holds for the same obligation in the subsidiary process of bankruptcy that has been opened in foro rei sitæ.⁹³

⁹⁰ So Sup. Ct. of App. Berlin, 23rd Oct. 1869 (Seuffert, xxiii. No. 204).

⁹¹ That seems to have been overlooked in the judgment of the Sup. Ct. at Stuttgart, 7th Dec. 1872 (Seuffert, xxviii. No. 100).

⁹³ Sup. Ct. of App. Cassel, 5th Dec. 1829. Strippelmann, iv. p. 184.

The question whether and under what conditions a composition contract, in virtue of which all the claims in the bankruptcy have been abated, or any other sort of discharge can be challenged, the question, therefore, whether this can be effected only by an application to be presented in the court of the bankruptcy or may be done incidenter, must in all cases be determined by the law of the court of the bankruptcy.⁹⁴ But an exception, as in the case of regular judicial decrees, must be made where there is gross and palpable injustice, and in particular where there is any fraud in which the judge in the sequestration process is involved. For although, putting special processes of liquidation and ranking out of view, we are not dealing with judicial decrees in the strict sense, we are still concerned with an act of the judge, affecting the claim, which, by reason of the dolus of the judge, can have no international effect.

EFFECT ON THE LEGAL CAPACITY OF THE BANKRUPT. HIS REHABILITATION.

§ 497. A bankruptcy may involve some alteration on the legal capacity of the bankrupt. E.g. he loses right to appear on 'Change, his political rights of voting, or is required to surrender certain offices of honour. Are these effects involved in an award of bankruptcy issued in a foreign country? It seems that we must answer this in the negative,⁹⁵ as a necessary consequence of the general doctrine of legal capacity which we have already laid down (supra, pp. 305, 320, 321), and all the more so as, in the case in question, the diminution of the legal capacity is imposed by a judicial decree. At the same time, the import of these legal rules may merely go this length, that persons who cannot satisfy the demands of their creditors, a thing which no doubt must first be established by a judicial sentence, shall not be allowed to exercise these honourable privileges, in which financial integrity is an indispensable condition. From this point of view it is possible to look upon the award of bankruptcy in a foreign country as a fact, and to attach to it the same effects as that award would have in this country, instead of the effects which the award would have in the country where the bankruptcy was set on foot. The financial integrity of the person in question will be just as much damaged by a foreign award of bankruptcy as by an award in this country. Of course, the bankrupt must be allowed the right of showing to those officials who superintend the exercise of these honourable privileges in any particular case, that the award of bankruptcy in the foreign country was unfairly made.

A formal rehabilitation of the person who has lost such rights in consequence of an award of bankruptcy, or of the sequestration being brought to an end without full payment having been made to the creditors, can of course only be obtained from the courts of the State in which the bankruptcy and sequestration took place.⁹⁶ The matter to be dealt with is a formal recall of an order made by the sovereign authority of the State, or of the consequences of such an order. No other sovereign authority can do this. But if the law of any State makes the restoration of these privileges dependent simply on the fact⁹⁷ that the bankruptcy procedure has come to an end, then, on the general principles of regulating legal capacity, that result shall not be hindered because the foreign State, in which a man happens to have been made bankrupt, requires a formal process for his rehabilitation, or sets up some stricter conditions for the reacquisition of full legal capacity.

⁹⁴ See Carle-Dubois, § 51.

⁹⁵ Piggott, pp. 348, 349, says that such effects of foreign bankruptcies are not recognised in England.

EFFECT OF A BANKRUPTCY AWARDED IN A FOREIGN COUNTRY ON SUBSEQUENT ACQUISITIONS OF PROPERTY.

§ 498. The recognition of a foreign bankruptcy can, lastly, never have the effect of preventing an award of bankruptcy being made subsequently in this country, if circumstances within the territory of this country should take a shape, which the law of this country says justify an award of bankruptcy. A law, which draws into the sequestration property that has been acquired after the sequestration has been begun, or even after it has come to an end,⁹⁸ has no extra-territorial effect unless a legal rule of the same kind is recognised in the territory to which the bankrupt has transferred his domicile after the bankruptcy has come to an end. But, conversely, the operation of a bankruptcy awarded in a foreign country can never reach further than it is extended by the lex fori of the court of the bankruptcy. Nor does a prior award of bankruptcy in a foreign court stand in the way of an award of bankruptcy in this country, even if the law of this country, differing from the foreign law, does not require a new process to be begun, but requires the old process to be revived and carried on.⁹⁹ Any other view would lead to a simple denial of justice, if, for instance, the law of country A, in which the bankruptcy was awarded excludes all subsequent acquisitions of the bankrupt from the sequestration (as section 1 of the German Ordinance does), while the law of country B, on the other hand, to which the bankrupt has subsequently betaken himself, follows the converse principle.

⁹⁶ See Carle-Dubois, § 72, for the right view.

⁹⁷ Carle-Dubois overlooks this possibility.

⁹⁸ In French law this happens if the bankruptcy process is sisted for want of sufficient assets. See Bernard, J. ix. p. 379.

⁹⁹ See Bernard (J. ix. p. 370) on the cases on this point, and on what I consider the by no means satisfactory treatment of them by the French Court of Cassation, interpreting the letter of the Franco-Swiss Treaty of 1869. Bernard, in holding the doctrine of the French Court of Cassation to be satisfactory, is in my opinion in contradiction with the position which he also takes up (p. 399), viz. that he thinks that the propositions previously laid down should not be applied, if the trustee who has been appointed in a foreign country will do nothing to assist subsequent French creditors to obtain their rights. The rest of Bernard's acute discussion of the matter shows, on the one hand, that in the case of a sequestration process it is out of place to require an exequatur; and, on the other hand, that the prosecution of parties' true rights may easily be prejudiced by a treaty, unless the conception of the treaty is free from fault.

NOTE AAA ON §§ 475-498. LAW OF INTERNATIONAL BANKRUPTCY IN SCOTLAND AND ENGLAND.

[As regards the grounds on which it is held competent for the court of any country to award sequestration against an insolvent, it may be remarked that the exigencies of commerce have established a recognition of the authority of the courts of another country in matters of this kind, in circumstances which many legal systems would hold insufficient to give jurisdiction for other matters. We have seen that nationality or domicile, personal service and arrestment, are the usually recognised modes of constituting a jurisdiction over a defender, and that in questions of status a permanent relation between the parties and the country whose courts are called upon to adjudicate is universally required. The sequestration of any person may, in so far as it affects the capacity of disposition, be regarded as being a question of status, but yet the necessity and high convenience of dividing the assets at the place where the claims upon them have arisen, have established a generally recognised rule, that an individual may be sequestrated where he has been domiciled or has traded, a company where it has traded.

By § 13 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79) it is provided for Scotland that sequestration may be awarded when the debtor is subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts of Scotland, and, in the case of an individual, has within a year resided, or had a dwelling-house or place of business there; or in the case of a company, if it is subject to the jurisdiction and has within a year carried on business in Scotland, or had a place of business there; or in the case of an unincorporated company, if, the company being subject to the jurisdiction, any partner has resided or had a dwelling-house in Scotland. The Supreme Courts will have jurisdiction in respect of domicile, of the ownership of real estate, or residence in Scotland in one locality for forty days. If any one of these conditions is present, the court has jurisdiction, and may award sequestration if, in addition, the conditions as to residence or business are fulfilled. In the case of an incorporated company registered in Scotland, the courts of Scotland have the same jurisdiction as over an individual domiciled there.

In the case of foreign incorporated companies, it has been held in England that a company not technically domiciled, but carrying on trade in England, may be wound up there, but cannot be dissolved by the court. The criterion seems to be that it is under the control of persons domiciled in England, and this criterion has been applied to bring a Spanish railway company, a German mining company, a Mexican mining company, and a Belgian railway company to be wound up in England (Lindley on Partnership, p. 912, and cases cited there; Buckley on the Companies' Act, p. 218). There seems to be no reason to prevent the Scots courts exercising, in the case of foreign incorporated companies, the same jurisdiction as the English courts exercise.

To determine the extent of the operation of a sequestration once awarded, the courts of Scotland have, so far as moveable estate is concerned, applied the rule "mobilia sequuntur personam." The rule is thus stated by Lord President Inglis in Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Lawson and Sons' Tr. 1878, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. v. p. 1138: "The great principle that moveables follow the law of the owner's domicile is not more firmly settled in the case of intestate succession than it is in the case of bankruptcy. Hence, whenever the court of the domicile has, by proceedings in bankruptcy, vested the moveable estate of the bankrupt in a trustee or assignee for the purpose of equal distribution among his creditors, no part of the moveable estate, wheresoever situated, can be touched or affected except through the bankruptcy proceedings, and by the orders of that country in which those proceedings take place. The jurisdiction of that court is exclusive. This proposition is fully supported by the cases of Strother v. Read, 1803, Morrison's Dict. of Dec. Voce Forum Competens, App. No. 4; Maitland v. Hoffman, 1808, Morrison's Dict. Voce Bankrupt, App. No. 26; Goetze v. Aders, Preyer & Co. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. ii. p. 150." For the same statement of doctrine, reference may be made to Bell's Comm. ii. p. 376 et seq. and p. 571 et seq. The rule is applied indifferently, whether the person seeking to save the goods in Scotland from the operation of the foreign bankruptcy is a Scot, or a foreigner who has come to Scotland and arrested the goods there.

It will be observed that his lordship uses the word "domicile" in the same sense in bankruptcy law as that which it bears in the law of intestate succession. This can hardly be maintained to be a sound criterion for settling the locus of a mercantile sequestration. Lawyers are familiar with the difficult investigations that so often take place in cases of succession as to a person's domicile, investigations which not unfrequently result in the conclusion that the domicile of origin has never been lost, because the person whose domicile is being sought has had so many "homes" in succession, without any intention of settling permanently in any, that it is impossible to find a domicile for him in fact, and it is necessary to give him the domicile which legal presumption assigns to him, i.e. the domicile of origin. But he may never have visited the country of his origin since infancy. Is that country to supply the forum for the administration of his estates if he become bankrupt? Surely not. Add to these considerations the jurisdiction which the 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act claims for the courts of Scotland (i.e. jurisdiction by reason of the ownership of real property or residence for forty days, combined with occupation of a dwelling-house or place of business), and which they therefore must hold to be a reasonable jurisdiction if claimed by any other court, and the result will be that "domicile" in the cases on this subject must be read as equivalent to "home or trading establishment."

This is the criterion which is taken in the cases of trading companies: the Lord President, in the case of the Phosphate Sewage Co., to which reference has already been made, goes on to say: "When the bankrupt is a trading company having two trading domiciles . . . the same principle is still applicable. The process of distribution of the effects may be instituted in either domicile, but where it has been instituted in one of the domiciles, and the estate has been vested in a trustee or assignee, no claim can be made effectual against the estate, and no part of the estate can be touched or affected except through those bankruptcy proceedings, and the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court of that domicile is exclusive even of the courts of the other domicile. See Royal Bank of Scotland v. Ass. of Stein, Smith, & Co. 20th Jan. 1813, F.C., and the judgment of Lord Eldon in the case of Selkrig (Fairholmes' Tr.) v. Davies and Salt, 1814, 2, Dow's H. of L. Reps. p. 230, approving the judgment of the court in the former case."

If I am right in thinking that, in the case of the individual trader, "domicile" in questions as to the forum of bankruptcy must be read in a different sense from the sense it holds in questions of succession, then individual traders will be able, as well as companies, to have several domiciles—a conclusion that seems to be consistent with actual fact—and the rule for determining the forum will then be the rule of priority.

But if "domicile" is to be taken in this wider signification, what becomes of the principle of "mobilia sequuntur personam," which is put forward as the foundation for the doctrine of the universality of bankruptcy? That brocard cannot have, even as matters stand, any application to the case of trading companies: it is not the principle on which the forum is settled in their case, for, ex concessis, they have several domiciles, and an arbitrary rule, viz. that of priority, must be invented to determine which of those domiciles the moveable estate is to follow. Nor can it apply to individual traders, if "domicile" is to have the same meaning in their case as that which it bears in the case of trading companies. That priority must in the end furnish the rule of preference seems to be recognised by Lord President Inglis himself, in the case of Goetze v. Aders, sup cit.

The principle of the universality of bankruptcy is then left to depend on general considerations of convenience and equity. That indeed is the ground on which it is put in the leading case of Strother v. Read, already quoted. It is there said: "As to cases of bankruptcy, the interests of commerce, as well as the regard which all nations ought to pay to the principles of general law, point out the necessity of adopting one uniform rule; and nothing can be more expedient than that we should follow out the principle already noticed, of moveable effects being subject to the disposition of that law which binds the person of their owner. . . . It is perfectly fair and equal that when an English merchant, who happens to have personal effects here, becomes bankrupt, the law of his own country should be allowed to take his whole effects, wherever situate, into its custody for the purpose of distribution among his creditors, according to the rules of the English law, while we are permitted, in the case of a Scots bankruptcy, to do exactly the same thing in England." The argument from reciprocity is thus brought in by the concluding sentence which I have quoted, to supplement the general argument based on mercantile convenience.

If, however, the case for the universality of bankruptcy has to be put upon general grounds of convenience, there is great force in the argument used by the author for allowing each centre of activity, each country where business has been carried on, to establish a forum for itself. The arguments in favour of this course have, perhaps, been obscured in Scotland by the fact that the earlier cases were cases in which the two competing jurisdictions were those of England and Scotland, creditors in either of which countries would have ready access to the courts of the other, some knowledge of the law of the other country or ready means for learning it, and an assurance of reciprocity. These considerations are not always present in questions arising with foreign countries.

In Scotland, the retrospective effect of a Scots bankruptcy will be recognised to the effect of cutting down a preference given by a Scots bankrupt to a foreign trader within sixty days of bankruptcy, the period up to which bankruptcy has, by the law of Scotland, a retrospective effect (White v. Briggs, 1843, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. v. p. 1148). But the Scots courts, again, will not recognise the retrospective force of a foreign adjudication in bankruptcy so as to defeat measures of security, taken during a certain period before bankruptcy by a Scots creditor for his protection, over property of the debtor situated in Scotland (Hunter v. Palmer, 1825, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. iii. 586). "There may be regulations in different countries necessary for giving preference among the creditors which can receive no effect extra territorium. It is only as operating a conveyance of moveable estate that the foreign bankruptcy proceedings receive effect," per Lord Pres. Inglis in Goetze v. Aders, quoted supra.

If a creditor has by means of a prompt use of diligence, or through a sequestration awarded in a foreign country, obtained part satisfaction of his claim out of estate, real or moveable, from which the other creditors in the Scots sequestration have been excluded, he cannot claim subsequently in the Scots sequestration, until the creditors there have been placed upon an equal footing with him by receiving an equalising dividend. (Stewart v. Auld, 1851, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xiii. p. 1337.) The two sequestrations, if there be two, are treated as one, so that no creditor, by appearing in both, shall obtain a double ranking.

While, as above stated, regulations "for giving preference among the creditors can receive no effect extra territorium," in so far as these are regulations of a positive and artificial nature as to the retrospective effect to be given to the award of sequestration, it may quite well be that the rights of a creditor, who has attached moveables in accordance with the laws of their situs, will be recognised in the court of the bankruptcy so as to give him a preference over other creditors claiming in the sequestration. The possibility of such a preference is carefully saved in the case of Goetze v. Aders (supra) and in the case of Lindsay v. Paterson (1840, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. ii. p. 1373). The vesting clause of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, § 102 (1), provides that the vesting of the moveable estate in the trustee is to be subject "to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null or reducible." This would seem to entitle a creditor to plead security rights well acquired by him by the lex situs, subject always to the operation of the lex fori in so far as the retrospective effect of the award of sequestration is concerned. The lex fori which creates and defines the sequestration is entitled to carry back its operation so as to cut down foreign securities, if the creditor who holds these comes into the sequestration voluntarily, or if the law of the country where the moveables are situated recognises the trustee's title as universal, and therefore hands over the moveables in its territory for distribution under this foreign process. There is no question as to the validity of the securities when originally granted: the law of the sequestration cuts down securities granted in its own country, and valid by the law of this country, under the scope which it attributes to the award of sequestration. Moveables coming from another country, if they are brought under that sequestration, must inter alia submit to the regulations of the forum as to the period when it began.

In competing bankruptcies within the United Kingdom, it is provided, as regards Scotland, by a statute of 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. c. 33, § 2), that the Court of Session may recall a sequestration awarded in Scotland, where a majority of the creditors reside in England or Ireland, or where the court shall be of opinion that the Bankrupt or Insolvent Laws of England or Ireland should regulate the distribution of the estate (cf. Cooper v. Baillie, 1878, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. v. 564).

As regards heritage, the 102nd section of the Scots Bankruptcy Act of 1856 vests heritage in the United Kingdom in the trustee of a Scots bankruptcy, and similar provisions exist in England and in Ireland. But in the case of other foreign countries, the lex situs will apply, and will exclude the operation of the sequestration as such. No doubt the character of a foreign trustee will be recognised in Scotland so as to give him right to take steps for making up a title in Scotland to Scots heritage: he will not be required to have himself appointed trustee in a bankruptcy process in this country, but the estate will not, like moveable estate, vest in him ipso jure.

The discharge of a bankrupt by a court in Scotland, at the close of the proceedings in a Scots sequestration, will by statute (Bankruptcy Act, 1856, §§ 140 and 147) receive effect within Great Britain and Ireland, and all Her Majesty's other dominions. In a question with any other foreign country, it is held that where a bankruptcy includes the whole of a debtor's estate, heritable and moveable, a discharge in it will operate as a discharge everywhere. (Royal Bank of Scotland v. Ass. of Stein, Smith & Co. January 20th, 1813, F.C. and Bell's Comm. ii. p. 577.) If, however, there is no such universal extension of the bankruptcy over the whole estate, then, on a claim being made after discharge by a creditor, and resisted on the head of that discharge, the question will be whether the courts of the country which granted the discharge had, on principles of international law, authority over the obligation upon which the creditor claims. If they had, the discharge will be good; if not, then the debtor is not in the position of having been released by a court competent to do so, and consequently may still be sued by his creditor (Bell's Comm. ii. pp. 576, 577, and Goudy on Bankruptcy, pp. 591, 592).

The jurisdiction of the English courts in bankruptcy, the extent of the operation of an adjudication in bankruptcy and the effects of a discharge, have in part been dealt with in the text, and will be found fully discussed by Mr Westlake, pp. 138-163, and again, pp. 281-283; Foote, p. 208 et seq., and Piggott.

The principal propositions are as follows, viz.: A creditor may present a petition in the English court for the sequestration of a debtor on the commission of an act of bankruptcy by him, if the debtor is domiciled in England, or has, within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition, ordinarily resided in England, or had a dwelling-house or place of business there (46 and 47 Vict. c. 52, § 6). This jurisdiction is much the same as that of the Scots courts. The act of bankruptcy may in many cases be committed out of England, ibid. § 4.

The English courts do not recognise the universality of bankruptcy, so as to hold it incompetent to award a sequestration there, if a foreign sequestration is already pending. They will make such an award if, in the whole circumstances, it appears to be for the interest of creditors that they should do so. But, if no such order is made in England, the English courts will recognise the title of a foreign trustee to ingather the property, so far as moveable, belonging to the bankrupt in England, in preference to the title of any individual creditor. The title of an English trustee will not, however, give him a right to compel the bankrupt to execute conveyances of foreign immoveables, nor will a foreign award of bankruptcy operate upon immoveable property in England.

A creditor who has obtained payment of part of his debt in a foreign sequestration, out of the moveable estate situated there, will not be allowed to rank in England until the claimants in the English sequestration have received an equalising dividend. But where a creditor has got part satisfaction of his debt out of foreign real estate, it is held—and, in this, English law differs from that of Scotland—that he need not bring any such part payment into account in claiming in the English bankruptcy. He will rank for the remainder of his debt pari passu with the other creditors as though he had not received any proportion of his debt, although of course he will not receive more than twenty shillings in the pound on his whole debt. Thus, suppose a creditor for £1000 has got payment of £500 from foreign real estate, he will claim on the remaining £500 in the English sequestration, and, if a dividend of ten shillings is paid, will receive £250 in England, thus getting £750 in all; while the English creditor to the same amount, £1000, who has claimed in England only, will only get £500. This doctrine is defended on the ground that the former creditor has, by his diligence, obtained something that did not and could not form part of the English fund. The order of preference of the creditors, after their claims are ascertained to be valid, depends on the lex fori; a priority conferred by the law of the place of the contract on which the claim is founded will not be recognised.

A company technically domiciled in England may be sequestrated and wound up there; a company not technically domiciled, but carrying on trade in England, may be wound up there, but cannot be dissolved by the court. The criterion seems to be that it is under the control of persons domiciled in England, and this criterion has been applied to bring a Spanish railway company, a German mining company, a Mexican mining company, and a Belgian railway company to be wound up in England.

A discharge granted in a court in the British dominions will operate as a discharge in all other parts of these dominions. But where the discharge has taken place under a foreign bankruptcy, it will not be held in England to discharge the debtor of obligations on which the courts of that country had not jurisdiction to adjudicate. The discharge of an obligation—even under a bankruptcy—must be by the forum loci contractus, whether that be the locus actus, the locus solutionis, or the locus delicti commissi.]

FINAL OBSERVATIONS.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF BANKRUPTCY AS A MATTER TO BE DEALT WITH BY LEGISLATION AND BY TREATIES.

§ 499. We believe that we have shown that, apart from any positive legislative provision, there is no such thing as any general and universal operation of sequestration introduced ipso facto by an award of bankruptcy, although the award of bankruptcy and the process following on it are by no means without some indirect effect in foreign countries.¹⁰⁰

¹⁰⁰ The proper legislative formula in my opinion is that contained in §§ 207 (1) and 208 of the German Ordinance in Bankruptcy. In its legal form and logic these sections may be described as a triumph of German legislative ability. On § 208, see supra, § 480. In § 207, it is simply said: "(1.) When a debtor whose foreign assets are affected by a bankruptcy possesses assets in the empire, execution may be had against the latter. (2.) Exceptions may be made to this rule by an order of the Chancellor of the Empire, with the consent of the federal council." In the first subsection not a word can be spared, and to it not a word can be added. The legislator has very properly guarded himself against saying that an award of bankruptcy in a foreign country will have no effect at all in Germany; all that is said is that in itself it will not prevent execution in Germany. Thus it is admitted that a foreign trustee may get arrestments imposed on German property belonging to the bankrupt, or bring them into the bankrupt estate by means of other actions; but then the trustee must anticipate other creditors. The foreign bankrupt does not ipso jure become incapable of disposing. But as a matter of fact the foreign trustees may bring about the same result, if they make haste to lay arrestments upon all the assets situated in Germany; and, if any one else has laid on arrestment or done execution in Germany, then, on the motion of the foreign trustee, the surplus of the sum produced by the realisation of the property in Germany may be handed over to the foreign bankruptcy, as indeed was expressly provided by § 294 of the old Prussian Ordinance in Bankruptcy. On the other hand, the public of Germany cannot be expected to respect the foreign bankruptcy, of which it need really know nothing; nor is any such duty of respect involved on an exequatur of the foreign bankruptcy being granted, the effects of which are undefined,

Would it then be desirable to replace this state of matters, which is, as I believe, in accordance with the positive law on the subject as it at present exists, by a simple rule that the sequestration shall have universal operation, with the limitation, it may be, that a foreign sequestration shall have no higher effect than a sequestration in this country? The modern Franco-Italian school answers this question in the affirmative, and the second Congresso Giuridico Italiano internazionale, assembled in 1880 in Turin, attached itself to the same theory to this extent at least, that it recommended the execution of international treaties on this basis. It did not, however, pronounce entirely without hesitation that legislation in the future would certainly take this point of view.

I should not like to support this doctrine except under the most substantial limitations.

In the first place, it would be a very serious matter indeed, to set up the principle of the international universality of bankruptcy by legislation alone, apart from treaties altogether. Let us remember that the question is quite a different one from the recognition of res judicata, or even the execution of foreign judicial sentences pronounced in other civil processes. On the one hand, that recognition and execution have reference solely to disputes which in their nature, or by the voluntary subjection of parties, are referred to foreign judges. On the other hand, the vis attractiva of bankruptcy is to have the effect of sweeping away to all practical effect jurisdictions which would otherwise exist in this country, and of sending away creditors belonging to this country, against their well-founded expectations, to foreign and perhaps very distant courts.¹⁰¹ and of which the public may be just as ill informed as of the original decree. Still less can it be supposed that in the German Empire the foreign award of bankruptcy will have any retrospective effect, a thing which is dangerous to admit. The question of retrospective effect, was, as Lammasch (p. 449, note 9) reminds us, one of the points on which in 1879-1880, in the proposals for the conclusion of an Austro-German treaty, the parties could not agree.

We have already said all that we need say as to an award of bankruptcy separate and distinct, after the German award. The only faulty point is the retrospective effect, which the provisions of the Civilprozessordnung (much less successful in details than the bankruptcy ordinance) lay down with regard to the jurisdictions which it recognises (see supra, § 483), and thus it would be desirable to have some such provision as the old Prussian Ordinance had, ensuring official public intimation before the estate should be handed over (see supra, p. 1028, note 49).

In my opinion, too, a more extensive operation may be allowed to the foreign bankruptcy under the necessary conditions. The second subsection of § 207 of the German bankruptcy Ordinance is faulty in so far as it appears to be based on the theory that it is possible, by a simple declaration that execution in Germany is not to be allowed, to introduce in a satisfactory way a treatment of the foreign decree or award of bankruptcy which will fit in with the universal operation of the sequestration. But if we should give the foreign bankruptcy that effect as regards execution, we would find that we had made a series of other rules of law necessary, which could not very well be laid down by a simple order of the Chancellor of the Empire, but would require the interposition of the proper legislative authority.

¹⁰¹ The enquiry into jurisdiction has quite another meaning in bankruptcy from what it has in other processes. In bankruptcies it has reference—if the universality of the bankruptcy is recognised—to a fact, i.e. domicile, which may have no connection whatever with the nature of the particular matters in dispute. Again, in auxiliary processes in bankruptcy, we

Another effect will be to withdraw from the creditors assets of property which are at hand, and on account of which perhaps they gave credit for the sums or obligations for which they sue; possibly, too—if we go seriously to work with the doctrine of the universality of bankruptcy in its full sense, if, for instance, we do not recognise separate sequestrations for special trading establishments, but refer all the creditors to the foreign domicile of the debtor—the effect will be to allow a foreign legal system, which may be mischievous from its excessive laxity and from the ease with which it is made the instrument of fraud,¹⁰² to have the most direct influence on the credit and commerce of this country. But that is not all: the foreign sequestration is maintained to have the effect of preventing any further valid payments being made to the bankrupt. This last danger would be made less serious by a provision making the operation of a foreign sequestration dependent on public notice of it being given in this country. But the fact remains that the process is remitted to a foreign judge, and we must remember the reports which, in spite of our civilisation, apparently so far advanced, are circulated with more or less foundation as to the administration of justice in many “interesting” countries—how, for instance, the most valuable assets are swallowed up in expenses of process, not to mention other alleged miscarriages of justice. We need not enquire whether such reports are true or not. But so long as they are in circulation—and that may last for a considerable time still—if our legal system were to give, as a matter of course, the same effect to a foreign sequestration as to a sequestration in this country, it would seem to disclose a carelessness which admits of no excuse.

§ 500. The only expedient left is that of treaty, and treaties dealing with the recognition of foreign sequestrations can only be concluded with States, whose administration of justice commands special confidence and is not too costly, and in the case of such treaties regard must be had to the distance of the countries which are in question. Again, the method to be taken is not to give a simple recognition to the foreign sequestration, unless the parties are prepared under certain circumstances to expose the trade of this country to the greatest uncertainty. The incapacity of the bankrupt to dispoise, the incompetency of special executions, and the retrospective effect of the award of sequestration, would never be recognised to a higher degree than these effects attach to a sequestration in this country,¹⁰³ and in every case it will be the duty of the judge to see that have no such safety-valve as the plea of “gross injustice” affords in other cases to put forward as an objection to the individual claims in the sequestration process; these cannot be investigated ab ante when the sequestration is first awarded. The possibility of injustice which strikes one most obviously is injustice to the bankrupt. At the same time, the recognition of the foreign sequestration and the consequent surrender of the estate is prejudicial to the real satisfaction of the individual creditors.

¹⁰² E.g. The foreign system of law might make it too easy for the debtor to get rid definitely of his debts.

¹⁰³ This limitation is as much a sound legal inference as a measure of practical utility. See supra, § 483.

there is jurisdiction in the foreign court, and to see whether or not a separate and subordinate sequestration should be awarded in this country—under the supervision of the public authorities, if the law knows such supervision—and to see that public intimation is given. The matter at issue, when sequestration has been awarded, although that may be in a foreign country, is the protection of the public and unknown creditors in this country, that they may not find out too late that their debtor's estate has been unfairly carried off to a foreign country. Of course, too, every interested party must be entitled to urge objections against the recognition of the foreign sequestration. This objection would have no effect in suspending proceedings except to the effect of preventing, for a time, the estate from being carried off to a foreign country.¹⁰⁴ But the trustees named in the other country would at once be entitled to apply in the name of the creditors who were taking part in the foreign bankruptcy for protective orders, in the same way as individual creditors outside the sequestration may. But these protective measures would prove abortive, if the jurisdiction of the foreign courts should come to be denied, or if a separate auxiliary sequestration should come to be awarded in this country. In the latter case, they might perhaps be allowed to subsist for the benefit of the subsequent bankruptcy.

In my view, then, treaties to recognise the extra-territorial force of sequestrations in conformity with the doctrine of the universality of bankruptcy can only be concluded with the greatest caution, and must not be concluded with all States indiscriminately. On the other hand, it may be pointed out that, more than forty years ago, the authority of Savigny sanctioned the doctrine of the unity and universal authority of bankruptcy, appealing to a series of treaties concluded for this purpose by Prussia. But the Prussian treaties which he cites, on close examination, do not prove much. In the first place, they recognise auxiliary sequestrations to a large extent. When we find that in one of these treaties¹⁰⁵ it is provided that an auxiliary process may be set on foot in any country in which the bankrupt has an establishment which, as a complete whole in itself, constitutes a separate group of rights and obligations, while in other treaties immoveable property is held to justify an auxiliary process, we see what the truth is as to the practice of these Prussian treaties of which Savigny so cleverly makes use. But, in the next place, the countries in question were adjoining German States, with systems of administration which were all equally trustworthy. There was, therefore, no question of sending off creditors to distant courts, doing their business in a foreign language, for whose learning and integrity no guarantee could be taken. But, lastly, Savigny's discussion of the subject is not thorough enough. This famous lawyer has covered some gaps in his chain of reasoning on this subject by the brilliancy of his reputation and the elegance of his diction.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE ITALIAN INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF JURISTS, 1880. PROVISIONS OF THE FRANCO-SWISS TREATY OF 1869. THE EARLIER GERMAN STATUTE OF 1869.

§ 501. The Italian International Congress of jurists which assembled in 1880 at Turin¹⁰⁶ started, as we have already said, from the principle of universality as the principle that should be set up by future treaties. But, while it confined itself in the first place to commercial failures, it did not by its resolutions solve one very grave difficulty, viz.: what is the relation of the sequestration of the trading establishment of any person to the sequestration of the same person in his non-commercial character: whether in such a case there is, or is not, to be an auxiliary process. We may say, also, that by accident only persons who had already pronounced in favour of the principle of universality were included in the Congress.

Lastly, it may be that in Italy the principle of the universality of bankruptcy has not as yet led to any mischievous results. That, however, is accounted for by the fact, on the one hand, that the competency of an auxiliary bankruptcy in the case of trading establishments in that country has always, as far as we can see, been recognised in practice, and, on the other hand, by the fact that a declaration of exequatur has always been required. It has not been well settled what effects accrue to a sequestration awarded in a foreign country before this declarator of exequatur,¹⁰⁷ what persons must be cited to the process of declarator, and what persons are affected by this process. We thus find ourselves in what may be in certain circumstances a pleasant uncertainty, whereby it is open to us to meet the dangerous consequences of the foreign award of sequestration by an appeal to the fact that no exequatur, or an insufficient exequatur, has taken place.

The resolutions¹⁰⁸ of this Italian Congress, which has been so often alluded to, are as follows, viz.:—

“The Congress, considering that the interest of trade demands that the operation of mercantile bankruptcies should not be confined to the territory of any one country, but should extend over as many civilised

¹⁰⁷ Curti, however (p. 132), properly calls attention to the fact that if a declarator of exequatur is to be an indispensable condition precedent to the operation of a foreign sequestration to any effect whatever, a great part of the benefit of the universality of the bankruptcy is lost.

countries as possible, but that the existing differences among systems of bankruptcy law make it difficult to introduce an uniform international code on the subject, is of opinion that, for a while, we must be contented with the system of one or more conventions, the leading features of which would be the following, viz. :—

1. The court of the place in which the trader has his principal trading establishment is the court which has jurisdiction to award and wind up the bankruptcy procedure.

2. The judicial sentence awarding bankruptcy, and all the other decrees pronounced in the course of the procedure in bankruptcy, shall have the same force (autorità di cosa giudicata) in the territories of all the other countries that are parties to the treaty, as they possess in the country in which they were pronounced, and may be founded upon as warranting summary and provisional steps in these other countries, provided always that they have been published in conformity with the requirements of art. v. (a) infra.¹⁰⁹

In so far, however, as it is proposed to use any such decrees in a foreign country for the purposes of diligence, a judgment of exequatur must first be obtained from the judicial authority of the State in which the diligence is to be done.

The treaty will provide what court shall be competent to give an exequatur. It will proceed upon a simple application by parties interested, and contentious procedure shall not be necessary. The decree of exequatur shall not be refused unless :—

(a.) Some court that was not competent under art. i. shall have awarded sequestration, or

(b.) The decree is one that does not admit of execution in the State in which it is pronounced.

A decree of exequatur may be resisted, but opposition to it has no suspensory effect.

3. Limitations on the dispositive power of the bankrupt,¹¹⁰ the nomina-

¹⁰⁹ It was quite right, as we have seen from the discussion of the subject already submitted, that each and every effect of a foreign award of bankruptcy should not be made dependent on an exequatur being obtained (see Esperson, Il secondo congresso Giuridico Italiano e il diritto privato internazionale. Roma, 1880, p. 5). But it does not seem to be necessary to make any public advertisement, if all that is wanted is to impose arrestments in virtue of the foreign award of bankruptcy. An arrestment might very probably prove illusory, if it could only be laid on after such public notice.

¹¹⁰ This resolution is probably unsound. Where the bankrupt has concluded contracts, the question is not one as to his capacity to act; the point rather is that there is an arrestment operating over foreign territory, which cannot possibly be made independent of the lex rei sitæ in dealing with corporeal property, or of the law to which the claim is subject (i.e. as a general rule the lex domicilii of the debtor), when it is dealing with incorporeal claims. The question, e.g. whether the bankrupt is entitled to renounce a succession, cannot be dependent alone upon the law of the sequestration, but must be dependent primarily on the law which rules the succession. But, of course, the sequestration cannot extend to any asset of property which by the law of the sequestration is not covered by it. The trustee must therefore have a right to enter on the succession according to the law of the court of the bankruptcy.

On the other hand, the law of the court of the bankruptcy can alone determine the limits of the powers of the trustee, the court or the meetings of creditors, or of a committee chosen by the creditors, as the case may be, over assets already legally acquired, and forming part of tion and the powers of the trustee, the forms of procedure, the competency, the conditions, and the effects of a composition contract, the realisation and division of the assets among the creditors, native and foreign, are all regulated by the law of the place where the sequestration is awarded.

4. Real rights, the ranking of real securities, preferable debts and pledges, rights of vindication, of lien, and claims for special articles, whether these rights are concerned with moveables or with immoveables, must be determined by the law of the situs of the things.

The treaty will declare what court of the country is to have jurisdiction over each class of questions of that kind.

5. The treaty will contain special provisions:—

(a.) For the publication of the judicial sentences pronounced in processes of bankruptcy in one of the States concerned within the territories of the other:

(b.) For the relations of the various courts of the States, that are parties to the treaty, to each other, as regards the performance of the enactments contained in these treaties.

6. Treaties will in the meantime be confined to commercial bankruptcies. The laws of the different States will remain in force for the bankruptcies of non-traders, for the punishment of fraudulent bankruptcy, and for extradition of fraudulent bankrupts.¹¹¹

The Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869 contains the following provisions as to trade bankruptcies, viz.:—

“Art. 6. La faillite d'un Français ayant un établissement de commerce en Suisse pourra être prononcée par le tribunal de la résidence en Suisse, et réciproquement, celle d'un Suisse ayant un établissement de commerce en France pourra être prononcée par le tribunal de sa résidence en France.

“La production du jugement de faillite dans l'autre pays donnera au syndic ou représentant de la masse après, toutefois, que le jugement aura été déclaré exécutoire conformément aux règles établies en l'article 16 ci-après, le droit de réclamer l'application de la faillite aux biens meubles et immeubles que le failli possèdera dans ce pays.

“En ce cas le syndic pourra poursuivre contre les débiteurs le remboursement des créances dues au failli; il poursuivra également en se conformant aux lois du pays de leur situation, la vente des biens meubles et immeubles appartenant au failli.

“Le prix des biens meubles et les sommes et créances recouvrées par le the bankrupt estate. The question of the arrestment has by that time been disposed of, and the only further matter for consideration is the representation of the creditors, and the organisation of that representation. Provisions like that of § 124 of the German Bankruptcy Ordinance, that the validity of legal transactions of the trustee in questions with third parties is not to be affected by the want of the ratification required by the ordinance, can only be of force in the country that makes them. The security of commerce does not demand that they should be extended to foreign bankruptcies. Any one who deals with a foreign trustee is warned to inform himself of his powers. This is quite a different case from the case of foreigners who are minor by their own law, but major by ours, doing business in our country.

¹¹¹ For a French translation, see Bard, p. 342, and Asser-Rivier, pp. 238, 239.

syndic dans le pays d'origine du failli seront joints à l'actif de la masse chirographaire du lieu de la faillite et partagés avec cet actif, sans distinction de nationalité entre tous les créanciers conformément à la loi du lieu de la faillite. Quant aux prix des immeubles, la distribution entre les ayant droit sera régie par la loi du pays de leur situation; en conséquence, les créanciers français ou suisses qui se seront conformés aux lois du pays de la situation des immeubles pour la conservation de leurs droits de privilège ou d'hypothèque sur les dits immeubles, seront, sans distinction de nationalité, colloqués sur le prix des biens, au rang que leur appartiendra d'après la loi du pays de la situation des dits immeubles.

"Art. 7. Les actions en dommage, restitution, rapport, nullité et autres, qui, par suite d'un jugement déclaratif de faillite ou d'un jugement reportant l'ouverture de faillite à une époque autre que celle primitivement fixée, ou pour toute autre cause, viendraient à être exercées contre des créanciers ou des tiers, seront portées devant le tribunal du domicile du défendeur, à moins que la contestation ne porte sur un immeuble ou un droit réel et immobilier.

"Art. 8. En cas de concordat, l'abandon fait par le débiteur failli des biens situés dans son pays d'origine et toutes les stipulations produiront par la production du jugement d'homologation déclaré exécutoire conformément à l'art. 16, tous les effets qu'il aurait dans le pays de la faillite.

"Art. 9. La faillite d'un étranger établi, soit en Suisse soit en France, et qui aura des créanciers suisses et français et des biens situés en Suisse et en France, sera, si elle est déclarée dans l'un des deux pays, soumise aux dispositions des articles 7 and 8."

Art. 16 prescribes the requirements of the documentary evidence that must be produced when a demand for exequatur is made. It is then provided: "Sur la représentation de ces pièces, il sera statué sur la demande d'exécution . . . il ne sera statué qu'après qu'il aura été adressé à la partie contre laquelle l'exécution est poursuivie une notification indiquant le jour et l'heure ou il sera prononcée sur la demande."

Art. 17 provides that the court to which application for an exequatur is made shall only refuse it in the following cases, viz.:—

- "1. Si la décision émane d'une juridiction incompétente;
- "2. Si elle a été rendue sans que les parties aient été dûment citées et légalement représentées, ou défailtantes;
- "3. Si les règles du droit public, ou les intérêts de l'ordre public du pays ou l'exécution est demandée s'opposent à ce que la décision de la juridiction étrangère y reçoive son exécution." This section contains a provision for appeal against the judgment on the application for execution.

It cannot be said that these provisions contain an adequate and exhaustive system for the regulation of international bankruptcy law. Still less was that the case with the German statute of 1869, §§ 13-18, which have been repealed by the introduction of a common law of bankruptcy for all Germany. The 13th section of that statute secured the operation of an award of bankruptcy in the whole of the territory of the federation, and § 14 ordained that all property found in other States of the federation should be surrendered to the court of the sequestration, under reservation of separate sequestrations that might be awarded under the lex rei sitæ. Quoad ultra the sections referred to did no more than protect the interests of persons holding real rights.

These provisions will not be any guide to States which are less closely connected. Before we could introduce in the North German Federation, and subsequently in the German Empire, an uniform system of auxiliary procedure, which should work with certainty and with undeniable advantage to those concerned, we had to overcome many difficulties, which would not have been so easily disposed of if the States, or some of them, had been non-German.

I. LIMITS OF THE TERRITORY OF THE STATE IN QUESTIONS OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW. (NARROW WATERS. INLAND LAKES.)

INTRODUCTION. EXERCISE OF VOLUNTARY JURISDICTION ACCORDING TO PAPPAFAVA.

§ 502. Every one knows that it is asserted that the territory of a State stretches from the shore into the sea as far as a cannon-shot will carry. The range of a cannon is taken to be three miles, which does not of course correspond with the actual range of modern cannon.¹

The question is, is this strip of sea along the coast of each country to be regarded as part of the territory of the State in matters of private law, or is that extension of the limits of the territorial sovereignty only good for certain other relations? If the former were true, then all merchant vessels, which have not the privilege of extra-territoriality, would be subject to the private law of the country to which the coast belonged, and to its jurisdiction, and, we may add, to its criminal law to this effect, that everything which might take place on board of them must be regarded as if it had taken place within the territory of the State. In certain circumstances, the question is of no small practical importance. While it is on the high seas, the ship counts as part of the territory of the State whose flag it carries, and the law of the flag is the lex loci actus for everything that takes place on board. But if our question is answered in the affirmative, we should have to affirm that all this underwent a fundamental change, the moment that the ship crossed the imaginary three-mile line.

Pappafava (J. xiv. p. 441 and p. 570) is the most recent writer on this subject. No doubt his main object was to establish that a notary of the country bordering on the sea may validly do official acts even on board of foreign trading ships within this zone, and in particular may execute instruments. But in all this discussion he does not once allude to the very obvious doubt, whether the sovereign authority of that State may perhaps not be a complete and absolute right, but may be restricted to the assertion and protection of certain specified rights and interests. Pappafava (see especially p. 446) seems simply to think that, because a cannon-shot may be fired over three marine miles, we must on that account hold that the State bordered by the sea has complete sovereignty for that distance, just as if the sea with its restless stormy waters were a part of the dry land. The question of the extra-territoriality of warships is the only question on which he bestows closer scrutiny. I have no occasion to deny that right of extra-territoriality.

THE ENGLISH TERRITORIAL WATERS ACT OF 1878.

§ 503. The whole foundation on which Pappafava builds, as if it were safe from all uncertainty,² seems open to very serious doubt, as the proceedings in connection with the English Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act of 1878 [41 and 42 Vict. c. 73] have shown. In the year 1876, the German steamer Franconia came into collision with the English steamer Strathelyde off Dover, within the three-mile limit, and a passenger on board the Strathelyde was killed. The captain of the German vessel was in the Central Criminal Court sentenced to be punished for manslaughter, but the Court of Queen's Bench held that the jurisdiction of the British Crown had not been shown to extend to the case in hand. Hence the statute which we have cited.

It declared that British courts had jurisdiction to punish all offences committed within the "territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions," i.e. "any part of the open sea within one marine league of the coast measured from low-water mark," irrespective of whether the offender is or is not a subject of Her Majesty, and although the offence may have been committed on board or by means of a foreign ship. Proceedings are not to be instituted in the United Kingdom for the punishment of an offender who is not a British subject, except with the consent of one of the Principal Secretaries of State, or in any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, except with the leave of the Governor.

This statute has excited much attention, and raised much criticism in England itself, as well as in other countries. Most of the lawyers of the Crown, and among them Sir R. Phillimore, have pronounced decidedly against it. But we find no discussion of it on the ground of principle. Substantially the whole discussion consists in pointing out that this or that important result of the statute is unsound or unjust, and, of course, there has been no lack of citation of authorities, although on this subject the authorities generally go to work with a set of rules which are as arbitrary as the exceptions which they make to these rules, and are not remarkable for distinctness. We hear constantly of "territorial" or "proprietary" waters, but never get a definition of these terms: we find these waters assimilated to harbours, and an endeavour made to escape from the awkward consequence of such an assimilation, viz. that ships merely passing over these waters must for all intents and purposes be subject, with all that in them is, to the sovereign authority, the laws, and the jurisdiction of the State, along the borders of which these waters lie. The expressions used by some writers seem to make the question depend on whether the ship is in motion or not, as if this circumstance could really affect the rights of sovereignty.³

² See on this point Westlake, Rev. x. p. 548; the thorough critical observations of Perels, p. 86. So, too, Stoerk (v. Holtzendorff's Handbuch, ii. p. 465).

The introduction, too, of the brocard which is so well known, but is not perhaps universally obeyed, viz. "respect au malheur," is quite superfluous. This maxim forbids the institution of any process against shipwrecked persons, who have at some earlier period committed crimes against the maritime State on the coasts of which they are cast, although a process would certainly be instituted against them if they had been given up by way of extradition, or had come of their own free will into the territory of the State.⁴ But the attitude of the criminal law towards persons reaching the country in such circumstances, in consequence of offences previously committed against that country, has absolutely nothing to do with the question of jurisdiction over ships which are still at sea.

THE RULING PRINCIPLE. THE RIGHT OF THE MARITIME STATE NOT A COMPLETE SOVEREIGN RIGHT.

§ 504. Let us try to discuss the matter on principle. The sovereign power of a State, if it is to be placed beyond question, must rest on the possibility of actual mastery or dominion. Can we say that this exists as regards the territorial waters? The ordinary answer is "Yes," because these waters are within cannon range. But as a matter of fact, so long as the shores of a country are not bristling uninterruptedly with cannon, cannon-shots can only be fired at spots of particular importance here and there along the shore. Even if there were cannon everywhere, the dominion which the State would have to undertake to exercise in conjunction with the stormy waves of the ocean, would never amount to the same thing as the dominion which the State exercises quietly on dry land. How would the State, e.g. manage to prevent this three—or perhaps five—mile space being constantly trespassed on by ships? and even if they were willing to ask submissively for leave, like land travellers, who may be searched and examined at the frontier by customs and police officers, would the ocean, which drives the strongest ships about like nut-shells, obey any such “thus far and no further” paper arrangement? Sovereignty, however, is something more than a right; it also involves duties. Can the State discharge its duty of protecting persons and property on its territorial waters, as it can on shore? Are its police and constabulary ready at any moment, so soon as a ship crosses the three-mile line, to leap upon her, and to correct, if necessary, any disorder on board? Are there judges and notaries always prepared to see contracts and wills executed on board? There is no doubt that the answer to these questions is “No.”

³ Cf. in this connection Harburger's sound observations. (Der strafrechtliche Begriff Inland und seine Beziehungen zum Völker- und Staatsrecht, Nordlingen 1882, p. 18.) Stoerk, in Holtzendorff's Handbuch, ii. p. 467, note 7, takes the same view.

Read literally, Phillimore, too, i. § 350, seems to attach importance to whether the ship is "lying" in a harbour or in territorial waters.

⁴ See, e.g. Heffter, § 79, v. : "Every foreign vessel, which enters the harbours or proprietary waters of a State, becomes subject to the maritime police, the maritime tolls or duties, and the jurisdiction of that country. Ships on board of which are foreign sovereigns or their representatives, if the ships are dedicated to their use exclusively, foreign ships of war, and ships which are simply in transit, or whose captains are driven to land in any territory against their will, are not subject either to duties or to the jurisdiction of that country."

It is plain that, both as regards rights and as regards duties, the necessary foundation for the complete dominion of the sea-coast State over its territorial waters is wanting. But would it serve any useful purpose to assume the existence of such a dominion? This question, too, must in our view be answered most distinctly in the negative. It is much nearer the truth to say that any such notion, whether in theory or carried out in practice, would be mischievous.

On the high seas, the ship, as we have said, is counted part of the territory the flag of which it carries. Thus we know, in any questions as to the lex loci actus that may arise, to what private and to what criminal law we have to look, and to some extent, too, what is the authority that must control the civil or the criminal procedure that may be necessary. It would be absolutely irreconcilable with legal security, we might almost say ridiculous, to affirm the claim of the maritime State that, every time a ship crossed the imaginary line, with a few turns of the screw, or with a strong blast of wind, all this should be changed. What interest has the maritime State in any legal occurrences on board a ship, the sails or the smoke of which one can barely see from the shore as a white or a black spot? If there were dominion in the full sense, it would follow that the maritime State could, at any moment when it desired to do so, prevent the passage of ships of foreign nationality, just as a State has not unfrequently put forward a claim to prevent inconvenient or, as the expression now-a-days generally is, “troublesome” (lästige) persons from entering on its land territory, and to turn them out of it if they have entered.

It would be useless to cite authorities to prove that the maritime State has no such prohibitory right as regards territorial waters. Indeed, on the contrary, it is certain that narrow seas in which, as a matter of fact, the passage of trading vessels can at any moment be barred, are as a matter of right open to general maritime traffic. We are always confronted by the difficulty of justifying such exceptions as that, if we seek to set up any theory of a complete dominion as the theory on which to proceed, and we are continually in danger of drawing inferences from that assertion of sovereignty, which are in the highest degree injurious to the common interests of all in uninterrupted passage by sea.⁵

Let us then be done with this figure of the imagination,⁶ since we have seen that there is no legal foundation for the alleged sovereignty of the maritime State over its territorial waters. There is no such thing as sovereignty over any part of the open sea, or any part of the sea about the coasts of a country.⁷ But the maritime State has a right to legislate, a right of police, and a right of jurisdiction in these territorial waters, so far as this is indispensable for its own security, and at the same time compatible with the common use of the sea by all nations, or is established by undoubted usage. The two alternatives will not perhaps give different results, except perhaps in some quite special circumstances, in which, as a general rule, international treaties are called on to play a part.

LOGICAL INFERENCES. RIGHT OF FREE PASSAGE. INCIDENTS PASSING EXCLUSIVELY ON BOARD OF SHIPS. CRIMINAL OFFENCES WITH DIRECT RESULTS BEYOND THE LIMITS OF THE SHIP. MARITIME COLLISIONS.

§ 505. There is no need, then, for laying down any special rules of law to establish a right of free passage for the ships of all nations over territorial waters. These rules of law are, so far as their contents go, perfectly correctly laid down by Bluntschli (Völkerr. § 322). But, if they are represented as constituting exemptions from the territorial sovereignty, they are open to obvious attack.

Putting aside, then, the right of maintaining establishments and enforcing rules to prevent surprises by an armed enemy or possible violations of neutrality, matters which lie altogether outside the territory of private international law, we require nothing more, in order to ensure the safety of the country that claims those territorial waters, than a right to maintain a coast police to protect navigation in general, and navigation by the ships

⁵ Thus, the Lord Chancellor of England of the day [Lord Cairns] in introducing the Territorial Waters Act in the House of Lords, enunciated the theory, that the passage of ships in the channel along the English coast was a mere "concession" by England, which of course might be recalled or restricted at any time, if it began to be inconvenient. On the other side, see the excellent remarks of Perels (p. 87), and Geffcken, note 7, on Heffter, § 75.

⁷ Nothing can depend on what a cannon's range is, so long as the water continues to be a liquid element. Wharton, § 818, truly says, "If . . . we speak of municipal control, so as to give jurisdiction over all matters, three miles is as unreasonable as ten miles."

of that nation in particular, to watch the fisheries, and to look after the customs.

Criminal acts, which are done altogether within the limits of any particular ship, and still more certainly incidents connected with matters of private law which happen there, have nothing to do with the security of the country that claims the territorial waters.⁸ It is far better that they should be subject to the laws and to the jurisdiction of the State from which the ship hails,⁹ except in so far as the law and jurisdiction of the country to which the parties concerned belong call for application. Accordingly, e.g. officials, and persons commissioned by the country of the flag, may act as officials of that country in matters of voluntary jurisdiction within the three-mile limit of another State. An instance of this would occur, if the State to which the ship belongs should commission ship-captains to perform certain functions proper to officials who are charged with the superintendence of matters of status, or, under certain safeguards, should allow them to execute testaments, if circumstances make it necessary that some such official acts should be performed in the course of a voyage.¹⁰

Again, it would be unjust to apply the law of the State bounded by the territorial waters as a territorial law to individuals who leave the ship in a boat,¹¹ or who perhaps have been thrown up on a sandbank left temporarily dry by the waves. The impossibility of making any sharp demarcation of the zone that belongs to the coast is against an extension of the territorial law of the State which abuts upon the coast. If we attempt any such extension, we lose all certainty as to the application of the law, particularly as on many coasts the shore is continually shifting. The exclusive application of the personal law of the individuals concerned affords far more satisfactory and certain results.

But it is altogether different in the case of incidents which are in close connection with matters of coast police. In such matters, the maritime State whose coasts are in question is entitled to demand that even foreign ships should be subject to regulations which it has established. It could not otherwise maintain those regulations, and a subjection of this kind is a matter which serves the general interest. Such a subjection may be directly asserted by force, as it may be by criminal law and civil responsibility. The application of the criminal law in itself is no part of our subject: it is necessary, however, since liability in damages and criminal liability to a certain extent run parallel to each other, to test a little further the

¹⁰ If maritime commerce extends further, this might be a very useful arrangement in big ships.

¹¹ Even in matters of public law, boats should be regarded as pertinents of the ship.

applicability of the criminal law. All that we need note is, that no State hesitates to subject mariners of foreign nations on its coasts to the penal provisions, the object of which is to protect navigation, establishments along the shore, submarine cables, etc.;¹² but, on the other hand, by reason of the strict interpretation to which criminal law from its very nature must be subjected, it is by no means a matter of course that the criminal law of the territory should be applied to the seas round the coast. On the other hand, it cannot be said to be incompetent to apply even the general criminal law to foreigners, who have, in breaking some of these police regulations, at the same time committed some offence against the general law: e.g. in the case in which a foreign shipmaster, transgressing the rule of the road laid down for the territorial waters, rams another vessel, sinks her, and so incurs a charge of manslaughter in consequence of having caused the death of some of the crew. The application of the general criminal law in such cases is simply a supplementary sanction in the more serious cases of a breach of the police regulations in the seas near the coast of any country. Indeed, by public law, the State will be entitled to visit any injuries done to persons or property according to its general criminal law, even although there may be no offence against any special maritime regulations or marine police, provided there be a neglect to observe precautions necessary for security in the maritime belt surrounding the country: such would be the case of a foreigner murdering some one on a sandbank, or of a person being wounded or killed on board one ship by a shot fired from another ship, a foreigner. The maintenance of public and general security may be reckoned a part of the police of the adjoining coast. But delicts, which do not encroach upon the security of the public, cannot be so reckoned. If they were prosecuted according to the law of the adjoining country, the result might be that injustice might be done both substantively and as a matter of procedure, e.g. arrests might be made which could not be justified and which would involve hardships, and then international conflicts might arise. In addition, it is only fair that, where it is intended to extend the criminal law of the territory to the territorial waters, this should be distinctly expressed in the statute.¹³ This is a rule which is generally followed in English practice,¹⁴ and the legislation of the German Empire has hitherto followed the same model. Accordingly, it cannot be said to be a matter of course that the criminal law should extend to the territorial waters.

But it may be at once conceded, as warranted by the nature of the case,

¹² See, however, art. 8 of the international treaty for protection of submarine telegraph cables. By its provisions the State to which the ship or the individual, as the case may be, who does the damage, is competent to punish it. [This treaty is incorporated in 48 and 49 Vict. c. 49.]

¹³ See Harburger, p. 20.

¹⁴ See e.g. Merchant Shipping Acts (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, § 527; 36 and 37 Vict. c. 85). Foreign Enlistment Act (33 and 34 Vict. c. 90). See German Ordinance of 14th Aug. 1876 ad. init.

that rules of the civil municipal law dealing with damages in case of a collision, with salvage and with pilots, including compulsory pilots, may be applied within these waters. It is a charity to commerce to apply all along the coast one uniform law for the protection of ships of different nationalities, and also for defining their duties. The Institute of International Law without any difficulty adopted, in its resolutions of 1888 on abordage maritime, i., the rule that in territorial waters the law of the adjoining territory should rule.¹⁵

The application of the law of the flag, or flags, as the case may be, in the case of collisions on the high seas (supra, p. 721), is a last resort, which involves many inconsistencies. To appeal within territorial waters to the law of the flag, which might in the most unfair fashion reject all claims of damages, would be simply to imperil the most valuable property, and might cost the lives of many men. If the adjoining State could not apply its own territorial law, it would have to look on with folded arms while foreign steamers, without fear of consequences, sank many of its fishing boats and coasters.

VOLUNTARY JURISDICTION ON BOARD OF MERCHANT SHIPS WITHIN TERRITORIAL WATERS.

§ 506. Although, however, it is in our view quite incompetent to apply the territorial law of the adjoining State to occurrences which take place entirely on board of a foreign ship which happens to be within the territorial waters,¹⁶ still we must recognise an exception in the case, in which

¹⁶ From what has been said in the text, we may deduce the judgment which public law should pass on the English "Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act," described in England by Bowyer, in Germany by Perels, as contrary to the first principles of public law, and as an excess of jurisdiction. Stoerk (v. Holtzendorff's Handbuch, ii. p. 451) has recently defended it. In our opinion, there is undoubtedly on the principles of public law an excess of jurisdiction in subjecting to the law of England acts which pass entirely on board of a foreign ship and have no physical effect beyond it, even although it may be required that an English Secretary of State should approve of any procedure that is to be taken. This was the point at which Bowyer chiefly directed his attack. On the other hand, on principles of public law, no objection could be raised against the exercise of the jurisdiction of an English court over the Franconia, because the manslaughter there was caused by the collision of the Franconia with another ship. (The question whether it needed an express extension of English jurisdiction by an English statute to cover the case, is not a matter of public law; it is a simple question of English municipal law.) The statute was to some extent a matter of necessity, and justified as such, in view of the great traffic on the English coast, and the special danger in which small English coasters stand. But it goes beyond the mark. Stoerk thinks that a maritime State may assert its authority, wherever in its opinion the sphere of its interests is affected. This proposition, which turns interest into a right, and that, too, when the interest is asserted ex parte, is one to which I cannot assent.

The consciousness of an excess of jurisdiction is, however, betrayed by the provision of the English statute that a Secretary or Governor should give his sanction, as a condition precedent some official or notary of the maritime State is required to do some act of voluntary jurisdiction on board a foreign vessel. The matter here is not one of compulsory subjection; it is simply an act of philanthropic charity, as, for instance, where a person lying seriously ill on board ship desires to execute his will in regular form. It seems to be impossible that there can be any substantial objections to the formal validity of such an act regularly performed by an officer of the maritime State, the act being in substance simply a privileged attestation. We cannot help thinking that, according to general principles of public law, the maritime State must be competent to take up the nobile officium of giving assistance in legal formalities where its assistance is asked. Thus, although by another route, we come to the same result, as Pappafava attained through his assertion of the complete sovereignty of the maritime State, to the proposition, namely, that notaries, and generally officials of voluntary jurisdiction, can validly execute the duties of their office on board foreign ships in territorial waters, if the parties interested ask them to do so.

There is no difficulty in subjecting to the territorial law occurrences which take place in estuaries, in waters which are truly territorial, or in harbours. The parties concerned can in such cases not have much doubt that they are in the territory of a particular and definite territorial sovereignty.

RESULT, IF THE PLACE OF THE SHIP AT THE TIME OF THE EVENT IN QUESTION CANNOT BE EXACTLY ASCERTAINED.

§ 507. In the case of any real doubt, the decision must be against the subjection of a ship to a territorial sovereignty. The hull of the ship presents at once to the mind the notion of the subjection of that ship to the law of her flag: we cannot regard that subjection as removed, unless some sensible and unmistakable cause for its removal has intervened. Any other determination of the question would involve legal relations in uncertainty and confusion.

LANDLOCKED LAKES.

§ 508. On landlocked lakes, surrounded by several States, the same principles as regulate the application of territorial law on dry land must rule, in so far as there are distinct boundary lines recognised. The well-known rule for fixing these is that the centre of the lake determines them, just as is the case with rivers. But if there is a condominium of the surrounding to any prosecution. There is no doubt that that is a sort of safety-valve for unpleasant questions. But if the Statesman makes a mistake, or if the national spirit is excited, the matter will be made all the worse for the introduction of a political authority.

Renault (J. vi. p. 242) is in substantial agreement with the criticism given above. See, too, Wharton, § 818.

States,¹⁷ we are then forced to consider a ship in matters of civil law, while she is on a voyage on the lake, as a part of the territory from which she hails, just as we do in the case of a ship upon the high seas.¹⁸

As regards contentious jurisdiction, there is something to be said for the rule of priority being allowed to prevail,¹⁹ if, e.g. there is a question about arresting a ship. But this expedient seems not to be desirable, because it might very easily be abused, and would be exceedingly apt to lead to a small warfare of jurisdictions.

We can hardly at present say that there is any legal interest in the question whether the air, on the analogy of the Roman theory of private property, is to be regarded in infinitum as the property of the different territories which it covers, and is only invested with an international character in so far as it is above the surface of the sea.²⁰ It is even more impossible to exercise dominion in the air above a certain height than it is to do so over the ocean.²¹

NOTE BBB ON §§ 502-508. TERRITORIAL WATERS.

[The whole law of England on the subject of sovereignty or jurisdiction within the three-mile limit will be found discussed in the case of the Franconia (The Queen v. Keyn, 1876, L.R. 2, Ex. Div. 63, referred to supra, p. 1066). The discussion of the matter there is so complete that it would be impossible to add to it.

An interesting case was recently decided in the Scots courts (Lord Advocate v. Clyde Navigation Trs. 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xix. p. 174). There the Trustees of the Clyde were in use to deposit the dredgings taken from the navigable channel of the river in Loch Long, an arm of the sea, running up a distance of twenty-four miles into the Argyllshire

¹⁸ This is the footing on which the agreement of Austria, Baden, Bavaria, Switzerland and Würtemberg in 1880, as to the Bodensee, proceeds. It provides for registration of births and deaths which take place on shipboard, and not in the immediate neighbourhood of the shore, with the authorities of the parish or district (Bezirk) in which the ship or other conveyance generally lies. On practical grounds, Rettich prefers to lay down that priority must rule: the official of the State to whose knowledge the fact first comes shall register. It is possible, however, that such a rule would leave individual caprice too much to say in the matter.

²⁰ In criminal law, with which we have nothing to do in this place, the matter stands differently.

coast, and averaging a little more than a mile in breadth. The Crown raised an action to compel them to put an end to the practice. In this action, it was not alleged that any damage was suffered by fishing interests or by navigation, or that the operations resulted in discomfort or nuisance to any one resident on shore. The Crown relied solely on a proprietary right which it alleged it possessed in the solum, even although the solum at the place was constantly covered by many fathoms of water. It will be observed that the locus was not on an open sea-coast, but was landlocked: on this fact the Lord Ordinary (Lord Kyllachy) proceeded, and held that the solum and the water covering it belonged in property to the Crown, who were thus entitled to prevent the defenders from doing what they did as being trespassers. On appeal, the court affirmed the judgment, holding that whether the Crown's right were a trust merely, or a right of property, they had a right sufficient to warrant them in stopping the defenders' operations without any allegations of damage to the public purposes for which the water was available. The Lord Justice Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner expressed an opinion that the right was one of property. Lord Young, too, along with Lord Kyllachy, expressed an opinion that the solum of the open sea-coast, out to the three-mile limit, also belonged to the Crown in property.]

II. EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY OF AMBASSADORS IN MATTERS OF PRIVATE LAW, AND IN QUESTIONS OF PROCESS.

INTRODUCTORY. ERRONEOUS ATTEMPTS TO FIND THE FOUNDATION FOR THE PLEA OF EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY.

§ 509. The sovereign rights of the State, which is represented by the person who claims the privileges of extra-territoriality, are often put forward as the foundation on which these privileges depend. These consist principally in what is to a certain extent undoubtedly conceded, viz. a right to be exempt from the jurisdiction and the compulsitors—we use general and indefinite expression in the meantime—of the State in which the person in question is staying. It is said that one sovereign power cannot be subject to the other, and by consequence neither can its representative.¹

But this involves a confusion of ideas. It is quite true that a sovereign power which was subject to another would cease to be sovereign, and that no one State can command another to do or not to do or to suffer anything: just as little can one State sit in judgment upon another. We shall use this proposition later, when we come to enquire whether action can be raised in the courts of one State against the ruler of another. But we must not omit to notice that, in questioning the privileges of extra-territoriality, it is not proposed to submit to the power of one State the government of the other State quoad its sovereign and essential functions as a government. The privilege claimed is, on the contrary, a right to withdraw from the operation of the sovereign power of one State, the government of the other, not in its character as a government, but as invested with certain subsidiary relations of private law.² This comes out plainly, if we look for a moment at the position of the government or sovereign in its or his own country. The government does not cease to be sovereign, because in all relations of private law it is subject to the courts of law. To go further, the chief power of the State would not cease to be a sovereign power, even if the person who wore it should be made answerable to the criminal law. In the Middle Ages, the German king could in this way be made personally answerable. The subjection of the State in all its relations of private law to the courts of the country is, according to Germanic legal theories, no concession that may be recalled at pleasure, but stands in close connection with the whole conception of legal order and of the constitution of the State.

IMMUNITY OF THE AMBASSADOR AS THE SOURCE OF THE PRIVILEGE OF EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY.

§ 510. There is no doubt that, as a matter of history, the whole doctrine of extra-territoriality sprang from the immediate necessities of public intercourse with other peoples. Before there were any distinct conceptions of sovereignty or of the State as a person, it was often necessary to enter into negotiations with other peoples. It is not the person of the king, in cases where there is one, that stands forward as entitled to special international respect; it is his ambassadors, who, even in ancient times, are accorded immunity from all harm.³ Whatever mention there may be in this connection of the king or of the people who sent the ambassador, occurs merely in this way, that the king or the people is described as the avenger of any evil that may befall the ambassador, or so describes himself or itself. The king or the people will look upon a wrong done to the envoy, and will follow it up as if it had been done to the king himself or to the people. The representative relation is therefore not the source of the immunity, but its sanction. Accordingly, in ancient times we never hear of the immunity of a foreign ruler as such; we only hear of it if he is at the same time an ambassador, or if he has entered the foreign territory as an invited guest, a position which in fact is not easily distinguished from that of an ambassador.

² Thus, for instance, the whole discussion given by Beach-Lawrence, iii. p. 421, is dominated by a confusion between the matter of privileges, and the question whether jurisdiction against another State or a foreign sovereign can be founded ratione materiae.

³ So late as the 17th century, when the privilege of ambassadors had been long established, it was not held altogether inadmissible to arrest foreign princes. See Pufendorf, De jure nat. et gentium, viii. 4, § 21. He concedes extra-territoriality to the foreign sovereign, but remarks that he recommends no prince to set foot on foreign territory without leave first asked and obtained. See also Bynkershoek, c. iii. Chr. Wolff, too (Jus gentium, § 1059), has no idea that the extra-territoriality of sovereigns is necessary as a legal conception. He thinks it is merely the fruit of an implied or express bargain; the king is only a king in his own country, abroad he is a private gentleman. The constructions put upon the law of nature reflect the ideas of the time and of tradition. It is turning the historical order of development upside down, if we rest the privilege of ambassadors on that of sovereigns.

The necessity of holding one who is treating with another nation inviolable needs no demonstration. If he has reason to fear direct violence, he will hesitate about coming at all, and if he cannot negotiate in perfect freedom, i.e. without fear of violence, then any promise given by him will not bind the sovereign whom he represents.

But in old days ambassadors, besides safe conduct, were allowed exemption from all criminal and civil execution. Foreigners generally in those days were not subject to the legal system which ruled in the case of natives. That first came to be the case in the later days of the Roman Empire, when that empire had put on the character of a world-wide dominion, embracing peoples of the most different types. Revenge and "Help yourself" were the rules that prevailed against foreigners. Such a direct use of force, which might, no doubt, have afterwards to be justified by the person who employed it, was inadmissible in the case of ambassadors because of their safe conduct. The true problem of extra-territoriality could not arise until rights and duties founded on territorial legal systems were made, as a general rule, applicable alike to foreigners and natives. That is the case in our time, but it was not so in ancient times. It was not always so easy as it now is to distinguish in civilised States between purely capricious acts and acts proceeding from a settled jurisdiction, for there were in those times no established judges; the sovereign could in his own person enunciate the law. If the ambassador was to have a safe conduct on which he could rely, it was necessary that his office should protect him from the exercise of all jurisdictions. All privileges have a natural tendency to extend themselves. The privilege of an ambassador, in order to ensure complete protection, must extend to his establishment of servants, and to the house which he occupied. It was easy to maintain, that for greater security a certain precinct must be included, and even that persons who did not belong to the embassy might at times be rescued from the territorial jurisdiction, by the protection of the privilege accorded to the ambassador's house. The ambassador's master, of course, saw with satisfaction the extension of the privileges of his representative: in certain circumstances they constituted a valuable foothold for interferences with the internal affairs of the other State. Great princes could secure a hearing for the demands of their ambassadors, and then others could appeal to the precedents thus created. Thus embassies began to constitute States within States. Theory had to supply a name that would cover all their privileges, and Hugo Grotius (ii. 18, § 4, No. 5) hit upon the fiction, as he himself expressed it, that the ambassador lived extra territorium.

GROTIUS, BYNKERSHOEK, VATTTEL.

§ 511. Grotius, however, was far from taking this fiction as the groundwork of his discussions; it merely serves him as a comprehensive and graphic form of expression. We find that he, like Bynkershoek, who, as is well known, has given us a very thorough, probably the best dissertation on the extra-territoriality of ambassadors, has other sources from which to deduce the exemption of ambassadors from the jurisdiction of the territory in which they are resident. Grotius finds a foundation for exemption from criminal jurisdiction by referring to the ease with which an ambassador might be suspected of having committed a crime, and the performance of the duties of his office might be thereby made impossible for him; exemption from civil jurisdiction he finds in the argument that it is impossible to poind moveables, which are, as it were, an accessio of the person, because, in order to ensure the most complete security to the ambassador, all compulsitors must be kept far from his person.

But from his concluding proposition in § 9, we see that Grotius holds it to be possible to do diligence upon immoveables, if the ambassador should happen to have any within the territory. But it is by no means intended to approve of any attachment of the house in which the ambassador lodges: that would be a very serious attack upon the person: Grotius seems rather to contemplate the case of the ambassador possessing other real property in the country.

Bynkershoek goes so far as to maintain that a man is only subject to jurisdiction by reason of domicile and possession of property within it. But an ambassador cannot, of course, have a domicile in the country. He thinks, however, that an ambassador will be subjected to the jurisdiction by reason of owning immoveable property in the country: the same result may be effected by an arrestment of moveables, which are not directly connected with his person, or, as it might be better expressed, do not serve for his personal use. On this latter head Bynkershoek pursues an exhaustive enquiry. He finds special difficulties as regards money and outstanding debts. In so far as these are necessary for the support of the ambassador, Bynkershoek declares himself rightly in favour of immunity from arrestment, and he is also right in holding that, in cases of doubt, we must recognise such an immunity. On the other hand, he is indifferent as to the nature and origin of the debts for which claims are made against the ambassador. Even although the ambassador has carried on a trade, that does not subject him to the courts of the country to any greater extent (c. iv.): this proposition he defends in the teeth of a judgment of the Dutch court in 1721 (c. xiv.).

In truth, the whole of Bynkershoek's discussion rests on the distinction between jurisdiction and execution: according to the principles then recognised in civil procedure, jurisdiction was for the most part founded on the possibility of execution, and therefore Bynkershoek is not himself fully conscious of the distinction. For, on the one side, he recognises it as a leading principle (c. viii. § 2) that the same jurisdiction exactly may be used against an ambassador, as could be used against him if he did not happen to be in the country; on the other hand, again, he holds that jurisdiction can only be founded against foreigners by possession of real property and by arrestment (see c. ii. §§ 4 and 5), and that the latter, as had been determined by the Dutch court on 19th Dec. 1644, may be used against an ambassador, so long as no violence is done to his person (or, as Bynkershoek thinks, so long as no violence is done to his person or any force applied to property which serves the personal requirements of the ambassador). It is plain that this is a correct representation of Bynkershoek's theory, when we consider his view as to the citation of foreign princes, to whom he concedes the same privileges as to ambassadors (c. iv. § 4). In conformity with the practice of the higher courts of Holland, he finds no difficulty in citing a foreign prince, whose property has been laid under arrestment at the instance of a creditor, to answer in these courts. The case which he cites in § 5 proves that these courts, if they thought that there would be any difficulty in executing citation in the ordinary way, simply resorted to edictal citation.

Vattel, too (ii. ch. 8, §§ 110 et seq.), agrees with Bynkershoek on this question. He insists on the freedom of the person, and of everything which the ambassador requires or uses for his own support, from all kind of arrestment. But he at the same time describes it as a necessity (§ 114) that, if our ambassador carries on trade, he shall subject to the jurisdiction of the territory, in all his possessions of which he makes use in that trade, the exemption of his person being always maintained; further, the ambassador can claim no exemption as regards his landed property. Lastly, however, he says that the ambassador may voluntarily subject himself to the jurisdiction of the territory; that is the case in all processes in which he appears as pursuer.

[Lord Stair, I. i. ii, writing in 1681, recognises as part of the law of nations, and therefore obligatory, "the safety of ambassadors though more guilty of the common quarrel than the rest of the nations from whom they are sent; yet for common utility's sake, while they act in and conform to that capacity, they are safe; otherwise there could be no commerce, orderly indiction of war, or pacification."]

VIEWS OF THE MORE MODERN JURISTS: IMMUNITY FROM ALL JURISDICTIONS IN THE TERRITORY.

§ 512. In more recent times discussions as to the freedom of ambassadors from judicial compulsitors have become more superficial. The subject is one which can only be thoroughly treated by keeping in view both public law and the development of civil procedure. Most writers, however, who have concerned themselves with public law, have no familiarity with civil procedure. Bynkershoek was familiar with both subjects; then, again, he had exceptional opportunities of testing theory by the experience of actual practice, from the peculiar position which the Netherlands held in diplomatic intercourse during the second half of the 17th and up to the middle of the 18th century, enjoying as they did at the same time a system of legal administration which was as independent as it was scientific.

The superficiality we have mentioned shows itself specially in the confusion of actual jurisdiction with direct execution. Bynkershoek and Vattel laid stress on direct compulsitors and immunity from these: there is no doubt that, in accordance with the principles of civil procedure which then obtained, and with a view to the practical working out of the privileges of ambassadors in connection with these principles, they asserted an immunity from jurisdiction for ambassadors, in so far as jurisdiction required, as a precedent to its exercise, the use of the compulsitor of an arrestment, or the existence of a domicile, which of course no ambassador could have. Lawyers then began, with a superficial imitation of Bynkershoek and Vattel, to speak quite generally of exemption from jurisdiction,⁴ to disregard the real necessity of giving ambassadors the most complete freedom, in which we find the historical origin of their privileges, and to put the existence of the privilege in many cases on the fact that the ambassador represented the foreign sovereign, and that one sovereignty could not extend over another. We find, then, that the exceptions which are made from the immunity of the ambassador, in which therefore the jurisdiction of the State in which he is resident is recognised, are frequently entirely capricious, or are of such a character as must, if logically carried out, destroy the doctrine of immunity altogether. In such a state of affairs, we cannot wonder that some think themselves forced to declare that the inhabitants of the country are helpless to protect themselves against an ambassador, while others, on the other hand, throw the whole privilege overboard altogether, as an institution which is quite superfluous where there is a well-ordered administration of justice, and is besides mischievous and untenable.⁵ It is difficult to give a sufficiently clear idea of the confusion which prevails on this subject.⁶ It is peculiar,

⁴ Vattel no doubt (§ 113 ad init.) speaks in this tone. But his further argument shows that he does not by any means deny all territorial jurisdiction as against ambassadors.

⁶ Let us consider the following examples:—

Klüber, in his day well known and respected as an authority, says in § 209 of his Europaisches Völkerrecht: "His extra-territoriality gives him (the ambassador) freedom from all the police laws, and from the jurisdiction of the State in which he is residing as ambassador." We do not comprehend why the ambassador should enjoy an immunity from material laws. No proof of the assertion is given. Bynkershoek, who is naturally the first authority to whom appeal is made, says nothing of the kind. But this immunity, thus liberally given by Klüber on the one side, is taken back again, on the other side, by means of exceptions, to such an extent that we are obliged to ask, what remains? The first thing for consideration is police regulations: "Obedience to certain (which?) regulations of police, and particularly those, the object of which is to maintain public security (what regulations of police are there which have any other object?) are almost universally, by implication at least, unless we look for an explanation in the perfunctory study of Bynkershoek and even of Vattel, and in the failure to pay sufficient attention to the leading principles of the law of procedure, that not one among the more modern writers reproduces the principles of these two authors, which are so simple, and which yet satisfy so completely all real necessities, and applies them to the altered condition of modern rules of procedure.

made applicable to ambassadors." Thus it is laid down that the ambassador tacitly submits himself to police regulations, i.e. he is subject to them. What, then, is left of the immunity? The whole course of his discussion, in which one proposition takes back what its predecessor laid down, is almost ridiculous. This discussion, however, apparently serves to bolster up the false proposition (§ 203) from which Klüber tacitly sets out, viz. that the ambassador as the representative of his sovereign, is identified with the supreme power of the State.

Again, with reference to his immunity from civil jurisdiction, it is said that this "only belongs" to the ambassador "regarded as an ambassador." § 210 explains the meaning of this dark saying. The immunity does not apply to questions about immoveables, nor does it apply to chattels in the possession of the ambassador as a manufacturer, a trader, a landed proprietor, a manager of property belonging to foreigners, "and the like;" nor does it apply, if he is a subject of the State, to which he is accredited, "in some other respect" (what is the meaning of being a subject in some other respect?); nor if he has in some recognised fashion (?) challenged the jurisdiction of a court of the country which is not competent. (Is this to be done expressly or tacitly?) "In all these cases, the courts of the country may proceed against him according to their law, and may even arrest his property and his person (!) as the law allows. On the other hand, no arrestment can be used against him or his property, if, and in so far as, he falls to be considered simply as the ambassador of a foreign State." The meaning of this statement, in other words, is: for debts, such as an ambassador ordinarily contracts, expenditure on subsistence, or house-rent, he cannot be sued in the country, but if he contracts any other debts, he is responsible even with his person! A more meaningless privilege can hardly be imagined. The creditors who have the best claims to prompt payment in the territory, are refused all right to sue there; but other creditors can put an end to the personal freedom of the ambassador, in the event of his not paying them. Compare for a moment with these rules the provisions of the Roman law, with reference to jurisdiction against members of embassies from municipia. Of course, in Rome there were no questions of public law involved. But still the object in view was to allow these representatives of the municipia, while they remained in the capital, to discharge the duties of their office with as much freedom as possible. These persons were very properly secured an immunity from jurisdiction in all legal relations which were unconnected with their stay in Rome; but, on the other hand, they must submit to the law of Rome in Rome all debts which fell to be discharged there, in particular, debts relating to their lodging and maintenance in Rome (L. 2, §§ 3 and 4; L. 25, D. de judiciis, 5, 1; L. 3, de legationibus, 50, 7). The Roman law, therefore, in an analogous case, proceeded on exactly the opposite principle. Klüber, however, is driven to the absurd result which we have indicated, because he confuses the question of the origin of the debts with that of real compulsitors against the person of the envoy, and upon the articles which serve for his own personal uses.

Vesque v. Püttlingen (p. 147) concedes that extra-territorial persons must be free from any exercise of Austrian jurisdiction. But he proposes, again, to take a distinction between the public and the private relations of the person. (What does that mean? Of course, a foreign ambassador cannot be called to account in Austria for the exercise of his functions as an ambassador.) Then, again, the territorial jurisdiction claims a right to interfere, not merely in reference to real rights in immoveables, but also in all cases in which the ambassador has expressly submitted himself to the courts of the country, or "if he does acts to which either the character of these acts themselves or the constitution of the country has attached, as a consequence, that he shall be held to have submitted himself to the territorial law." But other persons, belonging to other countries, who have no claim to extra-territoriality, are not absolutely subject to the jurisdiction of Austria, but only in so far as that is involved in the character of their acts; if this be so, then, according to the last paragraph, the privilege

The double meaning of the word "jurisdiction" has contributed not a little to the general confusion of this subject: in using it we think now of the competency of a court to judge, now of its competency to put compulsitors directly in force. In English legal terminology especially the word "jurisdiction" implies not so much the competency of the court to decide, as the territory within which it can make direct use of its compulsitors.⁷ But, in the English law, that confusion is more easily explained, and is less mischievous in practice, because the competency of the court is closely bound up with its capacity to enforce its decrees. But in French law, and in the most modern German law of procedure, this connection has almost of extra-territoriality has no meaning at all. V. Püttlingen, however (§ 127), quite superfluously tells us that logic requires that, if a process has gone on against one who is entitled to extra-territoriality, then execution may be done against him according to the rules of the territorial law, and that even to the extent of poinding his furniture. But still, if the furniture happens to be in the extra-territorial residence or office, the consent of the ambassador must first be obtained. (The house is thus in itself invested with a high degree of extra-territoriality, a result which is hardly consistent, on the one hand, with the real jurisdiction which our author claims for the territorial State, or with the decision in a particular case reported by himself (p. 389, note 3), in accordance with which an ambassador may be removed by force from a house which he has hired.) Besides that, what is the meaning of diligence, one of the compulsitors of the law, if the person on whom diligence is to be done must first consent to it?

Slatin's article (J. xi. p. 329 and p. 463) comes to the same results, although they are somewhat better defined. In it, however, more importance is attached to the character of the things on which diligence is to be done. (See especially p. 466.)

On the other hand, Lorimer (i. p. 248) proposes to make a sharp distinction between the ambassador as such, and the ambassador as a private gentleman. In the former character, territorial jurisdiction will not touch him, although in the latter it will, if, e.g. the ambassador speculates. (Is there any juridical mark of distinction between the two classes of cases?) Lorimer thinks that Bynkershoek's lines of distinction tend in the same direction. We have already seen how far Lorimer was justified in holding any such opinion.

Stoerk (v. Holtzendorff, Handbuch, ii. p. 656, praes. p. 659) concedes generally to extra-territorial persons immunity from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are. On this account, the provisions of §§ 18 and 20 of the German constitution seem to him entirely sound, perhaps as the minimum of protection to be given to an ambassador. Stoerk traces (p. 657) the immunity to the necessity of allowing the authority of the foreign State to operate in our territory, a necessity which springs from the requirements of commerce. I do not, however, understand in what sense the authority of the foreign State can be said to operate in our territory through the communications made to our Government by the foreign ambassador (and that is an essential part of his duties), or because that ambassador puts his visé on passports which are to operate within the territory of the State which he represents. I hold that it is only in special and exceptional cases that the acts of an extra-territorial person involve the actings of a foreign sovereign authority within our territory.

In these paragraphs of the German constitution, the provision is simply this: "§ 18. The jurisdiction of this country does not cover the chiefs and members of missions accredited to the German Empire. In the same way, where they are accredited to one of the States of the Empire, they are not subject to its jurisdiction."

"§ 20. Sections 18 and 19 do not touch the provisions as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts in questions of real right arising in civil suits." (§ 19 deals with the members of the ambassador's family and his servants. § 201 of the appendix to the General Prussian Ordinance on Procedure used more correct language as to the incompetency of arrestments against foreign ambassadors accredited to the Prussian Court.)

altogether disappeared, and accordingly the confusion is often all the more prejudicial and all the more bewildering.⁸

THE TRUE PRINCIPLE: THE IMMUNITY AN IMMUNITY FROM COMPULSITORS ONLY (imperium). INDIRECT EFFECT OF THIS ON JURISDICTION IN THE NARROWER SENSE; NO DOMICILE FOR THE AMBASSADOR IN THE STATE WHICH RECEIVES HIM.

§ 513. If we put the simple question whether the independence of the ambassador will be imperilled by reason of the dependence of a process to which he is a party, in the country in which he is to act as ambassador, we must inevitably get a negative answer. The dependence of a process and its conduct are in themselves a piece of business, which demands nothing more than the expenditure of a little time: if a party does not desire to carry on the process, he can, by admitting some of his opponent's allegations, escape in any event with the loss of his case. His person, however, so long as there is no question of execution, remains absolutely free. If the court, in which the process depended, has exceeded its jurisdiction, then, if no execution can follow on this either in this country or abroad, it is of no practical importance.

But it is a very different matter when we come to deal with execution, or generally with any of the compulsitors of the law. These may, even if personal arrest is no longer recognised as one of them, incommode him in the exercise of his functions, e.g. if his furniture be poinded. Besides, if the compulsitors of the law are thus put in force against him, secret documents, and generally speaking, documents which belong to the State which he represents, will be endangered. It is quite possible that the officers of the law might in such matters go outside their duty. It might even happen that a civil process might be utilised to seize the confidential documents of an ambassador under certain circumstances; for in countries in which the administration of justice is not altogether independent, national hate and national excitement may exercise an influence, it may be an unconscious influence, on the courts of justice and their administration. Accordingly, all measures of compulsion must be excluded, not merely from the person of the ambassador, but from everything which serves his personal or official use.⁹ The presumption, too, as Bynkershoek long ago noticed (c. xvi.), must always be in favour of such exemption.

For these reasons, the officers of the executive may not enter the ambassador's house for the purpose of executing a poinding. In general, too, this rule operates as a bar to the exercise of all jurisdiction, so far as it is founded on an antecedent arrestment, since this is a measure of direct compulsion.

In the same way, according to the general rule,¹⁰ the ambassador cannot possibly have a domicile in the country. No doubt, a person may hold the office of an ambassador for many long years in the same country, and there is therefore a temptation to hold that he may thus acquire a domicile as much as any official in that country who may be superseded at any moment. But although allegiance, which is generally considered indispensable to the character of an ambassador, does not now, as it once did, form the basis of domicile, still a man, in removing his domicile to any country, does in any case commit the circle of his legal existence to a very large extent to the jurisdiction of that country, and, according to the law which prevails in England [Scotland] and the United States, and which rules in Germany for the time at least, makes his personal law dependent upon the law of that domicile. A relation of dependence such as this upon the law of the country to which the ambassador is accredited, is too great a strain to put upon the position of an ambassador, and is quite irreconcilable with his office: besides, the impossibility of using the compulsitor of the law would give rise to intolerable predicaments: can one for a moment conceive that this comprehensive jurisdiction should exist without any compulsitors, or that the compulsitors to be applied should be those that flow from the authority of a foreign country, in spite of the judgment being pronounced by the courts within whose territory the residence of the person found liable actually was?

Again, too, the forum domicilii is not indispensable for the protection of the inhabitants of that country. They may be content with the forum contractus, the forum rei sitæ, the forum hereditatis, and lastly, the forum delicti commissi, for claims of damages.

THEORIES OF MORE MODERN AUTHORS, WHO ADOPT THE PRINCIPLE OF IMMUNITY FROM LEGAL COMPULSITORS ONLY, OR APPROACH THIS RESULT.

§ 514. At the bottom of the theory of Bynkershoek and Vattel, and of the edict of the States General of the Netherlands, of 9th Sept. 1679 (reported by the former, c. ix.), which prohibited the use of diligence against the person and the moveable property of ambassadors,¹¹ lies the distinction between right to pronounce judgment (jurisdiction in the narrower sense), on the one hand, and right to enforce obedience (imperium) on the other. Then, again, the remarks of G. F. Martens (Précis, § 217), although not expressed with perfect distinctness, must be understood in this sense. Heffter, § 205, speaks, not, it is true, altogether plainly or definitely, of the incompetency of applying any process of diligence involving force to the person of an ambassador: he does not speak of any absolute exemption. Halleck (i. c. 10, § 17) most pointedly recommends the distinction between "proceedings before the final judgment," and "supplementary proceedings for the execution of that judgment," as the best test for determining each case as it may arise.

¹⁰ See Bynkershoek, c. v. ; Wharton, § 49.

Bluntschli, too (§§ 139, 140), proceeds upon the incompetency of using compulsitors. He traces the doctrine of the incompetency of raising action, which is so generally recognised, to the want of power to compel by force obedience to the decree: "the court," he says, "must not be exposed to the danger of exhibiting the powerlessness of its authority." But civil judgments of a competent foreign court will be executed by many countries, and, it may be, by the country to which the ambassador belongs: besides, such a regard as the author manifests for the authority of the courts is not now generally recognised in modern codes of procedure. As a matter of fact, in a very great number of processes the stage of diligence is never reached, and the moral pressure which is involved in the judgment is sufficient to ensure performance of the prestation decreed even in the case of an international court of arbitration, in which there can be no idea of doing diligence, or using force against the losing party. But why should any State refuse to execute the judgment of a foreign State, by which an ambassador is ordained to pay a sum of money on account of some bargain concluded by him in that foreign country, and to be performed there?

The jurisdictions established by the German Civilprozessordnung are almost entirely independent of the possibility of executing the decree. Even in the jurisdiction established by § 24 (see supra, § 433) this consideration is only imperfectly attended to. In continuing his discussion of the subject, Bluntschli allows voluntary subjection on the part of the ambassador to give rise to a more extensive jurisdiction over him, and then again he mixes up this question with the question of jurisdiction over foreign sovereigns and States. In both points he is wrong, as further discussion of the subject will show. It looks as if Bluntschli had substantially followed the obscure remarks of Phillimore (ii. § 230). V. Holtzendorff lays down the decisive point of distinction quite clearly in his Encyclopædia of Legal Philosophy (4th ed. p. 1231) thus: "It has been debated whether it is action against an ambassador, or diligence merely, that is excluded by the principle of extra-territoriality. At the present time the former view, which gives the ambassador immunity from all steps of legal procedure, seems to prevail (?)." This deliverance is somewhat hesitating.

Zorn (in Hirth and Seydels Annalen des deutschen Reichs, 1882, p. 110, and particularly p. 113) starts from the sound principle that in all questions with an ambassador the diligences of the law of the State which receives him are barred, and that the law of that State, so far as he is concerned, is a lex imperfecta:¹² it might be more correctly said that to a certain extent it is a lex imperfecta.

Zorn points out, too, very properly, that in modern civil procedure diligences or compulsitors are not applied before judgment is given. But instead of drawing from that fact the inference that there is no check upon civil jurisdiction, except in so far as it must needs appeal to its compulsitors as against the ambassador and things that serve his immediate uses, he deduces from that characteristic of the civil procedure this strange result, that there may be a voluntary subjection to jurisdiction, a renunciation of the right of exemption from jurisdiction in civil causes. Any such subjection, he holds, must involve subjection to diligence: but he first points out that a renunciation of the privilege is incompetent unless with the consent of the State whose envoy the ambassador is. We have already frequently observed that if we admit the possibility of a tacit submission the whole privilege may be very easily got rid of. We shall return again to this point.¹³

V. Bulmerincq, too (Volkerr. § 73), has truly, as far as I can see, exemption from diligence, and not exemption from all civil jurisdiction in his mind, when he describes the exemption as "exemption from civil jurisdiction, but not in any matter relating to things which are the private property of the envoy (?), or to moveables which are dedicated to his use in his official capacity." Lastly, Gareis (Institutionen des Völkerr. 1888, p. 93) says very correctly, that all that is really implied in the exemption of the extra-territorial person from the whole police and fiscal regulations, and the whole judicial jurisdiction of the State in which he is stationed, is the privilege of personal inviolability. But, as I think, he fails, as he proceeds in his exposition, to draw the proper inferences from this proposition, and does not give, as he might, a sharp distinction between jurisdiction and execution.

¹² Stoerk's criticism on Zorn (p. 657) seems to me to this extent to be ill-founded.

¹³ Woolsey (§ 92a, p. 105) adopts Heffter's argument.

Geffcken on Heffter, § 205 (8th ed.), and in v. Holtzendorff's Handbuch, iii. p. 654, speaks in a vague way of the immunity of the ambassador from civil jurisdiction. (The ambassador cannot be called as a defender, nor can any articles, which he possesses as ambassador (?), be put under arrestment.) He then makes exceptions from this principle which have no foundation. (E.g. "If the ambassador has himself raised action, he must of course take all the consequences, e.g. liability to pay expenses. According to Geffcken, the ambassador, unless he obtains the sanction of his Government, can never of his own accord renounce his privilege; if that be so, it is difficult to understand why the judgment of the court against an ambassador who has raised action should be limited to expenses. Geffcken notices, in regard to matters of trade, that as a rule ambassadors are by the conditions of their service forbidden to trade. Yes, but what if they speculate?")

Let me distinctly say that no conclusion is to be drawn, from the sharp separation we have made in the text between jurisdiction, in the stricter sense, and diligence, as to the soundness of a similar distinction in criminal law. The exemption in matters of criminal law excludes even jurisdiction in my opinion.

SPECIAL QUESTIONS.

§ 515. Let us now proceed to draw the inferences that spring from our theory :—

First, It seems to be an absolutely irresistible conclusion that the jurisdiction of the courts of this country to decide in actions directed against an ambassador must be as extensive as it would be if the ambassador were not in this country at all. No further limitation of jurisdiction could be inferred from the condition of extra-territoriality, even although it were recognised as an operative legal fiction that the person is extra territorium, instead of being, as it truly is, merely a picturesque expression. But from this proposition we infer at once, as is generally conceded, that there is jurisdiction in the forum rei sitæ in questions about immoveable property, which the ambassador may happen to possess. This jurisdiction is independent alike of the personal presence of the owner in the country, and of any antecedent arrestment.¹⁴ Besides, any other theory would lead to negative conflicts of jurisdiction, which would be very difficult to dispose of; it would deprive all the ambassador's neighbours in a manner of the remedies of law, for the State to which the ambassador himself belongs would have no jurisdiction in the matter, and no tribunal that could deal with it; and, still more plainly, it could have neither the one nor the other over the adjoining properties; and yet in most cases a burden upon one property is a right in its neighbours.

Second, All jurisdiction is barred which postulates for the ambassador a domicile in the country,¹⁵ or which is founded on any measure of diligence, which would require to be put in force over assets of property belonging to the ambassador, for these are free from arrestment.¹⁶ On the other hand, all other kinds of jurisdiction may be asserted against an ambassador, in particular the jurisdiction of the forum contractus, and of the court of succession¹⁷ in matters affecting an inheritance, which has

¹⁶ Accordingly, § 24 of the German Civilprozessordnung, of which so much has been said (see supra, § 433), will have no application to the case of ambassadors. Neither will the forum arresti.

fallen either in whole or in part to an ambassador. Every one who, as pursuer, invokes a court, by the fact of doing so concedes its competency; and accordingly an ambassador, who has invoked any court, must acquiesce in its right to find him liable in expenses if the action is dismissed.¹⁸ On the other hand, in our view, the ambassador would be protected against jurisdiction reconventionne,¹⁹ which would be a very serious danger; many authorities, who in other respects confine the privilege of the ambassador to jurisdiction in the narrower sense, admit this ground of jurisdiction against him, on the score of voluntary submission. But since, in the course we have followed, we have come very near a limitation of jurisdiction, in the case of ambassadors, to the cases which, as we have already shown, proceed upon grounds that will command international recognition, it seems on the whole better to lay down the simple principle that none of the jurisdictions of the State that receives the ambassador shall be applied against him, except those that will receive effect on sound principles of international law, by way of diligence and execution in other countries. This course is recommended by the fact that all the jurisdictions of this or of that State which are not thus internationally recognised, are fanciful, modern, and isolated creations, and cannot, that being their character, prevail against the general usage of nations. These international jurisdictions, in which, of course, for this purpose we do not include that of domicile, rest upon the nature of things, and, in particular, on the consideration that the merits of the legal question in dispute are to be decided according to the law of the court in which the process thus depends. In applying these jurisdictions, too, there is sure to be no injustice or special hardship. We shall then be under no necessity for adopting any special casuistry to determine to what jurisdictions ambassadors are subject; nor need we take up any doctrine of voluntary subjection. According to the principles we have already laid down, we require no special rule, either, for the possible case that an ambassador is found carrying on business in the country. This is a simple case of a forum contractus being raised up against the ambassador. The possibility of such a case occurring is not so very remote as the most modern authors think. Of course, a government is not very likely to allow its envoy to carry on a trading or manufacturing business under his own name. But it is quite a familiar thing that landed proprietors should carry on very extensive businesses as distillers or wine merchants,²⁰ and it is by no means unprecedented that an ambassador should be the proprietor of estates in the country in which his duties lie, or should e.g. have in right of his wife an usufruct of some estate there. Such cases would not be touched by the disciplinary regulation which forbids ambassadors to carry on business; besides, any such regulation would be disregarded by the civil court as a mere matter of discipline. The actual nature of the legal relation, which it is proposed to discuss in the process, falls to be taken into consideration to exactly the same extent, neither more nor less, as it would be admitted to regulate the competency of the court in the case of any private person.²¹ No weight at all is to be laid on the distinction, which is unsound in itself, whether the ambassador has acted as such, and contracted debts in his character as ambassador.²² The older authors, in insisting that an ambassador must, as a trader, be subject to the courts of the country, do not lay so much weight, as one notices in reading their works carefully, on the nature of the legal transactions that are in question, as on the consideration that the ambassador, who carries on business in any form, will possess a separate establishment for business purposes, against which diligence can be done without hindrance.

It may possibly be maintained that the general proposition, viz. that (putting the forum arresti aside) jurisdiction, as distinguished from imperium, or the compulsitors of the law, may be set up in the case of an ambassador in exactly the same way as in the case of any other person who has no domicile in the country, must suffer modification in so far as a citation of the defender within the territory is a necessary condition of jurisdiction. It depends on the force which we ascribe to citation. It may be regarded as an act involving a compulsitor, in which case it must be barred in the case of an ambassador, and, along with it, all jurisdiction for the establishment of which a citation of the defender is necessary. It is, however, possible to look on citation as merely an intimation in solemn form, its object being to give the defender an opportunity of urging any objections he may have to the pursuer's allegations. This latter idea is undoubtedly the idea of the German Civilprozessordnung, and, as I think, it is also that of the law of Italy and of France. Although the French law, and in a particular case the German law also (§ 30), require, in order to set up the forum contractus, that the summons should be served within the territory of the court, this is only required on grounds of fairness to the defender. The object is that a man who is not actually within the district of the court, or who has left it on a journey, should not be molested by such an exercise of jurisdiction. It is not thought to be consistent with bona fides, on which the whole jurisdiction in matters of contract rests, that an action should be raised in foro contractus against an absent man. The ideas of the English law may make the question look more difficult, inasmuch as the competency of the court is to a certain extent derived from the presence of the defender within the territory of the court, and the consequent possibility of using compulsitors. There is some indication, however, that the new laws of procedure in England are more and more giving up this point of view, and are approximating more closely to that of the modern Continental systems in so far as citation is concerned.²³

²⁰ One must not be misled by the expression so often used, "ducal or baronial estate administration" (Verwaltung), etc. There is no separate juridical person in such cases. The "administration" indicates merely a mandatary or agent of the owner; the latter is the person to whom all the rights and obligations really belong.

²¹ To this effect see Bynkershoek's distinct exposition, c. xiv. He criticises sharply the opposite opinion, expressed in a deliverance of the Curia Hollandiæ. See, too, the decision of the English courts quoted by Phillimore (ii. § 181, Maddalena Steam Navig. Co. v. Martin, 1859, 2, E. and E. 94, 28, L. J. (Q. B.) 310). Foote, p. 153, reaches quite logically a denial of English jurisdiction, starting, as he does, from the point of view which the law of England assumes.

Third, It follows from what has just been said, that a simple citation of the party, which will not have the result of actually compelling his personal appearance, may take place in the case of an ambassador with full effect.²⁴ The delivery of such a citation or summons to appear before the court, may take place through the post, by delivery of a registered letter. Does the dignity of the ambassador go so far, that it is impossible to deliver registered letters to him? Does the receipt of such letters hinder him in the discharge of his duties? Does the officer of court, who leaves a writ at his house, play a part that can in any way be distinguished from that of the postman, who, according to the German Civilprozessordnung (§§ 177, and 165-170), may, in certain circumstances, do the duty of the other official? There is no sort of compulsitor here, or the exercise of any imperium.²⁵ All that the officer does is to deliver a document, and, if it is refused, to leave it, preserving evidence of having done so in another document, which he hands to his employer, the other party to the action.

But even if the citation be accepted, that does not, either by the German Civilprozessordnung or by the French Code de procédure, involve a recognition ²³ See Schuster, Bürgerliche Rechtspflege in England, §§ 48, 49.

²⁴ The opposite view, however, is taken by many, perhaps because the different kinds of citation and their bearings are not distinguished, viz. citation as party, as witness, and citation merely to protect some interest, perhaps simply because of a misapprehension of a course of practice. See Vattel, iv. ch. 8, § 115; Calvo, iii. § 1527; Gerbaut, § 176, founding on a judgment of the Ct. of Paris of 12th July 1867 (Sirey, Recueil, 68, 2, p. 201). Gianzana, ii. § 130. He proposes that the ambassador should be cited, as if he were in a foreign country. On this theory, too, proceeded the reasons given (motive) for § 18 of the German Constitution (see Struckmann and Koch on this paragraph). But the statute itself lays down nothing on the point. The confusion between citation as a party and citation as a witness, which so often occurs, seems to have operated here.

Vattel speaks not of citation by diplomatic methods, but rather indicates that an ambassador should be cited like a person who is abroad. But, in certain circumstances, that is a most inconvenient form of citation.

Bynkershoek (c. xvi.) speaks most distinctly in favour of the view taken in the text: "non violatur domus, quam legatus habitat, si apparitores iudicii ibi denuncient quod denunciandum est."

²⁵ So Lovisoni, p. 40.

of the jurisdiction of the court, and still less of its compulsitors. Any private person, even after accepting a citation, may plead that the court has no jurisdiction. In old days persons in high position, to show their independence, may have thought it necessary to dismiss with some unpleasantness the officer of court, who tried to serve them with a citation. But that was a different affair in this respect, that the officer was alleged to be attempting to perform an act in a place over which the person, who expelled him, claimed exclusive supremacy. But, in the case of an ambassador, that cannot for a moment be affirmed of the embassy bought for his residence by the State which accredits him.²⁶

Still less than in the simple citation as a party can any prejudice to the ambassador's immunity be discovered in the performance with reference to him of an act of voluntary jurisdiction, consisting merely in some privileged attestation, in favour of some third party. E.g. a protest of a bill, i.e. a documentary attestation that the ambassador refuses to accept or to pay it, may be taken by a notary as against an ambassador.²⁷

SPECIAL QUESTIONS. CITATION. OBLIGATION TO GIVE EVIDENCE.

§ 516. The requirement that all citations should be delivered to an ambassador by diplomatic means and by the hands of a minister, who is his official superior, is, according to the rules of modern systems of procedure, altogether meaningless, and might almost amount to a denial of justice in questions requiring dispatch (e.g. questions as to rights of building, or as to leases). Let us remember that the intimation might have to find its way twice over the ocean, and to pass through the hands of a multitude of intermediate officials; whereas if the ambassador is to be treated absolutely as if he were absent, the law of the country where the procedure was to take place would necessarily find the resource of edictal citation open to it according to the principles of international law. It must always be for the law of the court to say whether a citation is or is not sufficient.²⁸

²⁶ Lorimer, i. p. 240, says, no doubt, of an English ambassador in a foreign country, "his house is English ground." But in this assertion he stands pretty well alone. I am not aware that any European or American Government has renounced its real jurisdiction and local rights of police over an ambassador's hotel. Such a renunciation is quite impossible, without depriving his neighbours, or perhaps whole streets, of their legal rights. See Bluntschli, § 137, note; § 141, note. He reminds us that no State would, for instance, be bound to put up with firing-practice in the garden of the embassy, to the danger of the public.

²⁸ According to what I have said in the text, I cannot assent to what Geffcken (v. Holtzendorff's Handb. iii. p. 657) says in approval of a decision of the English Court of Common Pleas in 1854 (reported by Phillimore, ii. § 193, Taylor v. Best, 1854, 14 C.B. 487), in which jurisdiction was assumed over the secretary of a legation, because he had accepted the citation, and had even pleaded before the court, and subsequently put forward a plea of no jurisdiction. Such conduct is, of course, intolerable from the point of view of the law of procedure. But if the Fourth, But the case is entirely different as regards the obligation of the ambassador to give evidence or a skilled opinion. Such an obligation as that will at once lead, in the event of refusal to perform it, to the use of compulsion, and besides it involves the risk that the ambassador may find it necessary to say something, which, in the interest of his office, he ought to keep to himself. Any such obligation trenches on the independence of the ambassador. It is therefore properly negatived, and thus all citations of the ambassador with intent to make him give evidence, even although the ambassador should not at once have refused to receive them, have no legal effect, and must be looked upon as an invasion of his position. In such cases, the proper course is to courteously request the ambassador, if he will be so good, to give evidence. So, too, the form of oath, and generally the shape in which his information is to be presented, is a matter for the discretion of the ambassador himself, or his official superiors.²⁹ Of course, the court in which the process depends, or the court which is acting on commission from it, must decide according to its own law, whether the form under which the ambassador chooses to give his information is satisfactory as evidence.

SPECIAL QUESTIONS. SUBJECTION TO THE COURT IN MATTERS OF DILIGENCE.

§ 517. Fifth, Again, the voluntary subjection of an ambassador³⁰ can have no further effect than such subjection has in the case of any private person.³¹ Accordingly, it may take place so far as jurisdiction to pronounce judgment is concerned, but not so as to sanction any compulsitor, which plainly is to be counted a part of jus publicum, and cannot therefore court should not per se have jurisdiction, as may be the case in actions against an ambassador, and that on grounds of public law, it would be difficult to justify the decision of the English court. The result, I think, is right; the reasons for it are wrong. § 183 of the German Civilprozessordnung determines that summons addressed to Germans, who have extra-territorial privileges, shall be delivered through the Imperial Chancellor or a minister of the Federal State, as the case may be. This is only applicable to processes which are in dependence in German courts. The commentators take a different view.

³⁰ See Gerbaut, § 183, as to the possibility of a voluntary subjection.

³¹ But the case of voluntary subjection is not to be confounded with the case of a person belonging to the diplomatic body contracting as the representative of another person, and being sued in that character. Even those who hold that the immunity of an ambassador extends so as to bar jurisdiction in the stricter sense will admit, that in such a case jurisdiction cannot be declined on the head of ambassadorial immunity. See Ct. of Bordeaux, 11th Nov. 1883 (J. x. p. 613). But in our view, even in such a case, no diligence can be done against the ambassador himself.

be prorogated by any private contract.³² (E.g. in the same way, no one by any private bargain could invest an executive officer with right to employ the compulsitors of the law beyond the territory assigned to that officer.) Nor can any consent on the part of the State, which accredits the ambassador, make any difference in this matter. Such a consent, which is so often mentioned in this connection, seems entirely irrelevant: as regards the action up to the date of the final judgment, it is not required; as regards execution, it is inoperative. For it is the interest of the State to which the envoy is accredited, only to deal with a completely independent official, whose dignity is not to be impaired by private diligence being done upon him or his. An example will make this plain. Suppose that imprisonment for debt still exists in the country to which the ambassador is accredited. Would it be consistent with the dignity of that State to treat with one who was kept in gaol by some private creditor? In a less degree this consideration applies, if it is proposed to poind the ambassador's furniture.

Lastly, it may quite justly be said that, if voluntary submission were allowed to operate so as to validate execution, the whole of the ambassador's privilege of independence would stand upon the most uncertain ground. In theory, a distinction may no doubt be taken between express and implied renunciation, but the distinction is not so easy in practice; and, on the other side, if renunciation were once admitted, it would be inconsistent with bona fides to exclude its application if it were only implied, and not express. Implied submission is simply another expression for a submission which may be inferred from the character of the dispute and the conduct of the parties. Thus, to admit the possibility of voluntary submission to execution, particularly if it were to be inferred from submission to the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce judgment, would very soon sweep away the whole privilege of an ambassador,³³ as has already been very properly noticed by other authors, e.g. by Mr Wheaton.³⁴

This is another reason for making a sharp distinction between jurisdiction to give decree and to award execution, for we cannot well dispense with the theory of voluntary submission to jurisdiction in the former sense to a certain extent (see supra, § 515).

³² Bynkershoek (c. xxiii. ad fin.) reaches the same result: "Atque ita . . . forte dicendum est, legatum in causa delicti nunquam privilegio fori renunciare posse, in causa civili non aliter quam ut adversus eum jus dicatur, non ut sententia executioni mandetur."

³⁴ V. Heyking (p. 55) rightly pronounces against the principle of voluntary submission which is upheld by so many publicists. See Trib. Civ. Seine, 8th March 1886 (J. xiii. p. 592). Some have gone the length of inferring it from the fact that an ambassador has contracted debt in any country, so that he can be forced to pay them there. V. Heyking does not confine the exemption to execution in the narrower sense, and so he finds himself forced (p. 86) to admit subsequently the possibility of a voluntary submission, with the assent of the State to which the ambassador belongs. This, he says, should be given in writing. What is his authority for saying so?

SPECIAL QUESTIONS: ACTIONS CONNECTED WITH REMOVAL FROM THE AMBASSADOR'S HOUSE. RIGHT OF HIS LANDLORD TO RETAIN AND TO SEIZE. PROVISIONAL MEASURES.

§ 518. Sixth, A special difficulty occurs in actions against an ambassador, connected with his removal from his house, a kind of question which is very likely to arise. If, in such cases, we are to hold that the right of the officers of the territory to do diligence is excluded, then the landlords of houses occupied by ambassadors are left with hardly any legal remedy open to them; for there is no doubt that in many cases the diligence which they would naturally use would be against the furniture which they find in the personal use of the ambassador, and which he is proposing to take away from the house he is now quitting. In such cases, the courts of the country to which the ambassador belongs are entirely incompetent, and in any case the circuitous process of appealing to them, or to the official superiors of the ambassador, would be too tedious a process. Slatin (J. xi. p. 468), who has treated this matter with exceptional thoroughness, arrives at the result, that in such cases both jurisdiction and execution should be sanctioned to their full extent against the ambassador, because actions of this kind are closely akin to real actions dealing with immoveable property, because they demand prompt settlement, and lastly, because they must be ruled by local law. Beauchet, who translates Slatin's article into French, declares (J. xi. p. 469) against the conclusiveness of these arguments.

I am inclined to agree with Slatin. If it is clear that the contract of lease has run out, then—at least according to the rules of the common law of Rome, and, as I think, by other laws also—the hirer has absolutely no further right to remain in the house, or to leave his property there. In place, therefore, of raising an action of removing the person who has let the house, particularly if he be the proprietor of it, or have some other real right to it, may employ the weapons of self-defence, which in this case take the shape of a right, to expel the property and the persons of strangers from the house by force if need be.³⁵ An action of removal is a more lenient and more prudent measure: to avoid the interference of a private individual via facti, the judicial authority is invited to step in, and the matter is placed under their control. But it is familiar doctrine that it is allowable to defend oneself even against an extra-territorial person, and that that self-defence may take the shape of the defence of one's property; from this it follows that an action of removal must be sanctioned, which, after all, is a less drastic form of the proceedings already referred to, as being allowable in self-defence. The considerations of expediency urged by Slatin are, besides, not to be forgotten.

³⁵ So long ago as the days of Bynkershoek, that author (c. xvi.) shows that certain interdicts, which, to use his expression, are directed against anarchy, i.e. against disorder which, as a matter of police, cannot be endured, or which represent a kind of self-defence, are admissible even against an ambassador. Phillimore, §§ 184, 185, takes the same view. It is a case of the same kind, when some defect in the building of the hotel of the embassy threatens danger to the adjoining houses. The ambassador may, as I think, be ordained to find caution damni infecti (if he is the owner of the house; if not, then the foreign State to which he belongs). If the ambassador is found liable, the caution must, by a fiction, be held to have been found, or the judgment pronounced in the case must be taken to represent an actual undertaking to make good the damage. See German Civilprozessordnung, § 779.

As Slatin notices, the Supreme Court of Austria on 28th April 1874 held that an action of removal was competent. The ambassador apparently refused to accept the citation, and so a curator absentis was appointed, and the procedure was directed against him. Perhaps, however (see Beauchet ut cit. and Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 389), the jurisdiction of the court was put upon the circumstance that the ambassador had himself brought the question of the lease of his house before the court on another point. This account of the decision, which v. Püttlingen and Beauchet both seem to think is correct, would in my view certainly be wrong. However, in any case, the result supports the theory which I have laid down, and sometimes the result of a judicial sentence is more important for legal theory than the ratio on which it proceeds.

But what, again, is to be said of a right of retention or a right of hypothec at common law (pignus quod tacite contrahitur) belonging to the landlord, in a case where the ambassador is leaving his house, while the landlord has some claim against him, e.g. for alleged damage done by him? A case of this kind, of which Wheaton (i. p. 293) gives us an account, formed in 1839 the subject of a correspondence between the Prussian Foreign Ministry and the Secretary of State for the United States. The Prussian courts and ministry took their stand, not so much on the contention that the ambassador was subject to Prussian jurisdiction, as on the contention that the landlord should be protected in his real right, which the ambassador himself must be held to have given to the landlord, by entering on the contract under the law of Prussia.

Still, I should be inclined in such a case to decide against the landlord. Furniture which is directly subject to the uses of the ambassador must be protected against all invasion by way of diligence, and although the right here takes the form of a pignus tacitum, it is none the less an invasion of that kind. The privilege, which is a matter of public law, existing in the public interest, must assert itself against such provisions of the territorial law, by means of which a private person would for a time at least be able to deprive an ambassador of important papers by seizing and keeping the desk in which they were lying: it might at least expose the papers to great risk.³⁶ Besides, any such right would work very differently in different countries.

³⁶ See despatch of the Secretary of State of the United States, Legaré, of 9th June 1843, extracts from which are given in Wharton's Dig. i. § 96 (p. 654). Perhaps the reasoning was inadequate, in respect it did not sufficiently insist on the contrast between express pledge and implied pledge, and the proof which the former affords that the article pledged is not indispens-

It may be said by some objector that an express pledge of any article is just as untrustworthy as the tacit pledge; and there is no doubt that a right of pledge may be carried too far. The ambassador, however, who expressly pledges any article, by that very act shows that it is not absolutely indispensable to him. The same thing cannot, however, be said of implied pledges or hypothecs, which in the particular case may never come to the knowledge of the contracting parties, but are supplied directly by operation of law. But the declaration implied in actual pledge, that the article is not indispensable to him as an ambassador, must receive effect. The bona fides of trade absolutely demands that it should: otherwise the ambassador could not pledge anything, and perhaps could not sell anything, for pledge and sale are just different methods of alienation. No one has as yet suggested that in transactions of this kind the approval of the ambassador's official superior should be obtained. Such a demand would place the ambassador, in so far as his civil rights were concerned, on the level of a minor, or of an incapax.

Seventh, No provisional measures, except such as have reference to real property, can be adopted, in so far as they imply any personal compulsitor against the ambassador himself, or involve any attachment of things which are actually in use by the ambassador.³⁷ It would require a very extreme case indeed to warrant us in sanctioning any such measures against the person of an ambassador on grounds of humanity: e.g. the ambassador would require to be insane, while the State by which he was accredited would in its turn require to be for the time unable to take the necessary steps.

SPECIAL QUESTIONS: APPLICATION OF THE RULES OF SUBSTANTIVE PRIVATE LAW: THE RULE "locus regit actum" IN PARTICULAR.

§ 519. Eighth, As regards the substantive private law to be applied to an ambassador, there is no need to treat the ambassador otherwise than any other private person, although we cannot allow him any domicile in the State to which he is accredited.³⁸ His rights of status and of family³⁹ will, of course, be ruled by his personal law, while his real rights in immoveable property must, as all admit, be ruled by the lex rei sitæ. In able. Macri, i. p. 227, declares himself in accordance with the text, because, according to the principles of international law, the furniture of the ambassador is to a certain extent extra commercium.

Bynkershoek, besides (c. ix), decides in accordance with the text. The case occurred in Paris, in 1608, with the Venetian ambassador.

³⁷ See the President of the Trib. Civ. of the Seine, 29th September 1880 (J. viii. p. 514), in connection with provisional measures for behoof of the wife of an ambassador.

³⁸ See Zorn in Hirth's Annalen des deutschen Reichs, 1882, p. 82.

³⁹ An ambassador, however, in marrying, may submit himself to a foreign law of marriage as regards the property of the spouses, C. d'Aix, 22nd Feb. 1883 (J. x. p. 172). Why should the free will of an ambassador have less scope than that of a private person?

general, too, rights in moveables are, by the pressure of necessity, ruled by the lex rei sitæ. All that is left, then, is the sphere of the law of obligations, and the rule "locus regit actum."⁴⁰ If we were not to apply the law of the territory to contracts made by an ambassador, in cases where the nature of the subject requires it—and the application of the lex loci contractus is made in such cases only—the rule would involve an outrage on bona fides, and in many cases would do nothing but harm to the ambassador. What other law, e.g. could be applied to leases of real estate? The rule "locus regit actum" is only applied, however, if parties choose: in fact, it is an indulgence to the parties for facilitating legal intercourse. Is an ambassador to be excluded from that indulgence? That would seriously inconvenience him in his business relations in the country. No one, accordingly, doubts that the ambassador may avail himself of the machinery for acts of voluntary jurisdiction within the country:⁴¹ may e.g. conclude contracts before a notary of the country. That involves no invasion of his independence or dignity.

BEGINNING AND END OF THE AMBASSADOR'S IMMUNITY. AMBASSADORS ACCREDITED TO ANOTHER COUNTRY ON THEIR JOURNEY TO IT.

§ 520. The privilege of extra-territoriality must, as regards exemption from diligence, begin so soon as the ambassador sets foot in the country to which he is accredited, and, in the case of goods that serve his personal or official wants, so soon as they reach the frontier of that country. It must also continue to subsist for a certain time, after he has been recalled, or has left the country, as the case may be: for what time must, in the want of special legislative provision on the point, depend on judicial discretion, taking account inter alia of the amount of the furnishings. Perhaps the best plan would be to allow the foreign minister of the State to which the envoy is accredited in each case to fix a time, with power to extend it within certain limits. The privilege will not ensure full protection, unless it outlasts for a certain time the functions of the ambassador. All are agreed on this point. It will be right, too, to protect ambassadors of powers that are not at war with us, travelling through our country, from all the compulsitors of our law.⁴² It is not our view that the whole

⁴⁰ The Prussian statute of 3rd April 1823 recognises the validity of the rule "locus regit actum" as regards the testaments of Prussian ambassadors abroad. § 1, "Mortis causa settlements of our ambassadors shall, as regards their form, be recognised as heretofore as valid, if they conform to the law of the place where they were executed."

§ 2 preserves the ambassador's right to execute a holograph settlement, which is to be transmitted to the ministry of foreign affairs, and kept in the archives of the Privy Council (Kammergericht). This is only available for a year after the ambassador has been recalled (§ 4). This Prussian statute has never been formally extended to ambassadors of the German Empire.

⁴² Bynkershoek (c. ix.) takes a different view: he applies the word "passerende," which privilege of ambassadors is based exclusively on a tacitus consensus of the State in which the ambassador is received, although some of the conditions of it may depend on that consensus. Our view rather is that it is an universal and imperative necessity that diplomatic intercourse should be free and unrestrained, and that therefore such immunity does not require to be specially conferred, it arises as a matter of course, unless some individual State expressly forbids a particular ambassador, or the ambassadors of a particular State, from passing through its territory, or will only permit it on the understanding that this immunity is withdrawn.

If the privilege be extended to ambassadors on their journey, we can dispose in the same way of the disputed question, whether ambassadors, accredited to some federation of States, enjoy this privilege within the territory of each of the States that make up the federation. So, too, with the converse case of an ambassador accredited to some one of the federated States, while he is within another part of the federal territory.

EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY, IF THE AMBASSADOR BELONGS TO THE COUNTRY TO WHICH HE IS ACCREDITED.

§ 521. There remains still another point for discussion, viz. whether this privilege should be conceded to ambassadors, who are subjects of the State in which they act as ambassadors. Many authorities,^{43 44} and among them Bynkershoek (c. xi.), refuse him privilege in such a case. As a matter of fact, this privilege, if we regard it as a complete exemption from jurisdiction (excepting always real jurisdiction over immoveable property), would lead to a denial of justice in those cases in which the State to which the ambassador was accredited would have, but for the privilege, by reason of his belonging to it, an exclusive jurisdiction. The privilege is not so serious a matter, if it only applies so as to free him from diligence directed against his person, or against furniture necessary for the reasonable performance of his calling, or against the salary drawn by him as ambassador. In our view, his privilege is not solely to be referred to the assent of the State in which he is received as ambassador. This consent seems only to be necessary to enable him to be recognised as ambassador, and to do his duty as such. On the other side, however, this more limited occurs in the edict of the Dutch States General of 9th Sept. 1697, only to ambassadors who are leaving a country to which, up to this time, they have been accredited.

The point has long been a disputed one. For the view of the text, see Vattel, iv. 7, §§ 84, 85; Klüber, § 204; Wheaton, p. 220; Neumann, Volkerr. p. 177; Lovisoni, p. 54, and (apparently) Geffcken in v. Holtzendorff's Handb. ii. § 368. Hartmann (Institutionen des Volkerr. § 109) takes an intermediate view, which, in my opinion, does not suit the conditions of modern traffic. Tacit assent to the ambassador's passage he holds to be necessary and sufficient. This assent he finds in the visé of the ambassador's passport.

⁴³ See Klüber, § 210; Heffter, § 214.

immunity is indispensable for the discharge of his ambassadorial duties. From this it will follow that his position as a subject of the State does not at all stand in the way of that limited immunity:⁴⁵ on the contrary, it must be conceded to him the moment he is recognised as ambassador.⁴⁶

But, of course, jura quasita acquired previously must not suffer by this privilege, even as regards the subjects which are attachable by diligence. Accordingly, without any personal constraint being put upon the ambassador, he will have to point out and to make available for diligence all the articles of property which he possessed at the time he was admitted as ambassador, and then, according to the nature of the subject matter, the rules "res succedit in locum pretii" and "pretium succedit in locum rei" will fall to be applied. The ambassador may be required to give up an inventory on oath (manifestationseid), but cannot be compelled by threat of imprisonment to do so. No ambassador, however, who was a person of honour, could bring himself to refuse to do so. If he did refuse, we may presume that the Government which had accredited him would dismiss him. In the last resort, the Government to which he was accredited would remonstrate, and remonstrate with effect, against such an ambassador, and thus put an end to his tenure as ambassador.

Many States, indeed, refuse to allow their subjects to act within their territory as ambassadors for foreign States. But that does not settle the question which we have stirred. In the first place, it may very well happen that any such maxim or rule should be infringed; and, again, mistakes may easily be made as to the character of an individual, i.e. whether he is a subject of this or of that State.

The German Constitution (§ 18) does not in itself give German subjects, who are chiefs or members of foreign embassies accredited to the German Empire, immunity from German jurisdiction (see supra, p. 1076, note 6 ad fin.), but lays down that any of the States of the Empire may renounce its jurisdiction over a subject who has been accredited to it as ambassador.⁴⁷ It is not quite plain to me how that is to take place in the particular case to the prejudice of third parties, looking to the other provisions of the Constitution, and the independence of the courts of law.⁴⁸

⁴⁵ E.g. Vattel, iv. § 112; Ch. de Martens, Guide diplomatique, i. p. 89, and Heyking, p. 60, all support the doctrine of immunity, unless the State which receives the ambassador declares to the contrary from the first.

⁴⁶ A decision of the Trib. Civ. Seine, 21st Jan. 1875 (J. ii. p. 89), recognises the privilege. Demangeat (ibid.) approves the decision.

⁴⁸ The question, on the other hand, whether ambassadors, who are accredited to one of the States of the German Empire, are exempt from German jurisdiction all over the Empire, I think, according to the words of § 18 (2), must be answered in the negative. "The chiefs and members of embassies accredited to one of the States of the Empire, are not subject to the jurisdiction of this State. The same rule (?) holds good of the members of the Federal Parliament (Bundesrath) who do not represent the State in which the Parliament meets." (This

EXEMPTION FROM TAXES AND DUTIES.

§ 522. As regards taxation, ambassadors are as a rule considered free from all direct personal imposts by the Government of the country, which postulate a relation of submission to its authority (e.g. income-tax). There is, however, no actual necessity for any such exemption: a different rule will apply to taxation levied by way of local dues, although these, as much as the other, rest upon a relation of submission (e.g. indicated or created by a stay of a certain duration). But there is absolutely no ground in law to be found for immunity from indirect imposts and duties. We therefore leave this question, dependent as it is on the laws of each particular State, where we found it, and content ourselves with saying that, in levying and collecting duties and charges, no direct force or diligence may be used against the ambassador himself, or against those things which he has actually taken into his own use. It is therefore impossible to examine his baggage at a custom-house, if he declares that he has no articles with him that are liable to duty, or if he exhibits the articles, liable to duty, which he has.

JURISDICTION BELONGING TO AMBASSADORS THEMSELVES.

§ 523. An ambassador can only exercise what is known as a voluntary jurisdiction,⁴⁹ in matters that concern the persons belonging to the embassy, and to a certain extent—to what extent it is impossible to lay down any general rule—but, speaking roughly, in matter that concern persons belonging to the State which accredits him. We have already noticed that this is so as regards marriages, which are to be counted as a species of voluntary jurisdiction. The hotel of the embassy, however, never ceases to be a part of the territory in which it is actually situated. The rule "locus regit actum" can never, therefore, be pleaded in support of the exercise of jurisdiction of this nature,⁵⁰ to the effect of maintaining that a document executed in presence of the ambassador, or with his assistance, should be recognised as correct in point of form, if as regards its contents it must be ruled by some law other than latter proposition is incorrectly expressed. Strictly speaking, the same rule cannot hold good of members of Parliament; they are not accredited to any of the States of the Empire.) See Hartmann, Institutionen, p. 110.

⁴⁹ As a matter of public law, there would be nothing to prevent the ambassador being invested with a certain contentious jurisdiction, if this were only to receive effect within the territory of the State which accredited him, and if, also, there were no proposal to use any diligence or compulsitor, or administer any oath in the country in which he is stationed. Of course, a sovereign, who happens to be living in a foreign State, may sanction laws which are to be carried out in his own State, and name officials, during his stay.

that of the country to which the ambassador belongs. Accordingly, apart from the power of assisting in or authenticating the execution of testaments by members of the embassy, a power which is universally conceded to an ambassador,⁵¹ it will be wrong to attribute to him in a civilised country, without the assent of the State to which he is accredited expressed in formal legal shape, any voluntary jurisdiction. No State is bound to sanction any such powers in a foreign ambassador, concurrent with those of its own notaries and officials, even if these powers are exercised only in the case of subjects of the country to which the ambassador belongs. It is all the less bound to do so, as such neglect of the application of the rule "locus regit actum" may be apt to lead to confusion in legal intercourse. It is only in cases in which the State, where the embassy lies, refuses all assistance, that such voluntary jurisdiction on the part of the ambassador is proper, at least in civilised countries. In any case it must, of course, be confined to subjects of his own State.⁵²

PRIVILEGES OF CONSULS. CONSULAR ARCHIVES.

§ 524. It is familiar law that consuls, except in so far as they also possess a diplomatic character, have no privilege of extra-territoriality.⁵³ The consular archives, however, in the interest of the performance of the international duties of the consul, must be held inviolable even against the civil jurisdiction of the country,⁵⁴ although, of course, only under certain conditions. The Institute of International Law in 1888 began to busy itself in laying down these conditions and in attempting to define the privilege.⁵⁵

If a private person asserts that a consul, unwarrantably as he alleges, has appropriated any articles or documents, and laid them up among the consular archives, then the question is a pure question of public law, and must be disposed of by diplomatic negotiations, and in the end by a court of arbitration selected by agreement. The consul has acted as the representative of the foreign Government, and has exercised a sovereign right which belongs to it, and is conceded by the other Government to

⁵² The question as to what persons of the ambassador's staff and his household are covered by the privilege of extra-territoriality, is a question which may be left to public law, and need not be discussed as a subject of private international law.

⁵⁴ See Clunet's paper (J. xv. p. 53) on the damage done to the archives of the French consulate at Florence by the Italian praetor Tosini in December 1887. Fiore maintains their inviolability (Dir. pubb. ii. § 1185). So, too, Calvo, iii. §§ 1404, 1405; and Gabba, Rev. xx. p. 244. The details of the case discussed by Clunet have no interest for us at present.

⁵⁵ Engelhardt drew a sketch for an international agreement. Rev. xx. pp. 592 and 610.

belong to it within its own territory. Gabba,⁵⁶ who takes the same view as we do, very soundly remarks, that (at least in Italy and in Germany) the courts themselves would not have any power themselves to seize papers belonging to executive officers of the Government, or to compel these officers to seize them. How can it be maintained that they have this power as against the official of a foreign State? One obvious exception to this rule, and it is the only one, is pointed out by Gabba (p. 241), viz. if the consul is appointed, by the country that appoints him, to be the representative of some private person, e.g. as curator absentis.⁵⁷ Consular treaties often provide for appointments of the kind.

But, if he alleged that a consul, acting altogether outwith his official duty, or within the scope of his office as representative of some private interest, has concealed some document in the inviolable archives of the consulate, then the civil courts would put in force the measures, which are applied in other cases, where an allegation is made that a person has concealed a paper or any other object which he is bound to make forthcoming, in some unknown place. The consul will be compelled either to depone on oath, or to undergo an action of damages, or, in so far as he represents a private person, run the risk of losing a process which he is carrying on for him, and of being liable to the party he so represents in damages.

The same rules must prevail in the case in which the consul has a diplomatic character, and so enjoys the privilege of extra-territoriality. But in that case no direct compulsitors, such as fine or imprisonment, could be used to compel him to depone on oath.

GENERAL ESTIMATE OF THE PRIVILEGE OF EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY.

§ 525. The privilege of extra-territoriality was attacked so early as the end of the seventeenth century,⁵⁸ in more modern times by Fiore,⁵⁹ and most markedly by Laurent.⁶⁰ Laurent thinks it is unnecessary, and therefore mischievous; he also pronounces it to be a serious and plain invasion of legal order, which must of necessity be the same for all, due to old inflated exaggeration of the idea of sovereignty, and the deification of princes; it is, he thinks, all the less defensible as different theories on its true import are so widely divergent one from another.

We must concede that these attacks are justified in so far as the defenders of the doctrine of extra-territoriality postulate, as the principle upon which they are to proceed, that the sovereign power of the foreign State is embodied in the ambassador, a principle from which they draw the most extravagant conclusions; e.g. they make this absurd inference, that it is an insult to the foreign State, if our courts of justice dare to bring an action to the notice of the ambassador, i.e. simply ask him to meet the demand made upon him. There is no such embodiment of the foreign sovereignty as that in him.

⁵⁸ So in the academic disputation: "De legato sancto, non impuni," by Fr. W. de Lüderitz: "auspiciis Henrici de Cocceji," Franc. ad Viad. 1699; this is a disputation mentioned by Bynkershoek.

But within the limits, which we have felt ourselves constrained to draw, the privilege has good grounds of its own on which to rest. Apart from the privileges of sovereigns, there are in most countries privileges, which shield particular persons, e.g. members of Parliament, from some of the diligences of civil process.⁶¹ The right of the private citizen [the creditor] must in these cases, in respect of the public position which the obligant holds, give way to the public interest in the free and unconstrained exercise by the debtor of his office, or of the mandate entrusted to him by his fellow-citizens. It is exactly the same with the privilege of an ambassador, but his privilege, on account of the peculiar character of his office, is peculiarly important, and is consecrated by an universal tradition. This privilege was in old days more necessary than it is now, but even at the present day it is not to be dispensed with. The administration of justice is no doubt in civilised countries, in form at least, independent. But as a matter of fact it may not be so everywhere to the extent to which the language of the law asserts it to be, and there is no absolutely trustworthy guarantee against the force of national prejudices and unreasonable national hatred, which it is impossible for the individual to estimate. The ambassador of a nation which is disliked must, therefore, on that account hold a very dangerous post. Again, apart altogether from such prejudices, miscarriages of justice are specially likely to occur in cases in which international relations are under consideration. It is not always easy to distinguish the public capacity of a representative of a foreign power, from his capacity as a private individual, as the process in Florence recently showed [J. xv. p. 53]. But lastly, in our view, the question is one solely of exemption from direct compulsitors against the person of the ambassador, or against things that he is in direct need of for his support and the discharge of his office.

If this limit is observed, and the privilege is not extended to questions of jurisdiction in the narrower sense, it does not involve any very serious invasion of the principle of equal justice to all, and, at the same time, it gives the ambassador sufficient protection. The only difficulties are those that may arise, as they do in all departments of international law, from the new-fangled jurisdictions, with as many arms as a polypus, which, however, do not merit international recognition. But if it is proposed to extend the privilege beyond the limits of these indispensable requirements, it will be exposed to violent attack, which will be founded on good reason, and from time to time will meet with success.

One special risk, which is involved in too wide an extension of the privilege, and which is most prominent when we extend the privilege so as to give a general immunity from jurisdiction in the fullest sense of the word, is plainly this—that if it is so extended we must introduce some restrictions. But each different State will have a different theory as to these restrictions, since they depend upon matters of process law, which, again, is different in each State. The want of uniformity which will thus be produced will give the whole doctrine an appearance of caprice and of chance, and will in turn make men think that it may be dispensed with altogether. The theory which refers important limitations of this kind to an express or to a tacit renunciation of the privilege, ruins entirely the whole principle. In our view, the privilege is closely limited to the measure of its necessity, but, on the other hand, should be to that extent protected by all alike, and be entirely beyond renunciation or prorogation.

GENERAL EXTENSION OF THE EXEMPTION TO OFFICIALS WHO ARE EMPLOYED WITHIN A FOREIGN STATE.

§ 526. But, of course, we must not extend too far the circle of persons who are entitled to rely on the privilege of immunity from the imperium of the territory in which they happen to be. It would, e.g. be a mistake to give this exemption to consuls, who are carrying on business for themselves, except in so far as the inviolability of their archives is concerned.

It may, however, seem questionable, whether the exemption is not also to be accorded to other officials and commissioners of a foreign Government who are present in our territory with the knowledge and consent, or even perhaps on the invitation of our State, although they have no real diplomatic character. This question has become one of special practical importance in view of the technical international conferences and congresses, which now take place so frequently. In the case of Schnaebeli,⁶² in which questions were raised about the arrest of a French frontier policeman, who had entered German territory in his official character, Stoerk⁶³ finds ground for the proposition that a principle was involved which had always existed, but till it was brought to light in that case had been latent, viz. that persons, who in their official capacity set foot on a foreign country, enjoy a certain amount of exemption, which is not necessarily to be brought, and indeed cannot, to all intents, be brought under the rule of extra-territoriality, which has been elaborated for another condition of things altogether.

Now, it is quite certain that the presence of such a person, either by invitation or by permission, cannot be used to arrest him in pursuance of a plan prepared beforehand, cannot be made a trap for him. Accordingly, we must assent to the despatch of the Chancellor of the German Empire, of 28th April 1887, in connection with the Schnaebele affair. It set out that parties crossing the frontier, in consequence of official agreements between the officers of two adjoining States, must be considered as having taken place under the tacit assurance of a safe-conduct. Any other treatment⁶⁴ would seem in fact to be at variance with the bona fides of international intercourse,⁶⁵ and this we must maintain not only with reference to frontier officers, but with reference to all representatives of foreign States invited or admitted to our State, without regard to the nature of the public affairs which they have to transact or to represent. It seems, however, dangerous to go further, for plainly the ordinary course of justice must not be broken through unnecessarily; while in the administration of civil affairs there is no reason for further exemption, if we exclude the application of arrestment to found jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction which is set up by § 24 of the German Civilprozessordnung, which we have so often mentioned. It would be better to remove these altogether, and that, in our view, is only a question of time. The full measure of exemption must be reserved for the higher representatives of the international intercourse of Governments: in their case, we have other guarantees that international law and international courtesy will be observed, than we have in the case of any official or agent of the State selected at random. The purely logical conclusion that every person who acts or who appears in name of a foreign State can claim international privilege, must not lead us astray.⁶⁶ It must not go so far as to allow the country to swarm with persons⁶⁷ who claim immunity from the legal compulsors of the territory.

NOTE CCC ON §§ 509-526. PRIVILEGES OF AMBASSADORS BY THE LAW OF ENGLAND.

[The distinction taken by the author between jurisdiction to pronounce judgment, on the one hand, whereby a claim may be constituted by decree,

⁶⁴ Among frontier officials, if any other rule were followed, it would soon result in constant brawls and bloody conflicts.

⁶⁵ Commissioners, sent by a State to ensure its being well represented at an international exhibition, have, however, no diplomatic character: as such they are not in any sense extra-territorial. See Clunet, Questions de droit relatives à l'exposition universelle internationale, 1878 (J. v. pp. 81 et seq. and 197 et seq.).

⁶⁷ Let it be remembered that wives, children, and servants share the privilege of extra-territoriality.

from which process ambassadors are not to be protected, and the compulsors of the law from which they and their goods are to be protected, is not recognised in the law of England. The protection it gives is much fuller than the author proposes to allow, and the theory on which it seems to proceed is the representative character of the ambassador, who must be free from all the jurisdiction of the courts of this country, just as his own sovereign would be: it is the respect paid by one Sovereign State to the independence of every other Sovereign State. (See Brett, J. in the Parlement Belge, 1879, L. R. 4, P. D. 129.)

The common law is declared by the statute 7 Anne, c. 12. It proceeds on the preamble that "several turbulent and disorderly persons having in a most outrageous manner insulted the person of . . . Ambassador Extraordinary of His Czarish Majesty Emperor of Great Russia . . . by arresting him and taking him by violence out of his coach in the publick street, and detaining him in custody for several hours in contempt of the protection granted by Her Majesty, contrary to the law of nations and in prejudice of the rights and privileges which ambassadors and other publick ministers authorised and received as such have at all times been thereby possessed of, and ought to be kept sacred and inviolable. . . .

"§ 3. And to prevent the like insolences for the future, be it declared . . . that all writs and processes that shall at any time hereafter be sued forth or prosecuted whereby the person of any ambassador or other publick minister of any foreign prince or State authorised and received as such by Her Majesty . . . or the domestick or the domestick servant of any such ambassador or other publick minister, may be arrested or imprisoned, or his or their goods or chattels may be distrained, seized or attached, shall be deemed and adjudged to be utterly null and void to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever."

In the case of Taylor v. Best (1854, 14, C. B. p. 487), in the course of the discussion Mr Justice Maule made several observations which tend in the direction of the doctrine of the text, viz. that it might be lawful to constitute a claim of debt against an ambassador by decree, so as, it might be, to avoid prescription, although it would not be lawful to follow up the decree by diligence of any kind. Campbell, C. J., however, in the later case of the Maddalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (1859, 2, E. & E. p. 94, 28, L. J. (Q. B.) 310), alludes to these observations, and holds them not to be sound, while the judgment of the court affirmed that a public minister "cannot, while he remains such public minister, be sued against his will in this country in a civil action, although such action may arise out of commercial transactions by him here, and although neither his person nor his goods be touched by the suit." The Chief Justice, in concluding his opinion, says "it certainly has not hitherto been expressly decided that a public minister duly accredited to the Queen by a foreign State is privileged from all liability to be sued here in civil actions, but we think that this follows from well-established principles" (pp. 115, 116).

The transaction in question in that case was a transaction in shares of a limited company, and the tenor of the Chief Justice's opinion might seem to give some countenance to the idea that a different rule might be applied if the ambassador were engaged in trade. That that is not so, however, seems certain from a passage in the opinion of Jervis, C. J., in the case of Taylor v. Best, already referred to, upon which Chief Justice Campbell certainly did not mean to go back. The passage is as follows (p. 519): "If an ambassador or public minister during his residence in this country violates the character in which he is accredited to our Court by engaging in commercial transactions, that may raise a question between the Government of this country and that of the country by which he is sent, but he does not thereby lose the general privilege which the law of nations has conferred upon persons filling that high character." Then, again, the grounds on which the judgment in the Maddalena case is put—viz. the impossibility of bringing any one into court without some measure of coactio, which is inadmissible in the case of an ambassador, and the practical impossibility of service, since no officer may enter his hotel, for that is foreign territory, and therefore inviolable, while he must not be stopped on the street, since he may be going about the affairs of his master, the foreign sovereign—show that all actions, no matter what the subject matter, are intended to be excluded.

It is, however, observed that there may be a specific remedy by injunction to remove an ambassador from a house which he has hired and refuses to quit, when bound to do so.

In the recent case of Macartney v. Garbutt (1890, L. R. 24, Ch. D. 368), it was held that a British subject, accredited to Great Britain by a foreign Government as a member of its embassy—English secretary—is exempt from the local jurisdiction of his own country, unless he has been received by the British Government upon the express condition that he shall be subject thereto. But one who has obtained his position as member of an embassy mala fide, and with the view of evading his creditors, will not be protected by the court (Cloeté, 1st June 1891, Times L.R. 565).

The power of ambassadors to celebrate marriages, and to allow them to be celebrated in their houses, has been discussed supra, note on p. 362, and again p. 374.]

III. JURISDICTION OF COURTS OF LAW OVER FOREIGN SOVEREIGNS AND STATES.

INTRODUCTORY. OLDER THEORY (BYNKERSHOEK).

§ 527. It is a complicated question to determine what powers must be conceded to the courts of law over foreign sovereigns and foreign States. Modern law makes a distinction between the personal rights of a sovereign, and those which he exercises as the representative of the power of the State. Courts of law may, therefore, have entirely different powers in questions with a foreign sovereign in his character as the owner of a private fortune or estate, from those which they have against him in so far as he represents the power of the foreign State.

The older writers know nothing of this distinction; they speak simply of judicial measures, which are directed against foreign princes. Thus Bynkershoek, in his treatise de foro legatorum, deals at the same time with the question of judicial jurisdiction over foreign princes. It is plain, from what he there says, that he looks upon the privileges enjoyed by foreign ambassadors as the more important in a practical point of view, and as the leading subject; whereas his discussion of those of foreign princes takes second place, although, no doubt, he says that they have at least the same privileges as their representatives the ambassadors. This, as we have already said, is historically accurate, inasmuch as the inviolability and extra-territoriality of ambassadors is an indispensable requirement of public law, while there is no such requirement for their sovereigns, unless they act as ambassadors. The exalted position, however, enjoyed by monarchs, and the possibility that, at any moment they please, even although they bring in their train a responsible minister, they may deal with foreign States as the representatives of the States over which they rule, has made it a rule, now of long standing, that the privilege of extra-territoriality, which grew up out of the inviolability of the ambassador, should be allowed to foreign sovereigns also.¹ It is superior to the ambassador's privilege, in so far as it, by general consent, is not nowadays dependent on any previous notification of the coming of the travelling sovereign, and is not to any extent conditioned by the consent of the other State, which has no rights save to turn him back at the frontier or to expel him.

Bynkershoek, then, holds no doubt at all that courts of law can entertain an action against a foreign prince. Not only, says he, does it frequently happen that princes voluntarily submit themselves to particular courts for the decision of some legal difficulty (c. xxiii.); it is also certain that princes are treated just like private persons in questions as to contracts made by them ("ipsos principes dum contrahunt haberi privatorum loco"), c. xiv. As regards the brocard, so often cited in later days, upon this subject, "par in parem non habet jurisdictionem," Bynkershoek says just the reverse (c. iv.), viz. that as regards "bona," an "inferior" may exercise jurisdiction over a superior. The rule "par in parem non habet jurisdictionem" can in truth only be applied to criminal jurisdiction, and closely considered is perhaps only meant to apply to princes holding direct from the emperor. He only held the person of the foreign prince, his retainers and his whole furnishings, which he can use for himself and his train of retainers, as exempt from arrestment and execution. No doubt, he says, policy may suggest that an arrestment, which is asked for against a foreign prince, should not be facilitated, but, apart from that, "nihil est quod arrestum et jurisdictionem impediatur." Bynkershoek then adduces a series of cases in which, in the seventeenth century, arrestments had been used and processes carried on in the Netherlands against the Elector of Brandenburg, the Republic of Venice, the Duke of Mecklenburg, the King of Spain,² and the Duke of Courland, and adds, "possum plurima exempla addere quæ vel mea memoria inciderunt." Lastly, he tells of a process in the eighteenth century against the King of Prussia, remarking that the King did not feel himself aggrieved so much by being cited to the process, as by the publicity of the citation (per campanam ut fit); he appeared, however, and appealed, taking no protest against the jurisdiction.³ The discussion closes with the remark, "adco res in mores transivit ut tanquam de re liquida, nunc quidem inter omnes videatur constare." No doubt, however, he gives the warning that things of very small value should not be arrested, or a prince cited on such an arrestment, a warning which we might fairly extend even to the case of private persons. Bynkershoek has no hesitation in holding this to be an abuse of the summum jus,⁴ or, as we should call it, a judicial interpretation of the law.

INFLUENCE OF MODERN DEVELOPMENT OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

§ 528. The question of jurisdiction over foreign princes has been subsequently developed. In the first place, there has been gradually introduced a distinction between the private property of princes, or of the princely family, and the property of the State. When this distinction first became part of legal doctrine, it was no longer possible to hold the prince and his property responsible in a foreign country for the debts of the State, or conversely. The enquiry on the point was often difficult, and although there were comparatively few courts that were completely independent, yet, on the other hand, princes had often good reasons for limiting the recourse of their subjects against other princes: they, too, might some day be sued in a foreign country, and, of course, the proverb "manus manum lavat" has always a certain amount of force. If it could be asserted that there was no jurisdiction at all against the foreign sovereign, then the sovereign could in majorem gloriam represent his own conduct in allowing actions to proceed against himself in the courts of his own country, as a gracious concession, which in certain circumstances he could recall.

² In this case (1668) they went so far as to lay arrestments on ships of war. No doubt the States General busied themselves to release the ships. The letter of the States General, of which an extract is given by Bynkershoek, gives no indication that they had found anything contrary to law in the arrestment.

⁴ Compare § 433, note 103, for what is there said as to § 24 of the German Civilprozessordnung.

Further, the theory sprung up that the State, as such, could make bargains in such a way that the other contracting party should submit himself to the good pleasure of the administrative authority of the State with which he contracted. As legislation and administration began to diverge one from the other more sharply in point of form, this divergence exhibited itself most distinctly in the permission which the legislature by special enactment⁵ would give to the administrative authority to conclude bargains, especially to contract loans, and to amounts which were formerly unknown, under quite definite conditions. It was clear, that if all the creditors in such cases could assail the property of the State with real diligence, the machine of the State, which is always embracing more and more, might be brought to a standstill or thrown into confusion, to the prejudice of the public. These large debts, contracted with an indefinite number of creditors on equal conditions, on the authority of special statute, all exist under the reservation that the State shall be in a position to satisfy them, and the supreme administration of the State, in the shape of legislation, will finally determine whether the State is in that position. The State has a kind of beneficium competentiae to a large extent: it must in the first place support itself, and the payment of debt only stands in the second line. Demands against the State thus directly subject to its own legislative authority will give rise to diligence or to jurisdiction in the stricter sense, only so far and so long as the legislature, which in this matter has a sovereign power of disposition, permits it. But it is plain—and this is the only point of interest—that there can be no idea of subjecting one State to the jurisdiction of another. Where claims are thus made dependent on the good pleasure of the debtor, it cannot be maintained that that debtor is subject to the jurisdiction of a foreign court. Nor does any jurisdiction arise ratione materiae, even although the conditions, on which local jurisdiction depends, are satisfied, even although e.g. the payment of the debt or of the interest on it should be undertaken by the State as debtor in some foreign country at the option of the creditor.⁶

⁵ In my first edition (pp. 614, 615), in which the subject is only shortly dealt with, I certainly did not deal fully with this special case, which occurs so frequently nowadays, of an obligation which is in theory contractual, but which in fact is from the first placed at the mercy of the legislature. I think that so keen-sighted a writer as Gabba is might have been able to discover my meaning, especially if he had remembered the historical development of the circumstances which regulate the case.

But, again, it is obvious that no one can ever propose to make the authority of a foreign State answerable in our courts for what it has done in the exercise of its supreme authority, to make it liable in damages for what it has done in the exercise of its sovereign rights. The provisions which regulate jurisdiction in matters of private obligation have no application here, because the sovereign power of the foreign State has to be considered in that character, and not as the holder of private rights, or as the subject of private obligations. Nor have the foreign courts in such matters jurisdiction ratione materiae.⁷ It is the discretion of the individual State, and nothing else, that can control the fashion in which that State shall manage its own sovereign rights. Thus, for instance, the courts of State A can never entertain an action directed against State or sovereign B,⁸ or against any official, now in office or retired, of that State or sovereign, founded on the consideration that this State, or its official or representative,⁹ in the exercise of its supreme authority within State B, has injured some one in person or in property. No doubt, the authority of the State may, even within its own dominions, transgress public law, e.g. by wilful ill-treatment of foreigners. But in such a case there would not be any such transgression of law as could be pleaded before the courts of another State. For transgressions of public law satisfaction can only be demanded by the means known to that law, viz. diplomatic interference by the State to which the sufferers belong, or, in the last resort, warlike intervention by that State.¹⁰ On these points there is no discussion in Bynkershoek or in any of the older writers. This blank is explained by the fact that, by the older law of procedure, trespasses upon legal rights taking place abroad were referred exclusively to the foreign tribunal, and could not, because all the elements for local jurisdiction were wanting in the courts of other countries, be dealt with in any of these other countries. But in more modern times, as we have frequently had to notice, a multitude of jurisdictions have been somewhat capriciously set up, by means of which, sometimes in the interest of its own subjects only, a State withdraws legal questions from the cognisance of the judge to whom, in a certain sense, they naturally belong. These jurisdictions make

⁶ In my view, the establishment of an office for payment in the foreign country does not create a forum contractus there with international validity.

⁷ See to this effect Laurent, iii. § 46.

¹⁰ See the extracts from the despatch of the Secretary of the United States, Webster, of 15th March 1841, given by Beach-Lawrence, ut cit.

it possible for a person to submit to the determination of the courts of his own country delicts committed in a foreign country, or legal relations which in substance belong entirely to that foreign country, and that even where foreigners are concerned. Let us remember the jurisdictions provided by § 14 of the Code Civil and § 24 of the German Civilprozessordnung. Now, although such excesses of jurisdiction may not be considered matters of much moment where private persons are concerned, there is an instinctive feeling that such fanciful jurisdictions, created by the State at its own hand, cannot be set in motion against a foreign power.

Then, too, the execution of a judgment against a foreign power gives rise to difficulties. If there are no assets in this country on which to do diligence, then it may be apprehended that the foreign State will decline to implement the judgment; while, on the other side, we observe that it is not every article belonging to a foreign Government that happens to be in this country that can be made available for diligence.

THE MODERN VIEW. INCOMPETENCY OF FOREIGN COURTS, AS A MATTER OF PRINCIPLE, EXCEPT THE forum rei sitæ AND THE forum OF VOLUNTARY PROROGATION. TRADITION AND communis opinio AS THEY ARE REPRESENTED TO BE AND AS THEY REALLY ARE.

§ 529. In this way we explain the theory,¹¹ which is nowadays often proclaimed with great confidence, that actions against foreign States and sovereigns must not be entertained at all by the courts, and that it is entirely incompetent to give judgment against foreign Governments in the course of a process. Convenience recommends this principle. If there is so distinct a prohibition, we need apprehend no mistakes and no abuses in the conduct of the tribunals, and we shall have no occasion to consider the susceptibilities of a foreign Government, which might possibly be hurt by the fact of an unfavourable judgment being pronounced against it.

Of course, there is no lack of reason to support this comfortable theory, and many are attracted by it, because it invests the sovereign power with the mysterious splendour of inaccessibility, and to a certain extent withdraws it from the general legal bond that unites all men. But the reasons given are in truth, as we must concede to Laurent, but weak. In many instances writers have not taken the trouble to read the older authorities with care, or to notice on what state of facts this or that judgment was pronounced. Whereas we know that judicial sentences are often sounder in their results than in the reasons given for them: in drawing up the statement of these reasons, the judge who gives the leading opinion, and draws up that statement, frequently pays little heed to some expression or to a general proposition which he uses; those who concur with him pay even less. Lastly, one author, who has no desire to go deeply into the reasons of the doctrine, appeals to the authority of another, and so the tale of authorities, which is represented as constituting a tradition, grows apace. Let us examine a little more closely how this tradition stands. Bynkershoek's view we have already ascertained. For instance, at the end of last century the French minister for foreign affairs, in 1772, raised the question of the competency of arrestment against foreign sovereigns:¹² so, too, did the Prussian Allgemeines Landrecht, and one of the most eminent and thoughtful writers on this subject, G. F. v. Martens, says, in his edition of the Précis du droit des gens (i. § 147), dated 1789:—

“Les biens d'un Souverain étranger absent aussi bien que ceux qui appartiennent plus proprement à son état ou à ses sujets sont soumis à la juridiction et par conséquent à la saisie.”

It is quite true that he speaks of an absent sovereign only. That is explained by the circumstance that he has previously spoken of the case of a sovereign who is present in the territory, and has conceded to him, and to the things that are actually being used by him, the privileges of extra-territoriality. We cannot complain of any want of precision in his declaration that the foreign State and the foreign sovereign are in the same position as the foreign subject. All the same Martens is generally passed over when authorities on this point are enumerated, or included among those who exempt foreign States and sovereigns from all jurisdiction.

Klüber, in § 50 of his Völkerrecht, does not indeed speak specially of jurisdiction over foreign States: he does, however, treat of jurisdiction as regards foreign sovereigns, and simply holds that the forum hereditatis, rei sitæ, and arresti are competent, in so far as both the opposing parties are looked upon merely as private persons. This latter proposition is decisive: it shows that Klüber applies to States what he says of sovereigns; for sovereigns, in so far as they do not represent the State or are identified with it, are, as regards property and patrimonial suits, merely private persons.

Heffter, too (vi. § 53), does not for a moment think of asserting that one State is not subject to the jurisdiction of another in patrimonial questions.¹³ On the contrary, he remarks that the sovereign is, “as regards private estates and succession within a foreign territory, and also for private obligations which fall to be performed there,” subject to the legal rules of that foreign territory. The whole context shows that in the phrase “legal rules,” rules of jurisdiction are included. At the outset of the passage Heffter attributes to the sovereign, "immunity from acts of sovereignty in every shape, and in particular from the jurisdiction of a foreign State:" he is speaking of the personal immunity of the sovereign from diligence. So, too, Demangeat (note on Fœlix, i. § 213) pronounces in favour of the jurisdiction of the courts. He asserts that, if foreign Governments are empowered to enter into relations of private law with private individuals, it will be an intolerable privilege that these private persons should be disabled from obtaining justice from the courts. Demolombe (i. § 25) expresses himself, as is right, with more caution: he describes the axiom of the incompetency of the courts against foreign Governments as modern doctrine in which he concurs. This era was opened in France by a judgment of the French Court of Cassation of 22nd June 1849, cassing a judgment to the opposite effect pronounced by the Appeal Court at Pau.¹⁴ The reasoning on which this judgment is supported has been the principal armoury¹⁵ from which the weapons to resist any jurisdiction in the courts of law have been drawn. Demangeat has already criticised this reasoning most excellently.

¹² Printed in de Martens, Causes célèbres, ii. p. 112, and in Phillimore, ii. p. 628.

The first argument used is that of "sovereignty," which requires that one State should be independent of another, whereas jurisdiction requires a relation of dependence. But, as Demangeat remarks, there is no idea of any such independence as the essence of sovereign power, where we are dealing with the State simply as endowed with certain private rights. We add to that that there is no such thing known as the absolute independence of any State. In our view, all States are, in the first place, subject to international legal order; and, in the second place, it is quite impossible for a State, which takes its place in the legal order of another State, although in respect merely of some relations of private law¹⁶—as is the case when it owns land or enters into contracts there—to remain absolutely independent of that other State. Whether and to what extent the one State must hold the legal arrangements of the other as applicable to its transactions and property situated there, is a matter to be determined not by the blind worship of a theory, but by a real practical consideration of facts, and by the necessities of existence. Every one must undoubtedly confess that a State cannot be exempted from the operation of the law of a foreign country upon the substance of any relations of private law which that State may have assumed within the territory of that foreign country: from this it seems to follow, without prejudice to the inviolability of certain persons and certain things as guaranteed by the doctrine of extra-territoriality, that the State must be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of that country to the same extent: for, so far as possible, the application of the law of a country to the substance of any legal relation and the jurisdiction of that country should go pari passu.

¹⁴ Extracts are given by Demangeat on Fœlix, i. § 15.

¹⁵ So, too, the tribunal of Brussels of 3rd Nov. 1870 declared quite generally for the incompetency of the courts (Rev. ii. p. 153).

¹⁶ Cuvelier (Rev. xx. p. 120) says that it is impossible to distinguish in the State a persona with relations of private law. For the value of this argument, I shall simply appeal to the fact that Cuvelier will on this point have the whole of German legal authority against him. Cuvelier refuses to admit any relations of private law for the person of the sovereign. That goes even beyond the proposition, "L'Etat, c'est moi."

In the second place,¹⁷ it is said that every one who contracts with a foreign State is bound to know that he is subjecting himself to the jurisdiction of that State.^{18 19} Demangeat very justly declares that this is simply a petitio principii. It might just as fairly be maintained that the foreign State which acquires property within the territory of our State, or concludes contracts with private persons there, subjects itself to the jurisdiction of the country so far as these are concerned.

But if we turn to the most modern authors, we find that the position of the alleged unanimity with which, as it is said, all reject the jurisdiction of courts of law over sovereigns and States, is very peculiar. The unanimity substantially rests upon the fact that it is a very common habit for authors to read the works of others somewhat cursorily.

Among such authors we may certainly count Fœlix (i. § 213), Rolin Jacquemyns (Rev. vii. p. 714), Westlake (§ 190), Field (§ 637), and even more emphatically, Demolombe v. Holtzendorff (J. iii. p. 341), Droop, and, most recently of all, Gabba and Cuvelier²⁰ (Rev. xx. p. 109). Phillimore quotes the opinions of others rather than sets up distinct principles, so too does Calvo (iii. §§ 1460 et seq.), and Bluntschli²¹ expresses himself so cautiously that he cannot for certain be counted as an adherent of the doctrine that jurisdiction is to be absolutely negatived in the cases now under discussion. On the other hand, besides Laurent, Spée (J. iii. p. 329), Fiore (Dir. Publ. i. § 500), Macri (pp. 230, 231), and, in a more marked way, v. Martens,²² Weiss²³ (p. 886), Gianzana (ii. § 103), and v. Heyking (p. 127)

¹⁷ Gabba (J. xv. p. 187) has reproduced Demangeat's counter-arguments unfairly and without fully understanding them.

¹⁹ Cuvelier (p. 123) finds it a great evil that, according to the doctrine advocated in the text, the French State cannot apply its rules for the administration of justice abroad. I can see nothing unjust in refusing to the French State any privilege in matters of jurisdiction against the subjects of another State in connection with a legal question which in its essence belongs to that other State.

²⁰ (P. 127, cette incompétence est absolue).

²¹ Bluntschli says: "As the holder of private property, as a private creditor or debtor, the sovereign is not in any sense the representative of the State, he is not a sovereign." All he says is that the courts as a rule will not entertain any civil action, and in particular any action for debt, against extra-territorial persons.

²³ Weiss says: "C'est une question célèbre que celle de savoir si un souverain étranger peut adopt the view that, as regards the purely private suits of foreign States and sovereigns, the local courts have jurisdiction.

ARGUMENTS AND COUNTER-ARGUMENTS.

§ 530. As a matter of fact, the principle of an absolute want of jurisdiction against foreign States and sovereigns involves a serious outrage upon the general legal conscience. So far Laurent is right.

A foreign Government claims in this country all the rights of a private person: it buys, trades, and acquires property here, and if it thinks that any advantage is being taken of it by any private person, it appeals to our courts. But in the converse case it exclaims at once: "Against me there is no right of action in this country: any one who thinks he has claims against me, may follow me abroad, and although the goods I ordered but did not pay for are still in this country, you shall seek justice in my own courts²⁴ (it may be over seas), if, indeed, I should be of opinion that claims of the kind can be brought before the courts at all." Those who defend this principle find themselves constrained to make exceptions. The first is of all real actions affecting real property. In this case, as in the case of ambassadors, it would be intolerable if action were not allowed. But it is also held to be permissible for the court to find the foreign State liable in expenses, and generally to give judgment against the foreign State if it has voluntarily, expressly, or by implication subjected itself to the judgment of the court: as a general rule, too, on this principle of prorogation it is, as a rule, held that the court has jurisdiction against a foreign Government reconventionne.²⁵

But in these exceptions we find the condemnation of the principle. The recognition of prorogation per expressum might possibly be regarded as reconcilable with the principle: but the recognition of prorogation by implication cannot. In the latter case, there is no question of a reference to the concrete will of the individual; the subjection of the party to the être soumis à la juridiction de nos tribunaux. La jurisprudence semble l'avoir résolu par une distinction. Lorsque le souverain est actionné en France à raison d'un acte gouvernemental qu'il ne pouvait faire que comme souverain, le tribunal Français est incompétent, . . . au contraire, si dirigée contre le souverain étranger est d'ordre exclusivement privé, si c'est comme personne privée qu'il est actionné, les tribunaux Français en connaîtront valablement."

²⁴ The Government of the Sovereign Congo State has its seat in Brussels. Of course, it concludes numerous contracts in Belgium with Belgian merchants. Cuvelier (p. 128) proposes to refer his countrymen, if any differences should arise on such contracts, to the Congo for determination of the question, e.g. whether goods, still in Belgium, delivery of which has been refused for some fault not admitted by the merchant, must be accepted or not. Fiat justitia, pereat mundus! At the same time, he confuses the question of the extra-territoriality of the Congo Government and its offices, etc., with the question of jurisdiction over contracts concluded by that Government. I, too, think that there is no doubt about this extra-territoriality. The Congo Government would certainly take no advantage from the doctrine so warmly recommended by Cuvelier.

²⁵ See e.g. Gerbaut, § 169; Westlake-Holtzendorff, § 182.

jurisdiction is inferred from the nature of the subject. Again, too, it is the nature of the subject, and that alone, or, if the expression is preferred, natural justice alone, that will support the condemnation of the unsuccessful pursuer in expenses, if he has not expressly agreed to be liable in expenses in the event of his failure. It will not do to give any one such a privilege as will enable him, by raising an unfounded action, to put any one he pleases to great cost, and to remain exempt from liability to make these costs good. What we term a voluntary prorogation of the liability to pay expenses²⁶ is merely a form of this principle. Indeed, it may be said that such a prorogation is a conditio sine qua non of appearing as a suitor. But we may go on to maintain that submission to the courts of the country is a conditio sine qua non of the right to make bargains, or to acquire property in our territory. If we make an exception of implied submission, we may effect a great deal, more even than if we threw the principle altogether aside. The exception of reconvention, which most admit, is an illustration of this. But if we propose to limit the exceptions to cases of express prorogation, then a foreign Government might protest against being found liable in expenses, if it had lost an action, but had not expressly bound itself to make good expenses in the event of non-success. Upon the whole, if we ask for express prorogation, we shall land ourselves in technicalities which will make legal intercourse hardly possible, because they will offend against bona fides.

THE CORRECT PRINCIPLE. JURISDICTION AND WANT OF JURISDICTION
ratione materiae.

§ 531. In our view we must distinguish in this subject, as well as in reference to ambassadors, between jurisdiction in the stricter sense, on the one hand, and executorials on the other.

As regards jurisdiction, foreign States or Governments are subject to the courts of the country in so far as the nature of the subject requires, but no further.

Taking the nature of the subject as our guide, the courts are incompetent ratione materiae, if an obligation has been created by some act of the supreme authority of the State, e.g. if a person has been in the service of a foreign Government, and proposes to sue it for arrears of pay, or for pay which has been refused. Although it may well be that this act of the foreign Government by its own law will give the official right to sue for the salary that has been promised, still the act which gives rise to this right is an act of the sovereign power, and not an act of ordinary private intercourse: nor can any transactions that may, previously to the action, have been had with the official, make any difference in the matter. Nor will the courts have any jurisdiction founded on locality against a foreign Government, as we shall see.

Jurisdiction, too, ratione materiæ will be excluded likewise in cases in which there is to all appearance a contract obligation, e.g. an obligation arising on a loan, but in which the Government, placing the contract under some special enactment, reserves to itself right to modify its bargain by means of special legislation, if it should come to be unable to implement it. In such a case, even although no such modifying legislation—legislation, i.e. in fact announcing the partial bankruptcy of the State—has not yet been passed, no action can be raised in the courts of this country against the foreign Government. So, too, an action in the foreign courts is excluded, just because the State, in choosing the solemn form of a statute or ordinance for laying down the conditions of the bargain or bargains, indicated that its obligation was of an entirely different character from an obligation of ordinary private law. This point of view is specially applicable in the case of the great loans of the present day, which rest on some special financial statute, and are thrown open to public subscription, with obligations payable to bearer.²⁷ But neither will the courts in such cases have any jurisdiction in respect of locality.²⁸ We might have to determine this point otherwise, if these States gave some special right of pledge to its creditors over some article that actually was in another country. By this very act it would have declared that the article so given in security was not absolutely necessary for its own maintenance, and would thus have sanctioned an action which would be altogether an action on private rights.

On the other hand, an action against a foreign State, and of course, too, an action against a foreign sovereign personally, may be entertained ratione materiæ if the foundation of the action be an act belonging to the ordinary administration of the State in which the foreign Government has acted not jure imperii but jure gestionis, as it has been well expressed.²⁹ Such is the jurisdiction that is e.g. assumed in an action arising out of a sale of guano, made by a foreign Government (C. de Gand, 14th March 1879, J. viii. p. 82). The distinction is generally approved of in an interesting judgment of the Appeal Court at Lucca on 14th March 1887 (J. xv. p. 289).

²⁸ Gianzana, ii: § 103, is sound on this point.

²⁹ See Gianzana, § 103, who takes a very sound distinction between jurisdiction in respect of locality and in respect of subject matter.

JURISDICTION BASED ON LOCALITY.

§ 532. As regards local jurisdiction, a foreign Government is by the nature of things subject to:—

1. The forum rei sitæ, for actions connected with immoveable property. As we have said, this is admitted on all hands. Since it is generally maintained that the forum rei sitæ is exclusive in such matters, any other view would lead to an absolute denial of justice.

2. The forum hereditatis, in so far as the foreign sovereign or foreign State is concerned in any succession. This is laid down by all who deal with this point.³⁰ It may also be asserted that a foreign State or a foreign sovereign, that has fallen heir to an individual, and is sued for a debt of the deceased, must answer just like any private person. If any one desires to be the legal successor of a citizen of this country, he cannot choose to take up this position in so far only as it confers rights on him; he must take over the liabilities also, and that, too, under the eye of the court of this country. Is it proposed that the creditors of a succession in this country should look quietly on, while the succession, which is liable to them, is carried off to another country, and have this comfort only, that they may seek justice at a distance and under serious disadvantages?

3. It is subject to every jurisdiction, which it has itself recognised for the case on hand, be it that it has instituted the action, or be it that it has not pleaded want of jurisdiction in the court. That is required by bona fides, and the individual character of the sovereign or his representative need not in such circumstances be invoked to determine the consequences of such recognition of the tribunal. Thus the sovereign or State whose action has been thrown out will be found liable in expenses like any other party. So, too, for instance, a foreign sovereign will have to emit an oath, if any other party would have to do so, to gain his case; and, again, he will be liable to exhibit documents in the same way as any other party.³¹ It is impossible in a civil process to suspend the rule as to equality of weapons,³² and to allow a party to entrench himself, when it will suit him, behind the privilege of a foreign sovereign. No direct compulsitor will be used. If a foreign sovereign considers it to be inconsistent with his dignity to take some step of process that is required of him, he may surrender the object of the action, or allow himself to be found liable in a payment of money, or delivery of some article. The same thing, of course, holds in cases in which the jurisdiction of the court is assumed without any voluntary prorogation on the part of the foreign sovereign or State.

³⁰ See Westlake, § 193, and the judgment of Lord Langdale quoted there. [D. of Brunswick v. King of Hanover, 1844, 6 Beav. 57.] In that judgment expression is given to the theory that all that will be done will be to give the extra-territorial person the opportunity of claiming his rights. (See Beach-Lawrence, iii. p. 421.) By such an argument as this, a very wide jurisdiction might be conferred in all cases in which the object of the suit or of the diligence happened to be in the country.

³¹ Thus an English court required the King of Spain to emit an oath [King of Spain v. Hullet & Widder, 1833, 1, Cl. and F. 348]; and the Queen of Portugal was held to be liable to produce documents [Rothschild v. Queen of Portugal, 1839, 1, Young and Collyer, 594]. See Westlake Holtzendorff, § 181, and note; Phillimore, ii. § 113.

³² So, too, Foote, p. 103.

4. A foreign government or sovereign is also subject to the forum contractus, but only to the extent already (§ 423) laid down, i.e. only in cases in which the whole affair on both sides was intended to be worked out and fully disposed of in that country. As we have already shown, a declaration that payment should be made at some particular place in the country is not enough by itself. To that limited extent, however, the forum contractus satisfies the bona fides which international intercourse demands, and this leading principle of the law of nations, perhaps the most essential of them all, must be respected by a foreign sovereign, or by a foreign Government. It has generally been laid down, that if a foreign Government carries on a commercial business in any State, by means of a separate establishment,³³ it is to that extent subject to the courts of that country.³⁴ It cannot be suffered that any one, be it a foreign State, should contract obligations as a merchant or manufacturer by transactions that are to be carried through at the place where his trading establishment is situated, and should then be able to declare that his trade-creditors must seek their rights in a distant foreign country.

According to the principle we have already laid down, it is obvious that the foreign State must be subject to the jurisdiction, and it requires no special rule to make it so; the forum contractus is set up with international validity. No doubt Westlake, § 190, says: "Foreign States and those persons in them who are called sovereigns . . . cannot be sued in England on their obligations, whether ex contractu, ex delicto, or quasi ex contractu." But here one must remember, that originally the law of England traced the authority of the court to judge in any case to service within the jurisdiction, i.e. to a personal submission by the person through his actual presence in the territory, a condition which can, of course, never be present in the case of a foreign State or foreign sovereign. Accordingly, an exception has been made in practice in the case of certain maritime actions in rem in which personal service is not required. Since the modern law of procedure in England tends to lay less weight on the consideration that the defender has been personally served with the action within the territory, and to refer jurisdiction less and less to the possibility of using compulsitors at the moment at which action is raised, we may expect to see the rule laid down by Westlake as a principle of law very soon riddled with exceptions from all sides. For it is certain that the law of England is familiar with the distinction between private trade and an act of the sovereign, or of the supreme power as such. This appears from the judgments of famous English judges such as Westlake cites in § 191.

³³ Such cases may occur, when a Government within a dominion of another State undertakes contracts of carriage, or sells mining products.

In fact, Alexander (J. v. p. 36) asserts, in accordance with the exposition of the law given by Lord Langdale in the King of Hanover's case [D. of Brunswick v. King of Hanover, 1844, 6 Beav. 39], that a foreign sovereign, who carries on trade in England, is subject to English jurisdiction quoad hoc.

QUESTIONS OF EXECUTION.

§ 533. But in disposing of jurisdiction in the narrower sense, we have determined nothing as to execution or diligence, or as to the lawfulness of an arrestment. Diligence and also arrestment in security are excluded from everything to which the privilege of extra-territoriality extends.³⁵ As a rule, too few articles are reckoned among this privileged class. They are not confined to things which a foreign monarch is carrying with him, or has in his own use, and to foreign ships of war.

Everything belonging to a foreign Government which, by agreement between the States, is set apart for the purposes of that foreign Government,³⁶ e.g. a custom house, with its furniture, even although one State, as is sometimes the case at frontier stations for the convenience of travellers, takes its custom-dues within the territory of another State, is invested with a limited extra-territoriality, i.e. an extra-territoriality in the sense that they must not be withdrawn from the uses to which they have been allowed to be put. Things,³⁷ however, which are also available for conveyance in the interests of private persons, and do not belong to the foreign State itself, but to private persons or limited companies, do not necessarily enjoy exemption from arrestment and diligence.³⁸ Neither do mail-boats, which ³⁵ Thus the ambassador's hotel could never be taken in execution upon a claim of debt.

³⁶ But they must at the moment be in use for these purposes: it is not enough that they are to be so used at some future time. E.g. arms or cannons which have been bought in this country, so long as they have not actually been taken into use by the military authorities of the State, are simply goods, open to be arrested, and the fact that some one, be he even a military official or officer, has taken delivery of them, cannot be regarded as use by the supreme authority. V. Holtzendorff (J. iii. p. 433) overlooks this: he seems to hold that the arrestment of cannon packed up as goods is equivalent to an attack on the army.

³⁷ Things sent by private persons to international exhibitions are not extra-territorial: they are not so, even if the customs officers of the State in which the exhibition takes place treats these objects, sent from a foreign country, as if they were still in their own country. Such things are subject to arrestment and to execution: the creditor, by paying the duty on them, may remove them from the exhibition, and so apply them in satisfaction of his debt. See Clunet's pamphlet, "Questions de droit relatives à l'exposition Univ. de 1878." (See also J. v. pp. 81 and 187.) The question, to what extent the directors of the exhibition can be ordered, to facilitate the arrestment of things exhibited in their buildings, to give them up, is a question of the local municipal law, and depends on the shape of the legal relation between the exhibitors and the directors of the exhibition (See Lyon-Caen, J. v. p. 446, and the criticism there of judgments given by the Austrian courts in a case of the kind).

³⁸ It will, however, be a matter of convenience to allow the rolling stock on foreign railways to be free from arrestment, as is done in the German Imperial Statute of 3rd May 1886, on condition of reciprocity. This does not prevent its being attacked by bankruptcy, if the railway should become bankrupt. See, too, the Railway Freight Convention of Berne, art. 23, § 5. . . . "Le matériel des chemins de fer, ainsi que les objets mobiliers quelconques généralement receive subventions from the State, but are the property of limited companies and managed by them.³⁹ Credits belonging to a foreign Government in a bank cannot claim freedom from arrest. Such outstanding sums do not serve directly to keep the engine of the State going. For the most part they are intended for the payment of debts. Why, then, should they be withdrawn from the grasp of creditors? It may be that such claims by creditors would cause a foreign Government inconvenience. But when a Government has such outstanding balances that can never be absolutely excluded, e.g. it will occur, if the bank, with whom the balance is lying, has difficulty in making cash payments. If the foreign Government has any further credit, it will be easily able to help itself; for, as has been already noticed, arrestments proceeding on claims in respect of great State loans are always excluded, since such claims can never be made good before foreign courts.⁴⁰

Thus jurisdiction and execution, even against foreign Governments, are not absolutely excluded: but at the same time the provisions of the law of process, applicable to the case of foreign Governments, cannot be put in force in quite the same way against them as they can against private persons. Each case must be carefully considered, if it is to be properly dealt with, and it is quite possible that miscarriages may occur in the inferior courts, especially if, as, for instance, is the case in the German Empire, the study of public law, and in particular of international law, is lamentably neglected in the training of judges and advocates. But, nevertheless, the view adopted in these pages will not present any difficulty in practice, if we couple with it the rule which we have laid down in another connection, that in cases of doubt the competency of the courts ratione materie should be negatived, so that we may save all the rights of foreign Governments and sovereigns.

contenus dans ce matériel et qui appartiennent au chemin de fer, ne peuvent également faire l'objet d'aucune saisie sur un territoire autre que celui dont dépend le chemin de fer propriétaire, sauf le cas où la saisie est faite à raison d'un jugement rendu par l'autorité judiciaire de l'Etat auquel appartient le chemin de fer propriétaire."

³⁹ The French Government at one time concluded treaties with some of the Italian States for the exemption from arrestment of the mail-boats used by the post-offices of both countries, although they belonged to private companies and were administered by them. The matter is now regulated between France and the Kingdom of Italy by the treaty concluded in November 1875. (See the paper on the subject by Guilibert, De l'insaisissabilité, dans les rapports internationaux, des navires affectés au service postal (J. xii. pp. 515-526). According to him it is necessary, to exempt from arrestment, that the line of steamers should receive a subvention under special statute, and should be accurately described therein; that it should provide a regular postal service, and that the conditions of a true postal service should be observed by it. Under these conditions, he thinks that the ship is exempt from arrestment not merely in its ports of departure, arrival, and call, but in any harbour of the two States concerned, into which it may be brought by storm or by damage.

⁴⁰ Art. 23, § 4, of the International Freight Treaty of Berne, concedes immunity from arrestment to a balance belonging to foreign railway administrations, except such as may be laid on at the requisition of the courts of the State to which the administration belongs. The circumstances of railways are not, however, of much use as analogies here, since they require constant balancing of accounts.

CRITICISM OF PRACTICE. APPLICATION OF OUR RULES.

§ 534. A careful examination of judgments delivered on this subject shows us, as a matter of fact, that in very many cases in which jurisdiction was negatived, this was in our view, too, a sound result. That was so in the great majority of cases, which Droop, in his work to which we have referred, indiscriminately cites in support of his proposition that no such jurisdiction is allowable. They are claims of damages which have reference to some act of a foreign Government done in its capacity of supreme ruler, or actions arising out of State loans in modern times which are based on some special statute. This latter consideration was undoubtedly applicable to the case, which obviously gave rise to Droop's treatise. The coupons in favour of bearer, coupons of the Roumanian loan, on which the arrestment applied for by the engineer Ziemer to the court of Berlin, and granted on the authority of that court, proceeded, were issued in virtue of a special statute of Roumania of 1st May 1880. We can, therefore, approve the result of the judgment which was pronounced in 1882 by the Prussian Court, in the determination of the conflict which then arose between the courts and the administrative officers; although we cannot assent to the reason given for it.⁴¹

These reasons lay it down as a proposition which will be universally recognised in the law of nations, that no State can exercise jurisdiction in reference to another State, excepting only in cases of voluntary submission.⁴²

This exception is well calculated to show the weakness of the principle, even if the exception is limited to the case of express prorogation, a limitation which, on the grounds already explained (§ 530), seems inadmissible. If the conception of a sovereign power excludes the possibility of one State being subject to the jurisdiction of another, even in matters of purely private trade, then a voluntary prorogation of jurisdiction is itself impossible. A State cannot dispose of rights which are

⁴¹ On this matter, see also the pamphlet published anonymously, "De la compétence des tribunaux et particulièrement des tribunaux prussiens dans toute contestation relative aux biens mobiliers qu'un état étranger peut posséder en Prusse." Berlin 1882.

The provision of the Prussian Allgemeine Gerichtsordnung is favourable to the jurisdiction which we maintain, not against it. For in the days of the old German Empire it was the non-German princes who were sovereign princes. At that time they were not de jure complete sovereigns. But they are exempt from arrestment in Prussia just because they were not foreigners in all respects, and were subject to German tribunals in all actions on matters of private interest.

essential appurtenances of its sovereign power; it is as incompetent to do this as an individual is to traffic in inalienable rights. By that principle the voluntary subjection of a State to jurisdiction would be ineffectual. But it is an exception that de facto cannot be dispensed with, for this reason, if for no other, that without it there would be no foundation on which to set up the forum rei sitæ, and the right of the court to find a foreign State, which has appeared as a pursuer and has been unsuccessful, liable in expenses.⁴³ Besides, Bynkershoek long ago pointed out that, if an exception is made in the case of a voluntary submission to jurisdiction, the principle itself is imperilled in the highest degree.

On the one hand, then, we cannot assent to the views of those who deny all jurisdiction against foreign States, apart from a case of prorogation; on the other, we cannot assent to the theory of those (e.g. B. Spée, J. iii. p. 329, p. 420) who propose to apply the provisions of the law of procedure to foreign States, just as if they were dealing with private persons.⁴⁴ This latter view overlooks the fact that rules of public law do not require, in order to their validity, to be laid down in the statutes of the States concerned.

POSSIBILITY OF INTERNATIONAL COMPLICATIONS. PROGRESS OR RETROGRESSION ?

§ 535. It has also been pointed out that if jurisdiction is to be extended over foreign States, serious complications may very probably arise. This was actually pointed out by the Prussian Ministry for foreign affairs, when the conflict of jurisdiction arose in the process already mentioned of Ziemer against the Roumanian Government.

This apprehension may very well be groundless.⁴⁵ A judgment which decrees some prestation of private law—it will ordinarily be payment of a sum of money—does not involve any insult to the person against whom the judgment goes; if it were so, the liability to pay expenses, which every one admits, would also be an insult. The memorandum of the German foreign office lays no weight on this consideration. The opinion expressed is that, if arrestments were generally admitted against foreign Governments,⁴⁶ they would accumulate, and would lead to general reprisals. No doubt that is possible, if such jurisdictions as those of the Code Civil, § 14, or of the German Civilprozessordnung, § 24, are invoked against foreign ⁴³ It might perhaps be a result that in such a case one would require to politely request the foreign State to graciously repay the defender his expenses.

⁴⁴ Spée goes so far as to propose to apply to foreign Governments some such provision as that of § 14 of the Code Civil.

⁴⁵ See, on the other hand, Laurent, iii. § 54.

⁴⁶ D'Aiguillon, French minister of foreign affairs under Louis XV., was not afraid to say, in a memorandum addressed to the European courts in 1772: "On pourrait saisir les biens mobiliers du prince même que le ministre (ambassador) représente, s'il en possédait sous notre juridiction." See above, p. 1107.

Governments. These provisions involve excesses of jurisdiction which, as a matter of fact, cannot be approved by the principles of public law; the corpus vile of private persons must put up with these legislative experiments, because it is helpless to resist them. Protests, too, may certainly be expected from foreign Governments if the limits of jurisdiction ratione materiæ are not observed, if it is proposed to adjudicate upon the exercise of sovereign rights, or if petitory actions are entertained, which proceed upon State loans, to regulate which a special law has been passed by the foreign State.

But why should we expect a foreign Government to protest in the same way against the judgment of an independent court in a lawsuit on a purely private matter, if that suit in its essence belongs to the territory of the State in which the court has its seat? Will the suit not be decided by the very court which is most likely to give the best and fairest judgment, looking not only to the proofs, which will be best adduced on the spot, but also as regards the law of the case, which in its leading points will be also the lex fori? In fact, it is hardly possible to discover a reasonable ground for refusing jurisdiction in such matters; unless it comes to this, that every State in turn must necessarily regard the administration of justice by other States with distrust in every case in which one of the parties belonged to a foreign nationality. There may, perhaps, be some ground for maintaining that there has been a voluntary prorogation of jurisdiction⁴⁷ in the cases in which we assert that there is jurisdiction; indeed, many refer the doctrine of the applicability of the lex loci contractus to a voluntary prorogation, even where that doctrine is used to interpret the material import of a contract.

But in many cases an absolute denial of jurisdiction will be no advantage to the foreign Government. It would be very shy of making use of the odious⁴⁸ privilege of calling a private person away to a distant country to settle a piece of business which is to be decided by the law of this country, and is intended, looking to the obvious meaning of the parties, to be all worked out here. But now many publicists hail this doctrine of "no jurisdiction" with a loud chorus of approbation, to the effect that the State cannot and dare not subject itself to a foreign jurisdiction even in matters of private business, without somewhat compromising its dignity. The matter thus becomes an affair of honour, and the foreign State has often to pay more out of goodwill, and by way of compromise, than the judge would award to the other party as a pursuer in an action. But, on the other hand, there is some uncertainty in the position of the tradesman. There may still be Governments in interested or half-civilised States, in which bribery and corruption are not impossibilities. Thus the individual who contracts with a foreign Government will be inclined to put a substantial addition on his price, as a premium of insurance, to meet the case that legal remedies shall be altogether denied to him in his own country, and he be referred for his remedy to the courts in a country of which he knows nothing, or to diplomatic agency, the results of which too often depend on the constellations of higher politics, on which no one can calculate.

⁴⁸ It is quite clear that a foreign State, which maintains ambassadors or agents in this country, will proceed more conveniently in this country against an individual, than that individual will be able to do against a foreign State in a distant country. According to Roman theories of law, the foreign State would have been held "potentior" in its own courts. Cuvelier's discussion (p. 126) is to be disposed of by what is said in the text. What we say in the text cannot be described as exaggerated language, "lyrisme."

In the little Republic of Holland, which was compassed about with enemies on every side, and had not long before succeeded in fighting out its independence against Spain, no apprehension was felt in allowing actions upon contract to proceed in the courts against powerful princes. This we learn from Bynkershoek. That was in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, a time at which, on the one hand, there was much likelihood that trifling occasions and personal susceptibilities might lead to war; and, on the other hand, the independence of the courts was by no means so entirely protected, in form at least, as it is in the civilised States of the present day. Nowadays, in one of our most powerful States, personal actions and arrestments of every kind are declared, if used against foreign States, to be a matter of the utmost risk, and it is thought necessary to introduce a bill,⁴⁹ the effect of which will be in many cases de facto to leave the private individual, and in particular the industries of the country, on which so many claims are made by foreign Governments, almost without legal remedies.⁵⁰ Is it not something very like a denial of legal remedies to refer the injured party to diplomatic intervention, which has frequently to take all sorts of considerations into view,⁵¹ or to suggest to him to seek his rights beyond seas, and, it may be, before ignorant courts and through ignorant advocates, of whom report says, that they know how to protract even the simplest processes to an incredible extent, and to make even the most valuable subjects of a suit melt away in inordinate expenses?

Is that progress or retrogression? Is it right, without pressing necessity, to bar the path of justice, and in that way to do violence to the very conceptions of right and wrong.

⁵⁰ Take the following case. By some mistake, goods that have been ordered are delivered to the representative of a foreign Government without payment having been made. Then the manufacturer cannot vindicate them. He must look on at their being loaded and carried away across seas, and may consider what advocate he shall employ in a country two thousand miles away to conduct his case, and what the expenses will be.

It may be said, on the other side, that there is no guarantee in most cases for the execution of a judgment against a foreign State, and that therefore it would be better to give up the claim of jurisdiction. But has the judgment of an independent court of high standing not an important moral influence upon any Government? Will any foreign Government, without a special ground, desire to shirk the performance of any such judgment? If it does desire to do so, it is nothing but a consequence of the theory which views it as an attack upon the sovereignty of a foreign State, that it should be treated like any private person, when it has entered like any private person into the private trade of the country, and enjoyed the advantages of doing so. There may, however, be many cases in which there are sufficient subjects available for diligence, perhaps the very wares which the tradesmen, to whom payment is refused under some excuse or other, has delivered to an agent for his customer.

PARTICULAR QUESTIONS OF LAW.

§ 536. On points of detail we have to notice: First, The courts are free to consider and pronounce an opinion upon exercises of sovereign power by a foreign Government, if the consideration of those acts of a foreign Government only constitutes a preliminary to the decision of a question of private right, which in itself is subject to the competency of the courts of law.⁵² In fact, in such a case the court is merely dealing with premises on which its judgment in the private suit is to proceed.

Second, The agents and representatives of a foreign Government (e.g. banking houses which have exposed public loans of a foreign Government for subscription) cannot of course personally decline the jurisdiction of the State, and they are not responsible, if they have not given a special guarantee, for the performance of the promises given by a foreign Government.⁵³ They are responsible only for the accuracy of representations made by themselves: but no doubt claims may be made against them for any oversight connected with the payment of interest, and in respect of obligations issued or advertised by them, at the instance of holders of these obligations.⁵⁴

Third, A sovereign, too, is not responsible personally for obligations undertaken by him on behalf of the State in his capacity as its head.⁵⁵

⁵² French Ct. of Cass. 1st Feb. 1875 (J. iii. p. 274).

⁵³ See Ct. of Paris of 25th June 1877. The appeal at once taken against this judgment was thrown out by the Court of Cassation (13th Aug. 1877, J. vi. p. 173).

⁵⁴ See judgments of Trib. Comm. of Nantes, 7th Feb. 1885 (J. xiii. p. 330), and Ct. of Rennes, 16th November 1885, on the same matter; and Trib. Comm. Seine, 14th April 1886.

⁵⁵ The judgment of the Ct. of Paris of 15th March 1872 (J. i. p. 32) may be justified on this ground. The heirs of the Emperor of Mexico were sued in respect of commissions for insignia of orders given in Paris by the Emperor. The grounds of judgment went generally to this, that

He has not in this case undertaken any personal obligation. Still less can there be any idea of holding a dethroned sovereign liable in such cases.⁵⁶

Fourth, If, however, a State takes up an obligation which was originally undertaken by some private debtor, although the State does so on the ground of a special statute empowering it to do so, the rights of creditors of this private individual will not in themselves be affected. The creditor can therefore follow out the rights of the original bargain, under the necessary conditions even in a foreign court, without being met by the objection of there being no jurisdiction ratione materiæ. In particular, he can lay under arrestment all the assets that belonged to the private debtor (under all the conditions required in other cases of arrestment), and if the State which has acquired the debt has commixed the property of the private debtor with the rest of the property belonging to the State, so that it can no longer be distinguished, the creditor must have the same right of arrestment over the whole mass of the property belonging to the State, but, of course, only in so far as it is not altogether withdrawn from private diligence by virtue of some dedication to public purposes. This may under certain circumstances be an important matter, e.g. in cases of nationalisation, i.e. of acquisition of great private undertakings by the State. All this follows from the simple principle that, as a matter of public law, a State cannot have the power of modifying at its own good pleasure, i.e. of confiscating in certain circumstances individual concrete claims of debt, which were, when they were acquired, claims against private persons. But, on the other hand, of course, the right of the creditor to prosecute his claim as a claim of private law, i.e. as a claim which foreign courts will not throw out ratione materiæ, will be lost if he accepts as his debtor a foreign State which assumes the character of debtor by virtue of some special statute, e.g. receives payments from it under that statute. Every subsequent holder of an obligation payable to bearer is bound by anything of this kind which a previous holder may have done. Of course, however, the subsequent holder, in accordance with the nature of an obligation payable to bearer, is only in so far bound as there is a marking upon the obligation or the coupon, as the case may be, that a smaller sum than was due has been accepted.

Fifth, It is possible that a company made up of private persons should at the same time exercise sovereign rights in some other territory. In that case, the company can be sued like any private company in the country in which it has its seat, and execution against it may take place in that country.⁵⁷

Sixth, On the other hand, disputes between two States, although the subjects of these disputes may be matters of private right, are withdrawn the French courts had no jurisdiction, "pour juger les engagements contractés par les souverains étrangers agissant comme chef d'Etat au titre de puissance publique." But in ordinary contract relations there is no element of puissance publique.

from the adjudication of the courts,⁵⁸ as questions of public law, and this rule will prevail in all cases in which the right in dispute is based upon a public treaty.^{59 60}

G. F. v. Martens treats disputes on private matters between two sovereigns, in which the State has no concern, as subject to the jurisdiction of the courts.⁶¹ As a matter of principle, nothing can be said against this; but a sovereign who is party to such a case, if it fell to be tried in the courts of his own country, would do well to propose that it be referred to arbitration.

ACTIONS ON ACCOUNT OF INJURIES DONE BY WARSHIPS.

§ 537. Warships are State property, in connection with which the character of extra-territoriality is allowed to operate in quite a peculiar fashion by consent of all authorities. The ambassador's hotel is subject, under certain formal restrictions, to police authority and jurisdiction so far as that necessarily exists over real property and real rights: but the ship-of-war seems, as has been said, to be a floating fortress of the State, entitled to repel any actual force used against her by force, and on board of which there is actually a real right of asylum. It is out of the question to use any diligence or arrestment against her. The case, however, has occurred, and may occur again any day, that a ship-of-war should damage and sink a trading vessel of another nationality, either by the carelessness

⁵⁸ See Précis d. droit d. g. i. § 147 ad fin.

⁶⁰ The question may be raised whether one Government has a right of expropriation as against another Government with reference to the immoveable property which the latter has within the territory of the other. Field, §§ 50 and 638, assumes generally such a right of expropriation, although he sets very limits on jurisdiction (cf. §§ 637, 638). I cannot concur in this view, and I believe that one Government has a right of expropriation against another only if the latter has acquired the property from a private individual, and not if it has acquired it from another Government. In the latter case, the relation of the Governments to each other is regulated by a treaty which is within the sphere of public law, and a Government cannot, by itself, loose itself from a treaty of public law, even by force of a statute. A Government, e.g. which by treaty has acquired from another Government a coaling station within the latter's territory, or the right to set up a railway station there, cannot without its own consent be declared to have forfeited that property, because it suddenly seems good to the other Government to use the place in question for another purpose. If it could, what becomes of the security of treaty obligations? But, on the other hand, a property which a foreign Government acquired from a private person, without the interposition of a public treaty, cannot by the fact of this acquisition acquire a privileged position, and the simple assent of the State in which the property lies is not equivalent to a public treaty, by which the right of property is itself created. All that the consent implies is that the acquisition, as a private matter, is not objected to by the Government.

⁶¹ In such cases there would certainly be suspected to be partiality, although it might be unconscious. See Hartmann on the question (Instit. § 26): he thinks that the judge who would have jurisdiction in other circumstances should have it here also, but thinks it very doubtful whether any judge would have a sufficiently independent position.

of the captain, or in consequence of the defective condition of some part of the equipment of the warship, under circumstances such as would have founded an action of damages against the owners of a private ship. If the occurrence happened on the high seas or the territorial waters of the State to which the warship belongs, no law other than the law of that State could possibly apply. But the case might very well be different if the occurrence took place in the territorial waters of another country, or in one of its harbours. It is plain that even ships-of-war must obey the police regulations of the territorial State, when they are in such a position. Otherwise, nothing but disorder and uncertainty could ensue, and every State would have to think seriously before it would allow foreign ships-of-war to enter its harbours. But from the necessity of subjecting them to the laws of police that prevail within the territory, and from the consequent equality of all ships that frequent these waters in the eye of the law of that country, it follows in my opinion that the foreign State, which sends its warship into the harbour, subjects it to the substantive territorial law as regards any claims of damage that may arise from collisions. It would be intolerable that the owners of private ships in a harbour should be saddled with the strictest rules of responsibility, while it should be said of warships lying alongside the most valuable trading steamers, that they were "legibus soluta." This maxim would apply, "non est ferendus qui lucrum amplectitur et onus annexum contemnit."⁶²

This view, too, hangs together, in the strictest logical connection, with the principle of extra-territoriality. This can only, so far as substantive law is concerned, apply to occurrences on board ship, but cannot apply to the external relations of that ship to other ships, or to other persons or things outside the warship. The claim of damages, too, may, in our view be followed out before the courts of the country in which the injury took place. If, of course, the true view be that, as a matter of principle, jurisdiction against a foreign State does not under any circumstances exist, then the only recourse is to the courts of the State to which the ship that did the damage belongs. Of course, all arrestment is excluded.

If we take the view that the lex fori should rule in cases of collision of this kind, then the impossibility of arrestment may, no doubt, de facto be fatal to the claim for damages. For, although the lex fori as such should in our view be applied, we are also of opinion that the judgment will not be recognised and cannot be enforced. The application of the lex fori as such to the substantive legal relation is merely an expression of the fact, that the legal systems in question proceed upon entirely different conceptions in dealing with such subjects, and do not mutually recognise each other, or at least do not fully recognise each other on a matter, which, if they did, would belong to their jurisdiction from the nature of the case.

⁶² The converse case, of course, may occur that a warship is damaged by a trading ship. A State which will not obey the lex loci actus, in so far as damages caused by its warships are concerned, could, of course, not appeal on its side to the lex loci actus for the purpose of claiming damages.

This view, however, which was adopted by the Congress of Antwerp and by the Institute of Public Law, that in cases of collision in territorial waters the lex loci actus should rule, will often do little good to the owners of the injured vessel, unless at the same time the rule which we recommended already (p. 716) for the reform of the law, be adopted, viz. that the owner of the ship that does the damage is responsible up to the value of his own ship, if the law of the place where the damage was done imposes liability upon him, even although the law of the owner himself, the law of the flag, relieves him of all such responsibility.⁶³

If we were not accustomed, without, as we think, any good reason to mix up the question of jurisdiction with that of direct diligence, a State could hardly withdraw itself from responsibility for damage done by its warships, as that responsibility is fixed by the law of the territory where the damage is done.

NOTE DDD ON §§ 527-537. JURISDICTION OVER FOREIGN SOVEREIGNS OR STATES.

Of the general rule of law in England and Scotland with regard to jurisdiction and execution against foreign States and sovereigns, there can be no doubt. It is as has been laid down by Westlake (§ 190) in the terms quoted in the text. The leading authority is the case of the Duke of Brunswick v. the King of Hanover, 1844 (6, Beav. 57, and in the House of Lords, 2, H. of L. 1). In that case the Duke of Brunswick sought from the Court of Chancery a declaration that certain procedure by which the ⁶³ In accordance with these rules we should determine the case of the sinking of the French ship Ville de Victoria, in consequence of an injury inflicted by H.B.M.S. Sultan, of which so much has of late been heard (See paper by Clunet, J. xv. pp. 226-237, and again, J. xv. p. 502). These two ships were lying at anchor in Lisbon roads at the mouth of the Tagus on 24th Dec. 1886, when a violent blast of wind broke the cable of the English ship; she swung with such force upon the French trading steamer, that the ram of the English ship pierced her, and in ten minutes she sank. Twenty-two sailors and nine passengers on the French ship were drowned, and the English Government afterwards paid the sum of £20,000 to the surviving relatives, without admitting that there was any claim against them. But England refused to give any compensation to the owners of the ship, and appealed to the English law that the State could not be liable for any fault in the ship's captain, and that he was the only person against whom a claim could be made, or more accurately that the person who was directly responsible for the mishap could alone be sued. Any such responsibility would, in most cases, looking to the great value of ocean steamers and their cargoes, be a mockery, and finally the question might arise, as it would in this very case, whether the deficiency in the material, in this case the cable, was not the true cause of the mishap. Who would be responsible for it? Clunet rightly maintains that neither the Portuguese nor the French Government could possibly have arrested the vessel, and, in accordance with the prevailing legal doctrine, also lays it down that no State except England could have any jurisdiction in the matter. He calls attention, however, to the defective state of the law of England as regards the responsibility of the State for its ships. We can assent to that. But it will be difficult to move States to adopt new and comprehensive principles extending their liabilities. It would be simpler to adopt the principle of private international law suggested in the text, which, looking to the great value of warships in most cases, would generally insure full compensation.

Duke of Cambridge, and subsequently the Duke of Hanover, had been appointed his guardians, were null. Objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the Court by the King of Hanover on the ground that he, although in England a subject of the Queen, was an independent sovereign prince, and that the acts done by him were done in the latter capacity. He had been served with the process while on a visit to England. The House of Lords had no doubt that the procedure complained of had been taken by the king in his capacity as sovereign, and would not therefore render him liable to be sued in the English courts in respect of them. Lord Langdale, however, was clearly of opinion that for any acts done by him or any transactions in which he might be engaged as a subject of the Queen, he might be made to answer in England. Lord Brougham, in the House of Lords, thought that if a foreign sovereign, who was also a naturalised subject of this country, possessed a landed estate here, the English court could compel him to perform a contract of sale or mortgage with respect to that estate. Lord Campbell was "by no means prepared to say that" that the King of Hanover, if he had been trustee of a marriage settlement while he resided in England, might not have been amenable to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in respect of that trust. It is not, however, to be supposed that in any of these cases in which jurisdiction might have been sustained, the court could have worked out that jurisdiction, if His Majesty had disregarded its orders, by imprisonment, as they would have done in the case of a private person.

While personal jurisdiction against the sovereign, if he happens to be present in the territory, is undoubtedly excluded (Parlement Belge, 1880, L.R. 5, P. & D. 19, 7 per Brett, J.) jurisdiction which can be established and enforced by proceedings in rem will be admitted. The indignity of personal execution or service of the summons will thus be avoided, and the ground for the plea of extra-territoriality then no longer exists. "The object of international law, in this as in other matters, is not to work injustice, not to prevent the enforcement of a just demand, but to substitute negotiations between Governments, although they may be dilatory, and the issue distant and uncertain, for the ordinary use of courts of justice in cases where such use would lessen the dignity, or embarrass the functions of the representatives of a foreign State; if the suit takes a shape which avoids this inconvenience, the object both of international and ordinary law is attained—of the former, by respecting the personal dignity and convenience of the sovereign, of the latter, by the administration of justice to the subject," per Sir R. Phillimore in the case of the Charkeh, where it was sought to enforce a damage lien by proceedings in rem, viz. against a ship belonging to the Khedive of Egypt. The ground of decision was that the Khedive was not a sovereign prince, but the opinion just quoted was delivered as an exposition of the general principles of international law (1873, L.R. 4, A. & E. 59). It has been explained by the same judge in a subsequent case (the Constitution, 1879, L.R. 4, P.D. 39) that he did not mean, in sanctioning proceedings in rem, to lay down that such proceedings could be taken against a ship-of-war, or any cargo carried on board of her for public purposes. Such vessels and cargo are exempt from jurisdiction and execution. So, too, in the case of the Parlement Belge (supra) the exception was extended to all public vessels, whether vessels of war or not, e.g. mail-packets, and it was held that the declaration of the sovereign of the public character of the vessel shut out enquiry by the court into the true character of her employment.

As regards the immunity of public property of a foreign sovereign, it was held in the case of Vavasour v. Krupp (1878, L.R. 9, Ch. D. 351) that shells, which had been made in Germany for the Japanese Government, and had been brought to England for the purpose of being shipped to Japan, could not be seized or detained on the application of an English subject, who alleged that they had been manufactured in disregard of his rights as a patentee.

But, while a foreign sovereign or State and foreign public property are thus exempt from action or diligence, if "he sues here as a plaintiff the court has complete control over him, and may hold him to all proper terms" (Lord Lyndhurst in Hullet v. King of Spain, 1828, 1, D. & Cl. 169). Hence, as has been already noticed, the king was held bound, like any other plaintiff, to answer a cross-bill on oath (King of Spain v. Hullet, 1833, 1, Cl. & F. 333). See the other authorities on this point, cited by Westlake, § 192. A foreign sovereign, who sued an action for damages caused by collision, was ordered to find caution for expenses (the Newbattle, 1885, L.R. 10, P.D. 33).

Again, a foreign sovereign may be brought into court in circumstances such as the following. A foreign sovereign can sue in a foreign country; and where "a fund is in the Court of Chancery, that court may proceed to administer it even although a foreign sovereign may be interested in it, and may not think fit to come before the court in a suit relating to it," per Lord Cairns, C. in Larivière v. Morgan, 1875, L.R. 7, E. and I.A. 423. But although the court will interfere so as to prevent a foreign Government from taking possession of a fund to which they have no title, they will not pronounce any order against them to compel specific performance of a contract, nor entertain the suit unless a trust or some right of property or hypothecation in the fund be proved. See Westlake, p. 216, § 183. The principle is explained in the case of Smith v. Weguelin, 1869, L.R. 8, Eq. 198, where the Court of Chancery was asked to pronounce an order against the agents of the Peruvian Government ordaining them to pay the proceeds of a quantity of guano lodged in their hands by that Government to certain bondholders, the Government having contracted with the bondholders that the loan and interest should be met in that way. The case of Gladstone v. Musurus Bey, 1862, 1, H. and M. 495, was cited, but in giving judgment it was said by Lord Romilly: "In that case the court did not enforce the specific performance of any contract between the foreign Government and the English company, nor did it assume any power to do so, but as an English company had deposited a sum in the hands of a third party to await a certain result, the court interposed directly to prevent the foreign Government from taking possession of this fund until it had established that, according to the contract with the English Company, it was entitled to do so. . . . All that it did was to prevent the foreign Government from dealing with the fund as its own before it was shown that the amount was forfeited." In the case of Weguelin, the order asked was refused in respect that there was no hypothecation of the fund such as to admit the jurisdiction of the court.

As a necessary condition for the effective administration of any fund by the Court of Chancery, it must be shown that there is some trust created in the agent who holds the fund, or that the fund is hypothecated in England or is the property of the English claimant; this is the kind of jurisdiction which Lord Campbell (Duke of Brunswick v. King of Hanover, 2 H. of L.), and Lord Langdale (ib. 6 Beavan), professed themselves as ready to sustain; how difficult it is to establish any such trust, hypothecation, or property, may be seen from the case of Larivière v. Morgan quoted above, reversing a decision reported in L.R. 7, Ch. 550.

A foreign Government is presumed to contract under its own laws, but may voluntarily subject itself to the law of another country (Gouvernement Ottoman and Comptoir d'Escompte, 1875, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, J. iii. p. 271). If the bankers who issue a foreign loan come under personal guarantees to subscribers, they may be called on to make these good in the courts of the country to which they belong, although the foreign Government cannot be cited (Dreyfus, C. de Paris, 1877, J. v. p. 516).

Similarly, the English courts have held that when the Government of a foreign State contracts a loan in another country, that contract is governed by the law of the State whose Government contracts the debt, and not, as would be the case with private persons, by the law of the country in which the contract is made. So, where the Peruvian Government had contracted a loan on the security of a quantity of guano, which was hypothecated in the hands of an agent in England for payment of the loan and interest, the Court of Chancery refused to compel payment out of the proceeds of the sale of this guano, holding that it had no power to enforce a personal obligation undertaken by a foreign Government (Weguelin, ut supra). In Gladstone v. Ottoman Bank (1863, 1 H. and M. 505) the court refused to consider whether the Turkish Government had violated an agreement which the plaintiffs alleged had been made with them, and violated by rights conferred on others in derogation of the rights so conferred on them.

The English courts have interfered to enforce the law of a foreign country in a case where an invasion of the rights of the foreign sovereign was being prepared in England, the right so to be invaded being a great public right, the regulation of the coin of the foreign realm (Emp. of Austria v. Day and Kossuth, 1861, 2, Giff. 628).

A foreign sovereign would seem to be answerable in the courts of this country for the consequences of a wrong personally committed by him in this country. In the case of Rosses v. Thakoor Sahib of Gondal (1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xix. p. 31), a foreign sovereign was sued for aliment for an illegitimate child alleged to have been procreated by him in England. The court assoilzied the defender on the ground that the act complained of, viz. the seduction of the plaintiff, not being a wrong by the law of England, where it was committed, would not found an action in Scotland, although by Scots law such an action would give right to redress. No plea was taken to the jurisdiction of the court in respect of the defender's position as a sovereign prince, from which it may be inferred that it was thought to be untenable.
